These men met them, and they met them in a way which, if war was declared and it was our country, because of the fight they made against unequal odds, they would be entitled to a medal from the Congress of the United States. They retake the prisoners of the English Army. In taking them, if they have to do it, they kill the soldiers of the army of occupation, of course, and the soldiers of the army of occupation try to kill them. Is it a state of war? There is the most crimeless country in the world. There is jail after jail, built to hold a thousand men, with 10 common-law prisoners in them, misdemeanants, or men charged with felony, and hundreds of men charged with nothing but being republicans. Are they criminals? These fights and flurries at arms take place in the large cities in Ireland. The Irish people retake their prisoners and take them away—in one case with 10,000 people looking on. These people are their soldiers and their heroes. They protect them and they fight for them, because they say that a battle is going on. The English Army is in Ireland to-day with every device of death immediately at command. I saw them build the emplacements upon which the machine guns are now firmly fixed, covering Liberty Hall in Dublin, so as to send a deathly fire into the headquarters of the national labor organization of Ireland. And why? Because, I say, those men, the most conservative labor organization in the world, going along lines approved of by all men, are likewise republicans, and instead of treating them as citizens they treat them as criminals. Those jails were created. We saw men confined in those jails that would compare with the gentlemen whom I have the honor to address this morning as lawyers.

We saw newspaper men there, Senator JOHNSON, who compare most favorably with any that you know in California or with the very best that I have known, who own and edit their own newspapers. We saw men who have devoted a lifetime to doing something for the people whom they represent—members of the Irish Parliament—in solitary confinement. We saw the cells in which they had been confined. They were taken out of them the night before, we were advised, but we saw the underground cells in which they were kept in solitary confinement, and when we asked the question of the governor of the jail, or made the assertion at Mountjoy, he did not deny it. We heard the story at first hand of the statement of the women, young and old, those whom I met, and from whose lips I heard the story which I would not undertake in this presence to detail because of its loathsomeness. I heard that story from the lips of women as refined, as virtuous, as intellectual as your wife and daughter and mine, and I can pay them no higher compliment; and what I say is going on all through Ireland to-day.

Talk about Bolshevists! Property is absolutely unsafe in Ireland. Raids are made on private residences, and thousands of dollars' worth of property are being taken, and not even what they call contraband. Every excess that applies to an army engaged especially in an unjust war is being practiced upon the Irish people. Thousands of dollars of ordinary mercantile establishments are taken away. Everything is done to break the spirit of those people. Yet we are asked to show that at a time a commission is undertaking to establish peace they are trying to pass this covenant, intended, as they claim, to prevent war, while a state of war actually exists in Ireland and in other countries, and at this very time they refuse to listen to the Irish people.

We are here to state to you, gentlemen, that if this league in its present form is consented to by the Senate, 200,000 men, according to their own statement—because I speak only by what they say—stand ready to-day before the world to bring America back to the ideals which it has always preserved.

Judge COHALAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I will now ask Mr. Michael J. Ryan, of Philadelphia, another one of the commissioners, to come forward and tell his experiences in Paris.

STATEMENT OF MR. MICHAEL J. RYAN.

Senator SWANSON. Mr. Ryan, before you begin, I think I should suggest to the other members of the committee that the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate has sent for us to come and make a quorum.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Why, we have the permission of the Senate to sit during the sessions of the Senate.

Senator SWANSON. Well, we can not break up a quorum.

Senator BRANDEGEE. We have permission to sit here.

Senator BORAH. Tell them to adjourn.

The CHAIRMAN. You may proceed, Mr. Ryan.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, I have been asked by the chairman of our conference to participate in a departure from our program upon which we agreed this morning. It was then contemplated that Mr. Walsh should speak, and then that the governor of New Hampshire and the lieutenant governor of Montana should be heard, and that the closing argument upon the legal propositions advanced by the committee should be made by Mr. Bourke Cockran, to whom I am sure it will be a delight for all of us to listen. I am asked merely to rise for a moment and give an experience. I understand that some of you have asked that those who visited Paris should make a little statement.

We reached Paris—Mr. Walsh, Gov. Dunne, and myself—on the 12th or 13th of April. We immediately sought an interview with the President of the United States. We joined in a letter which appears as the first communication signed by the three of us, addressed to the President, asking for an interview. We set forth the purpose of our coming, to wit, that safe conduct should be granted to Eamon de Valera, the president of the Irish republic, Arthur Griffith, and George Noble Count Plunkett to Paris from Dublin, so that they might present the cause of Ireland. We have set it forth on page 2 of the document that is now filed with each of you. Some days afterwards the President, through his secretary, caused a communication to be sent to Mr. Walsh, asking Mr. Walsh alone to visit him, which he did. We were then referred to Col. House, and our communications during my entire stay in Paris were with Col. House. I left Paris on the 24th of May, and I left when we learned the attitude, as will be discerned from the communication printed in the pamphlet to which I have heretofore referred, signed by Robert Lansing, in which he says:

"I regret to inform you that the American representatives feel that any further efforts on their part connected with this matter would be futile, and, therefore, unwise."

Col. House I had never seen, nor had I read much of him. I belong to the party, as Senator KNOX knows, of which President Wilson is the official head, and I confess that I was curious to meet the great Col. House. He undoubtedly treated us most splendidly, and he deserves all of the commendation given to him in respect to smoothness and velvetness of character, and I doubt whether we could at all find fault with the kindliness and courtesy extended to us by him.

I have listened to a summary of the proceedings of the peace conference, and I would confirm that from our knowledge of that which took place in Paris, with this detail. I think we were all three informed by the chairman of the subcommittee, to whom was theoretically allotted the preparation of the league of nations draft, that the perfected instrument was handed to him with instructions to present it within 10 minutes.

Senator FALL. Who was that?

Mr. RYAN. I would rather not now state. I shall probably inform you later on in the day after a conference with our people.

Senator FALL. We would like to know.

Mr. RYAN. I am sure you would. And the draft was read. There was no debate upon it. After its reading, the first man to interrupt was the representative from Japan, who stated that it had been his intention to present the question of race equality, but that he waived it for the time without withdrawing it, or without being misunderstood as asserting it. The representatives of Belgium arose and stated that they had hoped in view of Belgium's sufferings that Brussels would have been selected as the permanent place of meeting rather than Geneva. Some representatives of the South American Republics rose up, and then Chairman Clemenceau stated that there being no further objections, the league of nations was adopted. There was no roll call, and those of us who had heard of it, envied the skill with which it was handled and adopted, and we marveled at it all.

Senator BORAH. Is there any difference between the steam roller in Paris and in the United States?

Mr. RYAN. No; we regarded it with admiration. Some of us had had experience in Kansas City, in Chicago, and Philadelphia, and we thought that we had learned much in France which we might use profitably in America. At the last interview that I had together with my colleagues, with Col. House, the suggestion was made that we might present that which we had—our cause—to three of the American commissioners. We demurred. He then added that he would join in hearing us. We were jocular with him, and, as I say, everything was exceedingly pleasant. He was most courteous, and we suggested, and he joined in the suggestion, that it would be a great pleasure to listen to us upon the Irish question, that he could join three of his colleagues. There was a suggestion that we ought to have the President, and I am very positive that he said that the five commissioners had never met, the five American representatives had never met to consider any question. I mention these things hesitatingly, but at the urging of Judge Cohalan, with the thought that they might be makeweights in the scale, to show to you men the direct absence of consideration of the peoples pressing for hearings, who sought to be resurrected into nations.

The interview which you have ordered to be printed, which took place with the President after I had gone, showed some of the reasons moving the President for his conduct, because he there asserts that it was agreed that no hearings should be given to any representatives of any small nations without the consent of the entire big four. Of course, unanimous consent could not be obtained. You Senators heard the cause of Egypt presented yesterday. It was to me a sad spectacle to see 20 men, magnificent in their manhood—for, being somewhat undersized myself, I look with admiration upon a 6-footer—treated in such fashion by the Paris conference. Of those 20 magnificent specimens of Egyptian manhood the chairman alone did not speak English. All of the others spoke many tongues, and it is curious that at least two of them—and I think, perhaps, three—spoke Gaelic, although neither Mr. Walsh, Mr. Dunne, nor Mr. Ryan speak a word of Gaelic. These men have been students at various universities, and those of whom I speak specifically had studied medicine in Dublin. They were at Paris, gentlemen, able men, asking for a hearing, and a hearing was denied them.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Do I understand you to say that you were informed by the President that no hearings could be had of the smaller nations except by the unanimous consent of the Big Four?

Mr. RYAN. I was not present, but I read the interview, which you have given permission to print, and that statement there appears.

Senator BRANDEGEE. What I want to get at is this: Does this interview show whether the President stated whether he had made the request for unanimous consent that hearings be accorded them?

Mr. RYAN. I do not think so. I do not think he had made that request. In fact, I think you can see that from Mr. Lansing's letter, and upon the receipt of that letter I came to this country, believing that our hope lay more in America than in Paris. He writes——

Senator BRANDEGEE. Who writes?

Mr. RYAN. Robert Lansing. This is a letter addressed to Hon. Frank P. Walsh, and it appears on page 10 of the pamphlet to which I have heretofore referred. We addressed a letter to the President on May 22, 1919, asking that the communication which we inclosed be transmitted to Monsieur Clemenceau, president of the peace conference, which letter will be found on page 8 of the pamphlet heretofore referred to. I wish now to read the reply to that letter which is signed by Robert Lansing, and which appears, as I say, on page 10 of the pamphlet heretofore referred to. The letter is as follows:

AMERICAN COMMISSION TO NEGOTIATE PEACE,
Hotel de Crillon, Paris, May 24, 1919.

SIR: I have received the letter which you and Messrs. Dunne and Ryan addressed to me on May 16 regarding the issuing of safe conducts by the British Government to Eamon de Valera, Arthur Griffith, and George Noble Count Plunkett, in order that they may proceed from Ireland to France and return, and I immediately took steps to acquaint myself with the facts of the case, which transpired before the matter was brought to my attention by your above-mentioned letter.

I am informed that when the question of approaching the British authorities with a view to procuring the safe conducts in question was first considered, every effort was made in an informal way to bring you into friendly touch with the British representatives here, although owing to the nature of the case it was not possible to treat the matter officially. The British authorities having consented that you and your colleagues should visit England and Ireland although your passports were only good for France, every facility was given to you to make the journey. Before your return to Paris, however, reports were received of certain utterances made by you and your colleagues during your visit to Ireland. These utterances, whatever they may have been, gave, as I am informed, the deepest offense to those persons with whom you were seeking to deal and consequently it seemed useless to make any further effort in connection with the request which you desired to make. In view of the situation thus created, I regret to inform you that the American representatives feel that any further efforts on their part connected with this matter would be futile and therefore unwise.

I am, sir,
Your obedient servant, ROBERT LANSING.

In this correspondence you will find that my colleagues challenge the point that we had given utterance to any thought which gave offense to anyone. We went to Ireland at the request of the representatives of the Irish people and with the consent of Mr. Lloyd-George. Our passports were amended, mine and Mr. Walsh's, upon the application of the President of the United States. Gov. Dunne had the additional distinction, appearing in the record, of his passport having been amended upon the application of the President and Mr. Lloyd-George. Why this signal honor was given to him I do not know. Probably the typewriter slipped up on the other two.

Senator KNOX. Amended in what respect?

Mr. RYAN. In this respect: We made application when we went to Europe for France alone, for Paris. We did not contemplate a visit to Ireland. When we reached there suggestions were made to us of meetings and time was being lost, and in the meantime we were invited to go to Ireland. We then sought to have our passports changed, and they were changed forthwith, although the State Office said that such a thing had never happened, that it would take at least three weeks by cable to effect the change. Nevertheless, they were changed within an hour and a half and delivered to us; changed after that message had been received from the State Department. We did go to Ireland, and we saw the conditions detailed there. We visited all parts of Ireland.

At the request of the representatives of Lloyd-George, Gov. Dunne and I visited Belfast at the request of Sir William Wiseman, the liaison officer between the two Governments. We visited all parts of Ireland, and the conditions portrayed by our chairman are exactly as portrayed. They present to different minds, of course, different phases, but you have a people there united to a degress unparalleled in their history. I have been connected with the Irish movement during all of my life. There has never been such unanimity among the Irish people, and there has never been such a unanimous desire upon the part of the people of Ireland for their recognition by the people in the United States. I do not care what official place men may hold through whose veins flows Irish blood, when they seek to uphold this tyrannous production, then I say they fly in the face of the desires and the hopes of the Irish people. We are one in this matter as never before in our history. I never saw Ireland until I saw it in May of this year. They are a wondrous people, a kindly people, yearning, yearning for betterment. By every test that the President meted out, they have met the requirements. Under the forms of British law, 79 representatives are hostile to English rule out of an elected 101—79 out of 101—73 of these 79 were elected as ultrarepublicans, saying they would not sit in the British House of Commons if chosen, and upon that platform they were chosen. There was division among the people, because large masses of them who are what are called nationalists still believed there was no hope for a republic. Therefore they divided their vote. Men there say that upon a plebescite, the nation, four to one at least, would vote for an Irish republic. All Provinces in Ireland are as one. For 30 years, may I call to the attention of Senators, every one of the four Provinces in Ireland has been a nationalist Province.

For 30 years 17 out of the 33 representatives from Ulster have been nationalists. When men speak of this Ulster question and say that it indicates hostility to the aspirations of the rest of Ireland, they speak in ignorance of the history of Ulster. The best blood of Ulster, the people of Ulster, have been the radical revolutionists of Ireland. The united Irishmen who first proclaimed and sought the establishment of a republic—that movement was originated by the Ulster men, not Catholics, in 1792. The greatest name in Irish history, the one most loved, the one to whom the hearts of the people go out in greatest enthusiasm, was the founder of that organization, Theobald Wolfe Tone, the man who died in the rebellion of 1798 with the Ulster Protestants. And need I say to you that Robert Emmet was also a Protestant, though not an Ulster man? Those of you who walk along lower Broadway in New York City will see as you come up to Cortland Street, at St. Paul's Church, two great monuments, higher than from floor to ceiling of this room, one telling of the life of the brother of Robert Emmet, the brother who, fleeing from imprisonment, sought refuge in New York and became its attorney general and one of the leaders of the American bar.

The other is a monument of like character to Dr. McNevin, who rose to the head of American physicians in the early days of the nineteenth century. These men are typical of the long roll of Ulster men who fought and died for Ireland. Why, Senator KNOX, your Pittsburgh district is filled with the names of the Pattons and men of that character whose ancestors died in Ireland battling against British tyranny. They gave to Pennsylvania so many of its names, Colerain, Donegal, Tyrone, and Duncannon, all resplendent in its history. Those men brought these names to their new homes, and they helped to make that great American Commonwealth. They reached out away beyond the Alleghenies, and they peopled the West, and I doubt not the ancestors of many of you were of that glorious strain. There is no religious question in this Irish movement. Excepting O'Connell and Regnan, in the whole long line of Ireland's history, when we call the roll of her mighty men, there were only two or three Catholics. In the last 150 years, with Molineaux and Swift and Wood and Grattan and Emmet, and Archibald Hamilton, and Rowan and Curran, and John Mitchell and Parnell in our own day, the men who make up this splendid body of idealists, even though their writs run to no foot of land, these men have been animated by a holy hope for liberty. All three of us who went to Paris—Dunne, Ryan, and Walsh—were born in this country. All our interests are here. The dust of our fathers and the bones of our children are alike buried in America. We love America above all other nations; three of my household went into this war.

One of my kin is dead at Chateau-Thierry. I looked for his grave over there. The French Government conducted me and Gov. Dunne to find that grave. Our kin entered this war believing that the United States meant what it said, that the right of self-determination should be given to all peoples, and the Irish, no matter what their feelings were that no war should have been declared, when this Congress spoke they rallied to a man; they poured forth their blood and their treasure, whether from Massachusetts or Missouri or Pennsylvania or California. Wherever it might be, the Irish rallied to the cause of the Stars and Stripes; I beg of you Senators to exercise your rights and keep the pledged faith of America. Keep close to the living and to the dead, and save this Nation and save our sons from engaging in wars to which neither the conscience nor the Congress of the United States shall give its assent, by defeating this treaty. [Applause.]

Judge COHALAN. I have the pleasure of introducing Gov. Dunne, the third member of the commission that went to Paris, former governor of Illinois, former mayor of the city of Chicago.

STATEMENT OF HON. EDWARD F. DUNNE.

Mr. DUNNE. Senator LODGE and fellow Senators, I with my colleagues appreciate the great courtesy extended to ourselves and to those who will address you after I have concluded my brief statement, and I will not unduly trespass upon your most valuable time.

Permit me briefly to corroborate in general the statements made so eloquently, so forcefully, and so truthfully by Mr. Walsh and by Mr. Ryan. Let me tell you gentlemen why we went to Paris. We had read, as every American citizen has read, the aims and objects of the American Nation as expressed by its Chief Executive in entering this World War. We believed that the aims and objects so lucidly, so clearly, so forcefully stated by the President of the United States would, when that war was consummated, be carried out at the conference in Paris.

We, with millions of our fellow citizens in this country, expected that the Irish nation would not be made an exception among the weaker nations of the earth. We waited with patience and with confidence that at the conference in Paris the representatives selected by the American people would embody in the terms of the peace that was to be consummated there the aims and objects of the American people as expressed by its President. We waited until the 1st of February. We knew that in Paris the envoys of the Irish nation were knocking at the doors of the conference and asking a safe conduct for the duly elected representatives of the Irish people to Paris, so that they could present to this conference the claims of the Irish people to nationhood. So far as the papers of America were concerned, and so far as the papers of the world were concerned, the name of Ireland was not mentioned at that conference. We are citizens of America, who were born here, who love and admire this country, and believe in keeping its faith; we happen to have Irish blood in our veins, but all three of us, like Mr. Walsh, were born here, and we all feel alike about this country. Like Mr. Walsh, I was not identified in any way with Irish societies. For years and years before I was honored by that great convention with the appointment as one of its commissioners, I had devoted all my life to American citizenship solely, and had been honored by my fellow citizens as an American citizen. I love this country above all countries, as they do, and we would sink Ireland and every other country into the deep rather than sacrifice the interests of this country.

We met at that convention. I think it was the most extraordinary convention I ever attended. Over 5,000 people who felt as we did gathered from every State and Territory in the United States, and under the guidance and inspiration of that convention a committee of 25 were appointed for the purpose of assisting the Irish people before the American commission in Paris to obtain a hearing, and the right of Ireland, as determined by an election held in December, a month after the armistice was signed, under all the forms and securities of British law, in which it was determined by three-quarters of the Irish people, in round numbers, that an Irish republic was born, and a declaration of independence was issued such as the American people issued in 1776.

That committee of 25 honored Mr. Walsh, Mr. Ryan, and myself, asking us to become a commission of three to go to Paris, to appeal for what and to whom? To appeal to the representatives of the American Nation in Paris for the right of the Irish people to be heard in Paris along the lines enunciated by the President when he advised the American people to enter this world-wide war. Before we left Washington Mr. Walsh, in a letter to the Secretary of State, told the Secretary of State the object of our mission. It was avowedly political. It was avowedly for the purpose of enabling us to obtain a hearing for the Irish nation before the world peace conference. That letter is on file with the Secretary of State. After some delay passports were issued. I believe there was a protest from the British Government which delayed us 48 hours, but the Secretary of State granted the passports upon that letter.

The Secretary of State and the whole world knew, through the newspapers, the object of our mission, which was avowedly political.

We arrived at Paris. We were careful from the start to place the objects of our mission in writing and address it to the President first. The letter was addressed to the President and we were accorded a long interview, and I think I can characterize it as an unofficially sympathetic interview. The President referred us to Col. House. We had several interviews with Col. House, who treated us with extreme courtesy and acted with extreme diligence, but also unofficially.

I think Mr. Walsh interviewed every member of the American delegation. I personally interviewed every member but one, Secretary Lansing. We pointed out that we came as American citizens to address five American citizens in their official capacity as the representatives of the great American Republic, and all that we asked of the official representatives of the American Republic was to use their good offices officially to obtain for the duly elected representatives of the Irish people, elected under all the securities of British law, the right to plead their case before the tribunal in Paris. That was the sole object of our mission. Col. House acted with extreme diligence and courtesy, as my colleagues have told you. I think he interviewed Lloyd-George on the subject, and gave us to understand that he believed we were going to get for them that safe conduct.

The CHAIRMAN. Unofficially?

Mr. DUNNE. Unofficially, but told us that Lloyd-George—I suppose also unofficially—desired to meet the members of the delegation, and we believed that our cause was so impregnably just from the standpoint of American citizens that we could afford to meet and argue with Lloyd-George the justice of the Irish demand, and we consented to meet him at any day he might designate, and a day was designated to meet him. On the day designated it turned out, and I think truthfully, that owing to the exigencies of the situation in the preparation of the final draft of the peace conference and its presentation to the German representatives, Lloyd-George was unable to keep the appointment for the interview with us, and we were courteously so informed in the presence of Col. House, by Sir William Wiseman. It was then suggested, I do not know by whom, that as the safe conduct was not to be given promptly, and as the delegates of the Irish people were in Ireland and we were in Paris, it was impossible for us to confer with them, if they could not come to Paris, unless we could go to Ireland.

Thereupon, by prompt cooperation between the American officials, French officials, and British officials, we were given passports the next day which stated upon their face that our mission was diplomatic, and that we were going upon an unofficial political mission, and we avowedly stated that our desire was to communicate with the representatives of the Irish people and to become acquainted at first-hand with the situation in Ireland. There was no disguise about the object of our visit, and no restrictions or limitations of any character were imposed upon us either by the British premier or by the French authorities or by the American authorities, and we went to Ireland. And this is what we found there in Ireland, a component part of the British Empire, that the people of Ireland were without any of the British constitutional securities which are thrown around the citizens of those islands. We found that the habeas corpus was practically suspended, because of the restrictions thrown around it by the rulings of British courts, which made it an idle formality. We found the right of trial by jury suspended. Any man charged with political crime in Ireland could be tried only before a British court-martial, military authorities, or before a removable magistrate without a jury, these removable magistrates being appointed by the Crown, many of them from the police force, sent from Dublin and different districts in Ireland, removable overnight, earning salaries of $4,000 a year and amenable to the recall of the Government at any time.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Is there any appeal from the decisions of those military magistrates?

Mr. DUNNE. None that I know of. Men were arrested without warrant. We found that houses were searched without warrant and men when arrested were imprisoned in British jails or deported to English jails, and not informed what charges were made against them.

Senator BRANDEGEE. The previous speaker, Mr. Walsh, spoke of men being taken prisoners in this fight between the populace and the British constabulary. What sort of a trial did they get?

Mr. DUNNE. My information is that they got a trial before a court-martial or a removable magistrate. If a man in Ireland makes a speech in which he advocates the republic, he is immediately brought up. If he advocates or argues in favor of the recognition of the Irish republic, they take that man up before a court-martial or before a removable magistrate, who is paid $4,000 a year.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Under the British law it is a crime to advocate that, is it not?

Mr. DUNNE. Yes; notwithstanding the fact that 75 per cent of the people have gone to the polls openly and voted for that. We found that men's houses are searched without warrant; that men, women, and children are arrested without warrant and confined, at the pleasure of the Government, either in an Irish jail or deported to an English jail. A boy 11 years of age was arrested there and kept in jail for two months. No one knew where he was. Finally he was released when there was a threat of an investigation. That is the situation we found in Ireland.

The leaders of the Irish people—the men who were elected by their constituents to the British Parliament—refused to attend the British Parliament, and organized the Irish Parliament, the Dail Eireann. Many of them were in jail, not being able to attend the meetings of the Parliament, with the result, of course, that the sentiment of the people being so overwhelmingly with them that when they get them in jail they can not keep them there.

Robert Barton, owner of a landed estate—1,200 acres of the most beautiful country ever seen, with a manorial residence—an officer of the British Government, was compelled by the British authorities to take charge of Irish prisoners, and saw such indecencies committed that he resigned his office as a protest, becoming a republican, and was elected to the Dail Eireann. He made a speech during the campaign. He was arrested and placed in Mountjoy, remained there a couple of weeks, and then managed to saw a bar, left a very polite and humorous note, addressed to the governor of the jail, saying that he did not like his bill of fare or his sleeping accommodations, and would the governor of the jail be kind enough to send his clothes to the address given in Dublin. He was a man of such prominence and his case excited so much interest that an official investigation was ordered; and while the investigation was going on in the jail the deputy warden rushed in and said, "My God, there are 23 more of those fellows gone over the wall." That is the situation in Ireland.

Let me tell you of two little incidents that I witnessed with my own eyes. Three or four hundred soldiers under the command of British officers surrounded the Mansion House in Dublin, and three or four hundred policemen under official direction surrounded the Mansion House at half past 5 in the afternoon, for the sole purpose of preventing the Lord Mayor of Dublin from extending an official reception to the delegates from America. While we were attempting to get in, some guns were fired. There were a crowd of 20,000 or 30,000 people around the house, brought there by the mere fact that the military, with armored guns, were around the Mansion House. People were laughing at them and guying that ridiculous display of military force made for the sole purpose of preventing a social function tendered by the chief executive of the great city of Dublin to the three gentlemen who had come there from America.

A few hours before that the bedroom of the chief lady of Ireland was desecrated by the police, seeking as they claimed, some escaped prisoners. That is the situation which we found in Ireland.

Now, it is my judgment that if this treaty be confirmed by this body—and you are charged with the responsibility of approving or disregarding this treaty—if section 11 be approved you gentlemen will be acting as partners in the enforcement of that kind of law upon an unwilling people. We ask you to reject this treaty as American citizens, not because we are Irishmen, but because the Government over there as it now exists is an outrage upon constitutional government, because there is a situation to-day that rivals, if it does not exceed, the situation that prevailed years ago under the most tyrannical conditions of that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will take a recess now until 2 o'clock. We will hear the Greeks from 2 to 3, and then we will resume this hearing.

Whereupon, at 1 p. m. a recess was taken until 2 p. m.

AFTER RECESS.

The committee reconvened pursuant to the taking of the recess, at 2 o'clock p. m., Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE presiding.

The CHAIRMAN. I have here a protest against the views expressed in the morning session, signed by David W. Irvine, Henry Stewart, John Kennedy, Lieut. Lewis H. Shaw, Albert E. Kelley, William H. Cheney, and William Balfour. I told these gentlemen that we could not give them a hearing to-day, but I would give them a hearing next week. The gentleman who represented them said he desired to file this brief and have it published in our hearings.

Senator KNOX. It is a brief against what?

The CHAIRMAN. It is in opposition to what has been said here this morning. It will be printed at the conclusion of this hearing.

Senator KNOX. Mr. Chairman, I see no objection to including within our hearings everything that we hear, but does the chairman think that we ought to open the door for people to file briefs?

The CHAIRMAN. That authority was given when we started the hearings—that they would have a right to file briefs.

Senator KNOX. The first thing we know they will be filing books after a while. I think anyone who has anything to say ought to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. This relates to the hearing which we granted this morning. The other side has requested to be heard in this way.

Senator KNOX. I think we ought to hear them, if they are here.

The CHAIRMAN. We could not hear them to-day, and I thought it would save the time of the committee to permit them to put in a brief. We have done that on several occasions.

Senator NEW. The brief is in lieu of a hearing?

The CHAIRMAN. In lieu of a hearing; yes.

Senator KNOX. I do not want to insist, but it does seem to me that if they have anything to say that is worth hearing we would better hear them rather than give them an indefinite right to print, because that is what it amounts to.

The CHAIRMAN. I think we can control the right to print.

Senator KNOX. Perhaps we can.

The brief referred to will be found at the conclusion of to-day's proceedings.

The CHAIRMAN. Judge Cohalan, I will ask you to present your next speaker.

Judge COHALAN. Gentlemen, I have the pleasure now of presenting to you Lieut. Gov. W. W. McDowell, of Montana.

STATEMENT OF HON. W. W. M'DOWELL, LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR OF MONTANA.

Mr. MCDOWELL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, when I came to Washington from Montana on yesterday morning with the seven governors who were appointed to attend the governors' conference with the President and the Attorney General, I did not know I was to have the pleasure and the honor of appearing before this committee.

I have been told by the gentlemen having this movement in charge that I am expected to speak only a few minutes, and that they would like to have me refer to the reception given to President de Valera, president of the Irish Republic, when he came to Montana recently. As my time is very limited, I will devote it to that angle of the matter, as tending to show the sentiment of the people on the question now being considered by this committee.

I will state that as lieutenant governor of Montana my duty is to preside over the State senate, and as such presiding officer I am familiar with the action taken by the legislature in its last regular session held in January and February of this year, and also the action taken at the special session held a few weeks ago.

At the regular session of the legislature last winter a resolution was unanimously adopted, there being no dissenting vote in either the senate or the house, asking the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States to use their best endeavors to bring about the recognition of the independence of Ireland.

Before the special session of the Legislature of Montana met, President de Valera, of the Irish republic, came to Montana. I live in Butte, and as I was then acting governor it became my pleasure to welcome President de Valera to Montana and to extend to him the freedom of the State. The reception which he received there was the most enthusiastic and the most spontaneous reception that I have ever seen since I have lived in Montana during the past 24 years. Our little town has a population of only about 65,000 people, but there were at least 10,000 people at the depot to greet President de Valera when he got off the train. It was almost impossible for him to get through the crowd to get into the automobile which was waiting for him to go uptown. I had the pleasure and the honor of riding uptown with the president, and I noticed that there were more returned soldiers in uniform escorting that automobile uptown than I have ever seen in uniform in Butte before or since the war started. I saw a great many horny-handed sons of toil break through the line and rush up to the automobile to shake hands with the president of the Irish republic, and there were tears in their eyes. The procession that came up from the depot with him was at least a mile and a half long. Every musical organization that we could get together in the State was there, and the sentiment of the people of Butte and the people of Montana is undoubtedly very strong in favor of Irish independence.

At the special session of the legislature the matter of again passing a resolution came up a few weeks ago. This was after President de Valera had been invited by me as the president of the senate to make an address to a joint session of the legislature. He stayed over several days so as to make this address. Some little opposition developed among some people in the legislature against inviting him. However, he was unanimously invited to address the legislature, which he did. He was then introduced to the crowd that could not get into the legislative hall, waiting in front of the capitol, and he received the same kind of an ovation in Helena at two or three meetings that he had received in Butte.

Another resolution was introduced in the special session of the legislature asking the Senate of the United States and Congress to do what they could to bring about recognition of the Irish republic, and this matter was fought out on its merits, and finally passed both the house and the senate by a good majority. I mention this to show that, in my opinion, three-fourths of the people of Montana and of the States around Montana are thoroughly and heartily in sympathy with the movement for the freedom of Ireland.

Senator KNOX. May I ask you a question right here? It was represented to us this morning that the fate of the Irish republic depends upon whether or not we reject this proposed league of nations. Now, you say the sentiment in Montana is in favor of an Irish republic. How is the sentiment there on the question of the league of nations?

Mr. MCDOWELL. I believe the opinion in Montana and in the surrounding States is one of decided opposition to any clause in any treaty or in any league of nations that will in any way stand in the way of Ireland securing her freedom.

Senator KNOX. Then, if Mr. Walsh is correct in his statement this morning that to adopt this league at all would defeat the Irish republic, your judgment is that the sentiment of the people of Montana would be against the whole league?

Mr. MCDOWELL. I think I have expressed the opinion which I wish to express in what I said before.

Senator KNOX. All right; I will not press you further.

Senator FALL. Would you object to answering this question? Is it the opinion there that any article in this proposed league would possibly affect the freedom of Ireland?

Mr. MCDOWELL. I think that among practically all of the Irish in Montana they feel that it would. There are a great many other people in Montana and in the adjoining States who are not of Irish blood, who, I think, are in hearty sympathy with the aspirations of Ireland and would be opposed to any clause in any treaty that would stand in the way of Irish freedom.

Senator JOHNSON of California. One further question: Do you think guaranteeing the boundaries of the British Empire will affect the question concerning which you are speaking here and the question that we have before us to-day?

Mr. MCDOWELL. Senator, I have answered that question as far as I am prepared to answer it.

Senator JOHNSON of California. I wanted to be perfectly fair on the proposition and perfectly fair as to the position that you gentlemen take in respect to this matter.

Mr. MCDOWELL. I am approaching this matter from a somewhat different angle from that of a great many of the gentlemen who have spoken here this morning so eloquently on this matter. I am a Protestant. My ancestors came to this country 250 years ago, and I am thoroughly and heartily in favor of Irish freedom and in helping them to obtain it. I think the great majority of the people of Montana and the surrounding States feel the same way about it, regardless of whether they have any Irish blood or not, and they would be opposed to any clause in any treaty that would stand in the way of Ireland securing that independence.

Judge COHALAN. I wish next to present Mr. John A. Murphy, of Buffalo, N. Y., the fourth member of the American Commission on Irish Independence, who has recently come back from Paris.

STATEMENT OF MR. JOHN ARCHDEACON MURPHY.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman and Senators, in accordance with the request of the committee having in charge the American Commission on Irish Independence, I left on the 21st of June and reached Paris on the 30th of June. During the week while I was sailing the peace treaty had been signed, and the President and the presidential party had returned to America. The colleagues with whom I expected to fall in in the carrying on of the work, Messrs. Walsh and Dunne, had also returned from Paris, and I did not meet them in France.

It is needless to say that for a while the situation in France, as a stranger might sense it, was one of relaxation after the strain of the peace conference. It was one of an intense amount of gossip and whispers and reactions from the results of the peace conference.

During the most of the time I was there I was busily engaged in presenting the case of Ireland to the editors of the French papers and in endeavoring to obtain a presentation of it before Mr. Clemenceau, to whom it was stated the question of Ireland was referred in his capacity as president of the peace conference.

After being in Paris for about two or three weeks I became advised that before the President and Mr. Lansing left France they had been informed by Mr. Clemenceau in his capacity as president of the peace conference that no action would be taken upon the question of Ireland. That was material news and in my judgment it foreclosed any possibility that Ireland may have or might expect to have of prosecuting her cause before the league of nations.

On June 22 I wrote a letter in the name of the American Commission on Irish Independence to Mr. Clemenceau, and if you will permit me I will read the letter, or if you desire I will insert it in the record. It is on page 65 of the brown pamphlet.

The CHAIRMAN. The letter will be inserted in the record.

The letter is as follows:

[Personal and urgent.]

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
Paris, July 22, 1919.

M. GEORGES CLEMENCEAU,
President of the Peace Conference and Premier of France, Paris.

Monsier le PRESIDENT: We are in receipt of information from sources of high authorities that, as president of the peace conference, you have notified American peace plenipotentiaries that, so far as further consideration of the Irish question is concerned, the matter is one in which you will take no action.

We understand this decision covers:

1. That the resolution of the American Senate, officially forwarded to you by the American commission to negotiate peace, and the recommendations contained therein expressing sympathetic support to the people of Ireland in their efforts to obtain a government of their own choice, is, by this action, denied in a manner suggestive of your entire disregard of American public opinion as rendered in the deliberate resolution of our highest legislative body.

2. That the peace conference further ignores the request of the honorable Messrs. Walsh and Dunne for the appointment of an international tribunal to investigate into the charges of barbarities and inhuman conduct, in violation of the rules of civilized warfare, perpetrated by the British Government through its military forces in occupation of Ireland, and upon its defenseless people.

The knowledge of your decision in these matters has been up to now withheld from the American public. The results of the publication of this information will doubtless have very material weight at this time while the attention of the United States Senate is occupied in matters of international importance, in which we feel France has a material interest. Arrangements have already been made for giving widespread publicity in America to this decision on your part. But before taking this step, we respectfully suggest that an audience may be granted by you to the undersigned to present the importance of the situation, particularly in its relation to the future interests of France, of America, and of Great Britain.

There are 20,000,000 citizens of Irish blood in the United States, and the effect of this information when published there needs no characterization by us to indicate how grave may be the danger to the continuance of those same relations of amity and esteem that have marked the friendships existing between the French, American, and Irish peoples.

Trusting that I may be accorded the honor of this audience with you at your earliest possible convenience, and with assurance of high esteem and respect, we have the honor to remain,

Sincerely, yours,

AMERICAN COMMISSION ON IRISH INDEPENDENCE,
JOHN ARCHDEACON MURPHY,
Commissioner in Charge.

Mr. MURPHY. I was aware that the information I had received had not been made public in America, and that it was held under the veil of secrecy from publication by request of the American representatives. After the letter was delivered to Mr. Clemenceau, the information was conveyed back to me in circuitous fashion that if I were to make public the information that I had outlined in that letter to Mr. Clemenceau it would not be wise or judicious while I was a guest in Paris. Therefore I refrained from making it public until I returned to America; but it was known, not in one circle but in many, that there was an effort made to conceal from the American people and from the American Senate this action on the part of Clemenceau until they had, as it was hoped, passed favorably upon and ratified the league of nations.

Senator BRANDEGEE. You speak of this information as having been conveyed to you circuitously. Do you know from whom it originated?

Mr. MURPHY. You mean the information that it should not be published?

Senator BRANDEGEE. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. No; I can not say that of my own knowledge, except to say that one of the most important men who are accredited to have the ear of the French Government, the foreign editor of Le Temps, advised an associate and friend of mine, Mr. Erskine Chillers, a former major in the British Army, a man who has espoused the cause of the Irish republic in a wholehearted and unadulterated manner, and one of the best known publicists in England. The foreign editor of Le Temps conveyed this information to him, and I have reason to believe that that was an inspired message. I did not say that that was a message brought from Mr. Clemenceau, but Mr. Clemenceau and Mr. Tardieu were the only two who had knowledge of it unless they conveyed that knowledge to some one else.

Senator BRANDEGEE. What I wanted to know was, in your judgment, did that information represent the French opinion, or did it represent the desire of the American commission?

Mr. MURPHY. I construed it as representing the French request, in accordance with the action of the American commission.

Senator BRANDEGEE. That is all I care to ask.

Mr. MURPHY. There is one more incident that I would like to present to you, and then I will give way to others. I am not going to occupy your time with the delivery of any argument on this question. There is a short presentation of one phase of the question that, with your permission, I will ask to insert in the record later.

At, or about this time, by reason of family connections and business interests, I desired to visit England and Ireland. I made my request before Consul Reed, in the ordinary manner, for an amendment to my passport. My passport did not give me permission to proceed anywhere except to France, as it stated, to attend the peace conference in the interest of self-government for Ireland. I was told my request would have to be sent to Washington. After waiting two weeks on the pleasure of Washington, as they explained to me, I had called three or four times to ascertain if there was any reply to my request to amend my passport, and on August 8 I received the following letter:

UNITED STATES PASSPORT BUREAU,
Paris, August 8, 1919.

JOHN A. MURPHY, Esq.,
Grand Hotel, Paris.

SIR: Referring to your recent call at the passport bureau, you are informed that a telegram has been received from Washington instructing the bureau to refuse to amend your passport for Ireland.

There is inclosed herewith the amount of 0.80 franc in stamps, which represents the balance due you after the cable charges have been deducted from the sum of 100 francs which you deposited.

I am, sir,

Respectfully, yours,

E. C. REED, American Consul.

I felt surprised, Mr. Chairman and Senators, that in pursuit of my private business as an American citizen my Government should deny me the right to proceed to the British Isles. My request for a passport was not to go to Ireland. My request for a passport was to proceed to the British Isles. I had personally said that my purpose was not political; that I desired no exemptions from the laws of the land. I had desired to proceed there for family and personal reasons. Now, Mr. Chairman and Senators, on the other matter which I wish to present to the committee I wish to say that during a stay of about two months in Paris, where I met many of the editors of the French press and many of the public men of France, I have had opportunity to get a vision of the proposed league of nations somewhat different from that which would naturally otherwise have been given to me.

From my training and environment I have naturally paid most attention to the economic and industrial aspect of the treaty. The trouble with the treaty is that it is neither a treaty of vengeance nor a treaty of justice; it is calculated to maintain forever a commercial supremacy to one or two of the high contracting parties. I regret to say that America does not seem to be included as one of those parties.

The condition of France at the present time, as admitted to me in private conference by their thinking minds, is one of gravest import. Its finances are in a depleted condition; it has exercised its power of taxation so far as it is believed the people of France will endure, and still the income is more than a billion dollars below the absolute requirements of its budget, even with its army demobilized.

I spent some days driving over the devastated regions of northern France, and the paralysis of the country is appalling. The difficulties of obtaining raw materials and coal are greater than I can describe.

There has been no outlet for commercial development accorded to it by this present proposed treaty. Even the commercial advantages which have accrued to France from its old protectorate of the Christian people of the Orient is being imperiled by the British control in Mesopotamia and the Near East. Fifty-five per cent of the German indemnity which is supposed to be obtained by France is incomplete and uncertain reparation. Many eventualities may occur which would defer or avoid the payment of these indemnities, and neither France nor the world at large could ever be called to arms for the purpose of enforcing at the point of the sword payment which may or may not be beyond the will or the possibilities of the Central Powers to pay.

On the other hand, the question of sovereignty over subject people is understood in a more material way abroad than we generally understand it in America. It is understood as the right of commercial exploitation, and whether it be in the guise of mandatories for itself or its colonies, the British Empire has most successfully obtained the control of countries and people which are more than a commercial compensation for the losses endured even by the British Empire in the prosecution of war. I refer to the control that England now possesses, under the terms proposed by this treaty, of almost one-third of the earth's surface. I am not discussing the freedom of the seas for the minute. Gibraltar, Malta, Suez, Aden, and all the other strategic points held by England are solid answers in denial of the assertion that the freedom of the seas now exists.

This present treaty proposes to subject forever the sovereignty of Egypt, to condemn the oldest nation in the world to serfdom and to commercial exploitation; Asia Minor, Arabia, Persia, Afghanistan, Thibet, Burmah, India, form an unbroken chain in the interest of England to meet and to connect its links with the sphere of influence claimed, and by this treaty yielded to the Imperial Government of Japan.

Japan, whose losses in this war were of a negligible quantity, is to be confirmed in its control of Korea with its 20,000,000 of people, and to be accorded the control of Shantung, with its iron, and coal, and mineral resources, and its many millions of Chinese inhabitants, and which must be regarded as the commercial jugular vein of China; by it, and through its waterways and railways of the interior of China, will be acquired commercial and treaty advantages.

It is not necessary to more than glance at the map of Africa to see that from Cairo to the Cape it is to be dominated in the British interest.

I point out these things to you gentlemen to call your attention to the undying antagonism that exists between the principles upon which a Government like ours is founded, of the people and for the people, and the principles upon which an imperial government is founded, where the Crown is, if not the right divine, at least it is the center around which rallies in support the commercial, the military, and selfish oligarchies of privilege. All of this, which I believe you will admit as self-evident, is to my mind trained and aimed more especially against America than any other country in the world; it is asserted that our factories produce in eight months our domestic requirements, so that for four months of the year we are forced either to seek foreign markets or to shut down our factories. England well knows that it can not stop the fertility of our fields from producing cotton and corn and the necessaries of life in bounteous plenty; nor our mines in their production of raw material in practically unlimited quantities; nor can it fetter the energy and the power of American industrial and commercial development. It therefore seeks, under the specious title of a league of nations, to draw a wall of iron around the markets of the world, where, by a preferential imperial tariff, the products of our factories will be handicapped in their efforts to obtain a foreign market; where from time to time a slight concession here and there on their part may be looked upon and exploited as an act of generosity on their part toward their American cousins, and so through the aid of finance and intrigue an invisible British Empire may be superimposed upon the destinies of America.

We are asked to abdicate our sovereignty in favor of a sovereignty of a composite body in which we have but one vote as against six votes of the British Empire, and the six votes of the British Empire are but a small portion of its influence. It will be in a position to offer to every country in the world—France, Italy, Greece—special concessions and considerations for their vote on every question that arises wherein American interests might be circumscribed and impeded, regardless of principle or regardless of the eternal right in the controversy involved.

I have not attempted in these few words to enter into any discussion of the question from the Irish point of view, because I wanted it plain that my objections against this are American in the most intense and vital things. But I respectfully submit for your consideration that the question of Ireland is interminably involved in this whole scheme of operation. America is at the present time engaged in the development of a mercantile marine to make it independent of either the good will or capacity of any other power in delivering to foreign markets the products of our factories, and especially for our trade with Europe. Her ships must have a point of debarkation as well as embarkation. In other words, a line of mercantile marine without harbors in Europe would be short lived and unprofitable. The harbors of England are and will be insufficient for the British commerce; the harbors of Europe will be dominated and controlled in the interest of their respective governments. Ireland alone offers to America friendly, sufficient, and secure harbors for the termini of its mercantile marine in the European carrying trade. From these harbors by packet steamships may be made the quickest, the cheapest, and the best distribution in Europe of American goods and merchandise.

What the attitude of England would be to bar the development of Irish harbors in this connection was illustrated in 1913, when Europe was at peace. The White Star Line, at the instance of the British Government, discontinued Queenstown as a port of call. The Hamburg-American Line announced that it would make Queenstown a port of call, but before even one ship of that line made a call at Queenstown, the British Government, in pursuance of its policy of commercial isolation with which it has surrounded Ireland, informed the Imperial Government of Germany that making Queenstown a port of call would be considered by the British Government unfriendly, and it was undesirable.

I therefore submit for your consideration that the recognition of the Irish republic, the de jure government of Ireland, is not only right and desirable as reasoned by every standard of justice and of American ideals, but that America has an enlightened self-interest in the doing of this commendable act.

The brevity of the space allotted to me compels me to deal in conclusions rather than in a presentation of the premises and the logic of the case. But we are asked by this treaty to subscribe our fortunes and the lives of our children and their children's children to continuation in serfdom of hundreds of millions of human beings whom God has created in freedom and equality; we are asked to lock the door against ourselves as an American nation in our own commercial development, and while reservations and amendments may draw many of the fangs from this thing serpentine of iniquity, the American answer should be to kill it and in its place erect a true league of nations imbued with American ideals of justice and equality of opportunity for all; to lay these foundations securely and broadly and deeply, and from here in America to bring about a league of nations that shall be of all things just to the world and all its peoples, and shall also kill this threatened encirclement of American commerce that lies hidden but real in the terms of the proposed treaty you are now asked to sanction.

Peace can only come and endure as a result of justice, and until the fabric of this treaty is reconstructed and until the thought that controls its reconstruction becomes American in its democracy we must cease to be a people following our traditions, if we support it, and will be dragged down to the lowest levels of commercial greed.

For these reasons I submit that the defeat of the entire treaty is the most American thing, is the most humanitarian thing, is the most just thing, that can now be done.

Judge COHALAN. The last speaker before Mr. Bourke Cockran will be Mr. Daniel C. O'Flaherty, of Richmond, Va.

STATEMENT OF MR. DANIEL C. O'FLAHERTY.

Mr. O'FLAHERTY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in my opinion the matter which we are considering demonstrates the wisdom of the fathers when they created the Constitution of the United States. I do not believe in the history of our country a more momentous epoch has ever arisen than is now before you. It is the question of the ratification, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of a treaty that I think is more momentous in its consequences to the people of the world, and especially to the people of the United States, than anything that has ever come before the United States Senate. I speak to you, gentlemen, briefly, not as a politician but as a Democrat, as a Virginian, as a southerner, and, if I may say so, as a Protestant and a Mason. Some people have said to me, and I have been told, even out in the hall here to-day, that this is a religious question. I say to you that it is not a religious question, it is not a political question, but it is a question which every American citizen has a right to take into consideration. I repeat that since the day when the Liberty Bell rang in old Philadelphia, proclaiming the Declaration of Independence, no more important matter has even been considered by the people of this country. I have not time to go into it in the way of an argument, and after what has been said here to-day it is not necessary to argue it to such distinguished men, constitutional lawyers, but I believe that the ratification of this treaty, with articles 10 and 11 and with the other articles that follow along after them, would not make the world safe for democracy, but it would make it safe for hypocrisy. [Applause.]

What is a treaty? It is a contract between nations, and everything that is put in it is put in for somebody's benefit. What is article 10 put in there for? Is it for the benefit of the United States? We do not need it. For whose benefit is it to retain the integrity, for instance, of the British Empire? Somebody says, "Well, how does it do it?" Let us take an illustration. Suppose Canada or Ireland should desire to be free. Suppose Egypt should become free by the volition of England and England should try to help Canada or Ireland. With whom would we go? We should have to fight against Canada in favor of England. Is not that true? I say as a lawyer that in my humble opinion articles 10 and 11 of this treaty bind Ireland and every other nation that is under the hoof of England hand and foot to the cross.

Why should we not speak out? I say to you, gentlemen, in my opinion if we do not speak out at this awful moment the very stones in the street should cry out for us.

I do not claim to speak for all the people of Virginia. I am glad to say that you have on this committee one of our most distinguished sons, who has his own opinion on this subject and I may differ with him, but we have the right to come and be heard, and I come to you to-day as a Virginian, as a southerner, as an Irishman, as an Irish-American, as a descendant of Irish ancestors back for a thousand years. But I am first an American, and I believe that some of these articles are the greatest blow that has ever been aimed at the American Constitution. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I come to you to bear to you a message from a mass meeting held in Richmond the other day, the capital of Virginia, the capital of the old Confederacy, if you please, the home State of our distinguished President. It passed this resolution unanimously.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Was it a large mass meeting?

Mr. O'FLAHERTY. Four thousand people, a large mass meeting for a city of our size, and not a dissenting voice. It unanimously adopted these resolutions:

"Resolved, That we declare ourselves unreservedly in favor of the independence of Ireland, and demand that our Government recognize the Irish republic; and

"Resolved, That we register our opposition to any proposed league of nations which does not protect all American rights and ideals and which binds us to guarantee the territorial integrity of the British and Japanese Empires."

This resolution was adopted at a meeting at which the mayor of the city presided, and to which his excellency the governor gave the honor of his presence. I believe that if a plebiscite of the people of Virginia were taken without a word of discussion to-day you would find that the majority of them would be in favor of the freedom of Ireland. [Applause.] And I am sure that if you were to go before them and tell them what is being done and tell the truth of the matter they would be still more greatly in favor of it.

Gentleman, I have been in a quandary. It is not my desire to embarrass the administration. I believe in that great Virginian who is the President of the United States, Mr. Wilson, but I believe that any league of nations which perpetuates the British Empire in its present condition, in which portions of that empire are in perpetual thraldom, is un-American, unfair, and will never be ratified by the will and the wishes of the American people. I believe I would be unfair to myself as an American, untrue to the teachings of the great Virginia patriots who did so much to establish this Republic, if I did not raise my voice at least against articles 10 and 11, especially, of the proposed league of nations, which, in my view, rivet the bands that bind Ireland to England, and would compel us to assist England in keeping Ireland in perpetual thraldom. I trust in the wisdom of this committee. I say reverently that I thank God that unto men like these was committed by the fathers the keeping of the ark of the covenant of this Constitution; that we may be saved—I hope I am not speaking like a school boy—that we may be saved from the rocks ahead of us; that we remember what George Washington said when he warned us to keep out of entangling alliances. Why, this is a cobweb of such a character that the mind of no human being can fathom where we will go under it. So I hope that this committee will safeguard the rights of Ireland, that ancient nation, so that she may take her place among the nations of the earth. She is a nation; she has been a nation; she has every element of a nation, the geography, the ethnology, the soil, the climate, everything that goes to make up a nation. Why under heaven should Ireland, the oldest of all the white nations on earth, be the only one that is denied her freedom? [Applause.]

A favorite objection of those who are opposed to the independence of Ireland is what they glibly call the "Ulster question." Along with this is also the other oft-repeated statement that Irishmen can't agree among themselves. The last and only election ever held in Ireland in which the question of self-determination was in issue was in December, 1918, in which outside of Ulster, which is only about one-fifth of Ireland, not a single constituency, except a gerrymandered one in Dublin, was carried by the Unionists. So you have the greatest unanimity in four-fifths of Ireland for a republic.

It is true that in Ulster the Irish do not agree on this political question, or rather those who claim not to be Irish do not agree. Without discussing the fact that we never agreed upon any political issue in our own country, and that at the time of the formation of our own Republic there were many Tories, none Irish, however, and we very often fail to agree and it is preferable that we should not always agree.

It is quite interesting to analyze the Ulster situation from an impartial standpoint, taking the vote of December, 1918, as a basis. I say an impartial standpoint, because the writer of this article belongs religiously to the faction that claims to be in the majority in Ulster and that is opposed to the independence of Ireland, but is one who does not share that view. I, as a Protestant, a Mason, and one with other than Irish blood in my veins, can not be accused of being partial to the Catholic Irish, and certainly can see the facts and analyze them freely from the point of the Ulster people, if it is a religious question.

The chief opponent, as is well known, of this Ulster bugaboo is Mr. Carson, who himself until recently has never represented a constituency in Ireland, but who attempts to speak for the Province of Ulster, and his ideas have been widely disseminated through the English press as those which should be accepted by the outside world.

Ulster consists of nine counties—Donegal, Londonderry, Antrim, Tyrone, Down, Fermanagh, Monaghan, Caven, and Armagh. These nine counties in the election which was held for Parliament in 1918 were entitled to 25 seats. Out of these the Sinn Feiners carried 10; the Irish party which was not with the Sinn Feiners but opposed to the Unionists carried 4; so that the Carsonites or Unionists only carried 11, or a minority in Ulster. Four of these 11 seats were accredited to Antrim, in which the city of Belfast is situated, and all of these representatives are Unionists. So that outside of the county in which Belfast is situated were only 8 Unionist representatives elected in the whole of Ireland, the 7 outside of Antrim and the 1 in the gerrymandered district near Dublin, as against 73 Sinn Feiners and 6 of the Irish Party and 6 Nationalists. Since that election, just about a month ago, one of the constituents in Antrim was captured by the Sinn Feiners in a by-election, showing the tremendous change in the sentiment in the only stronghold that the Unionists had, and this is the election at which Mr. Carson said that if he didn't carry he would resign, which, of course, was nothing but a bluff, for he is simply the agent of the English Government, and is not likely to resign his job so long as he can hold it. The majority for the Unionists in those constituencies last December averaged about 6,000.

These are the cold facts in the case, which are verified by the official reports which I have before me as to the election of 1918. We then have a minority of a small section of the country, less than one-fifth of it, asking that the will of the people of a great country in which a million votes were cast be heard as against the rights of the many.

Belfast in the last election cast about 79,000 votes for the union and 39,000 for the independence. By some sanctity unknown to Americans this 40,000 majority, who claim they are not Irish but Scotch-Irish, claim that they ought to rule over a million Irish who are not only not ashamed to be called Irish but glory in the distinction. When, therefore, you hear anyone repeat the statement that Ireland can not agree as to what she wants, simply recall these facts and ask yourself if such "twaddle" should receive any consideration at the hands of the Americans who believe in majority rule.

But rest assured that the epitaph of Robert Emmet, a Protestant Irishman, will be written some day, and monuments will be erected to others without regard to religion or creed, but simply because they were friends of Irish freedom; and, further, that if England's fleet was thrice as great and her gold as many times more potent in disseminating false propaganda, the Irish republic will live.

It is thus seen that the only people of Ireland who can not agree among themselves are the Irishmen of Ulster, and even here many have said that the will of the rest of Ireland should prevail.

The fact is that many of the people of Antrim, and especially Belfast, are not Irish, but are Scotch, or, as they are sometimes erroneously called, Scotch-Irish, whatever that means, for that term is a much-abused one and ignorantly used, for as a matter of fact there is no such race as Scotch-Irish.

The remedy would seem to be for these people as Scotch or English who feel that they do not want to be ruled by the majority of the people of the country to take a boat and sail across to Glasgow, which is just a few hours' ride, and let the great mass of people who dwell in Ireland conduct the affairs of the country to suit themselves. Belfast is nothing more than a mushroom manufacturing town, which might succeed as well in building ships and making linen in Glasgow as on the other side of the Irish Sea. As well might the cities of Norfolk, Portsmouth, and Newport News, which constitute about the same proportion to the State of Virginia, say that "we won't play with you at all because we don't like you in other respects and therefore we are not going to submit to the majority of the people of Virginia." In other words, if you should move the shipyards from Belfast, which 40 years ago had a population of less than 50,000, to the Clyde or the Firth, you would get rid of the Ulster question and remove the only argument that England has. But luckily this ancient nation has never recognized, and never will as long as the blood of the Gae flows through Irish veins, the government of England maintained at Dublin Castle by force of arms, fraud, and bribery.

Another argument which is highly esteemed by these self-styled "better-than-thou" Irishmen is that "while we have not the population we have the wealth and intelligence." The facts in the case as to this canard are even stronger than as to the question of the majority in Ulster.

Leinster, in which the city of Dublin is situated, is a much wealthier province than Ulster. The city of Dublin, with her population which is really about the same as Belfast, is assessed with property of the value of over £11,000,000, or Dublin is assessed about twice as much as Belfast. Dublin pays an income tax of about £200,000. The whole of Leinster, taken together, is much wealthier than Ulster, whose wealth is the lowest, except Connaught, which is in the extreme western part of Ireland and much of its territory is a wild and rocky broken sea country, which is not susceptible of cultivation or development.

But, say these same objectors, Ulster is Protestant and the rest of Ireland is Catholic, and therefore the majority should not rule. That is democracy with a reservation which American people can not understand, for it announces that if the majority in Ulster are Protestants they should rule; if Catholic they should not. Quoting, however, from the religious census in the nine counties of Ulster, there are 690,134 Catholics, 451,566 Presbyterians, 48,490 Methodists, and other scattered religious denominations. The self-constituted guardians of this part of Ireland are always talking of taking care of these Presbyterians. This is wasted sympathy, for in the history of Ireland's fight for independence since the days of Hugh O'Neill down to the present time the majority of the men who have fought for Ireland's independence have been of these same Irish Presbyterians, or Protestant. Wolfe Tone, Lord Edward Fitzgerald O'Connor, and Emmet were all Irish Presbyterians. John Mitchel, John Philpot Curran, and many other leaders were Protestants.

The only leaders that Ireland has had for generations who were Catholics were Daniel O'Connell and Redmond, and it was O'Connell's fight that won for both the Catholics and Presbyterians the right of suffrage. The great emancipation bill which freed the Catholics freed the Presbyterians, for in the days of O'Connell no one but the Church of England could vote or hold office, and the so-called Irish Parliament, which voted to destroy Ireland and carried the Union, was a Church of England body, with not a single Catholic in it. What, then, becomes of the foolish statement by men who are otherwise usually intelligent that Ireland's fight for independence and throwing off of the British yoke has been a religious one? In the past 50 years and prior to the Easter rebellion many Irish Protestants, for political offenses, have been hanged, drawn and quartered, and dogs have lapped their blood in the streets of Dublin.

In Ireland's glorious future these names will not be forgotten; though they are not heroes in the sight of Sir Edward Carson or Bonar Law, they will in future generations be revered as men who would not hug the chains that bound them nor kiss the feet that trampled upon them, content to be slaves if they could but eat and drink, for such a condition is natural asphyxia, in which the breathing "of the great dumb, stupid animal alone gives evidence that it lives at all."

It was a religious question in a sense at one time, to give help to Protestants and Catholics alike, the right of suffrage, without which men are but slaves, and this was carried by Irish Catholics and Irish Presbyterians, and the fight is being fought out by the Irish, not only in Ireland but in America and in Canada and in Australia and in New Zealand and in South Africa, by the friends of Irish freedom, not as a religious question but as a question of right, and the tide of public opinion of the world is such that no man, no group of men, or no one nation can stop it.

As I have said on a former occasion, "Tell me what is the unseen and mystic law that claims the fidelity of the compass and keeps it ever pointing to the polar star. Tell me this, and I will tell you why Irishmen, whether they come from the golden vale of Tipperary or the picturesque hills of Connemara, whether smiling in the sunshine of prosperity or groaning under the load of adversity, are drawn to the Prince of Connla of the Golden Hair, to

"That sunny land
From druids and demons free,
The land of rest,
In the golden west,
On the verge of the azure sea."

Some ask me the question, "What can Ireland do?" I reply, "What can England do?" She has reached the point where she must respect the wishes of over 4,000,000 people in Ireland or shoot them down with machine guns or starve them in prison. Does she dare do it? Can there be any doubt of the outcome? Germany tried it on Belgium, and England will tread the same path as Germany if she persists in her course. Not only has England to respect the wishes of Ireland, but she now fully understands, I hope, what she did not in 1776, that a decent respect for the opinions of mankind bids her halt.

It is no longer a fight between Ireland and England, but a fight between England and the enlightened opinion of mankind, and she is fast learning that the world will no longer let her hide behind the false cry of protection for Ulster.

Senator MOSES. Mr. O'Flaherty, I want to ask you a question or two. You stated that in your opinion a plebiscite taken in Virginia would show a vote of 4 to 1 in favor of the freedom of Ireland.

Mr. O'FLAHERTY. No; I did not say that. I said a majority. Did I say 4 to 1?

Senator MOSES. I so understood you.

Mr. O'FLAHERTY. I did not mean to say that.

Senator MOSES. A majority of the people of Virginia would favor the freedom of Ireland and would so express themselves?

Mr. O'FLAHERTY. I said they would if there was a plebiscite. I believe they would so declare themselves. I have never seen a Virginian yet that was not in favor of freedom, and especially the freedom of Ireland.

Senator MOSES. What attitude do you think they would take in Virginia on a plebiscite on the league of nations?

Mr. O'FLAHERTY. I would not want to answer that. If you would come around and ask me as a lawyer, I would not want to answer that.

STATEMENT OF MR. W. BOURKE COCKRAN.

Judge DANIEL F. COHALAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire now to present the last speaker of the hearing. I want to say, first, a word of thanks, and to reserve the right for filing statements, which you gave some time ago, from a great many people from different parts of the country. I shall not take up further time now, except to present one of the foremost men of the country and of the Irish race, a scholar, a student of affairs, a statesman, and an orator, Hon. William Bourke Cockran, of New York.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman and Senators, I would like to begin by answering some questions that were propounded this morning to gentlemen who appeared here in opposition to this proposed league of nations. One of the most important was that of Senator BORAH, who asked if it were true, as some gentlemen have contended on the floor of the Senate, that if this league of nations be established it would prove a very effective agency through which Ireland could obtain her independence. I take it that Senator BRANDEGEE's question was put in amplification of Senator BORAH's inquiry, because he said Senator WALSH made practically the same statement in the course of debate.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I did ask such a question; but I did not know that Senator BORAH had previously asked it.

Mr. W. BOURKE COCKRAN. I shall, therefore, answer both Senators together. I think that Senator WALSH supplied the answer to his own contention most effectively. He said, as I recollect, that there were three means by which a subject nation could effect its independence. One was by consent of the governing nation, another was by revolt of the subject people themselves, the third was by outside intervention, and he claimed great credit for the proposed league of nations, because it prohibited but one of those methods of relief, leaving the other two open and available. The objection to this position is that no nation ever did achieve its independence by consent of the dominant power, or by naked action of its own people. Every successful revolution of which I have any knowledge was effected through outside support. The American Colonies would not have been free but for the intervention of France. Cuba would still be under the domination of Spain but for the intervention of this country, and Greece would still be languishing under the heel of the Turk if it had not been for the assistance of Christendom. So that when Senator WALSH says that by this treaty subject nations are deprived of but one avenue of escape from servitude, the answer is that they are deprived of the only one through which escape can be effected.

There is another question which Senator BRANDEGEE asked that I think ought to be answered. He inquired whether appeals are allowed from decisions by a single official committing Irish men and women to jail for long periods. At this time Ireland is practically under martial law—which means no law at all—or what is virtually its equivalent, "The defense of the realm" act. Everybody understands that martial law is suspension of law, substituting for law which is a regular fixed rule of conduct, the whim or judgment of a single official. In Ireland, under the present system, the people are governed by two whims, either one of which constitutes the rule of conduct for the population. One is the whim of the commanding military officer, and the other is the whim of an official called a resident magistrate, apparently for the reason that he is never a resident of the locality in which he officiates. The expression, "R. M.," officially intended to signify resident magistrate, will describe him much more correctly as "removable magistrate." He is the only magistrate under the whole British system who is removable at the pleasure of the Crown. I need not remind the chairman of this body that the chief fruit gained by the revolution of 1688 was termination of the system under which judges were removable by the Crown, and under which they were, in the language of Lord Macaulay, not champions of truth and justice, but "greedy and ferocious butchers," eager to satisfy every demand of despotism.

The removable magistrate always dreads removal, and the only way to avoid it is by delivering the judgment which the prosecuting officers desire. The effect is that if a man makes a speech, as Mr. WALSH told you, advocating the Republic—nay, if he utter a word which the police dislike—he is promptly haled before either a drumhead court-martial or one of these resident magistrates and condemned without any chance of appeal to the hideous indignities which have been described so forcibly here to-day. Nothing could illustrate more strikingly the conditions against which Irishmen are in revolt than this deliberate establishment in Ireland by the English Government of a judicial system so fruitful of abuse that Englishmen themselves rose in revolution to drive it from their own country.

When conditions somewhat similar, though I do not think they were quite so onerous, existed in Cuba, the chairman of this committee, and I think many others of its members, were quick to insist that intervention to stop those outrages became a task imposed upon us by our primacy of civilization; that continuance of a government which had become perverted from its natural functions of defending peace and order to perpetrating the very outrages on justice which government is organized to prevent, was an injury to civilization which all the forces of civilization should combine to remove. And we, as chief among those forces, drew the sword and ended that abominable system in Cuba. A worse system exists to-day in Ireland. It can be terminated, as far as we can see now, by no means except the influence of this American Republic, and we are here to protest against any treaty, league of nations, or whatever it may be called, that will exclude consideration of the monstrous conditions that afflict Ireland from the jurisdicton of the conscience of civilization, of which the Senate of the United States has always been the foremost and best exponent.

I pause for a moment to say that if there be any other Senator who wishes to ask me about present conditions in Ireland I will be very glad to answer him. If nobody cares to put a question, I shall proceed to discuss the treaty now before you purely from an American standpoint.

Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen who preceded me have all said, with great force and feeling, that while they are of the Irish race they are of American birth, and that they love above all other things the country in which they were born. I am an Irishman by birth as well as by blood. And the reason I am here is that I do not want the Government whose shelter from my earliest youth I was resolved to seek, whose benefits I have enjoyed, to be emasculated, impaired, or destroyed, as I believe it will be, if this treaty is ratified. And in saying this I speak not alone for myself—my race is well-nigh run—but for my entire generation and the generations that are to follow. The light that inspired me and millions like me to cross the seas I hope the Senate will not suffer to be extinguished, but that through your action now it will be maintained strong and effulgent for all the children of men throughout the world.

Mr. Chairman, whether the right of this country to interfere—at least so far as to exert its moral influence—for deliverance of Ireland from conditions that are a scandal to civilization shall be preserved or whether it is to be renounced and destroyed by ratification of this treaty, is not an Irish question. It is not a question affecting solely England's domestic politics, as some gentlemen have contended. It is an international question, because it is a question affecting the peace, and, therefore, the welfare of the entire world. Judge Cohalan has told you there can be no peace throughout the world until Irish discontent is composed. This is not, as many might say, a mere expression of exaggerated rhetoric. It is the sober, accurate statement of a fact which all history attests.

It is certainly one fact of history which none can dispute that every great war which became general—every one became general by England's entrance into it—and which has scourged the world for the last four centuries—that is to say, since the emergence of modern civilization from the wreck of feudalism—has had its beginning in Ireland—every one, without exception.

This last war which has just closed we all know was caused by the German Emperor's belief that civil commotions in Ireland made 1914 the period when he could strike his long-meditated blow for world dominion with the strongest hope of success. The great wars of the French Revolution, which culminated in the Napoleonic wars, began with representations of the united Irishmen through Wolfe Tone to the revolutionary government in France that the conditions then prevailing in Ireland—brought about by the deliberate recall of Lord Fitzwilliam and the refusal of concessions which had been promised to the Irish people—had made the land ripe for rebellion. The hostile manifestations by the French people and their Government which these representations provoked, were the chief causes that led Pitt reluctantly to join the alliance against France. The attempt of Hoche's expedition to land in Ireland, which was frustrated when his ships were blown by a gale out of Bantry Bay in 1796, marked the real beginning of that desperate struggle between England and France, which after ravaging Europe for a generation ended at Waterloo. At the close of the seventeenth century it was the intervention of Louis XIV in aid of the Irish attempt to maintain James II in possession of his crown which brought about the Grand Alliance against him, that afterwards, as the War of the Spanish Succession, plunged Europe in the disastrous conflict that was settled by the peace of Utrecht. The great war between Elizabeth and Philip II of Spain for control of the seas began with a descent of Spanish and Portugese soldiers on the coast of Kerry, who were all killed to a man after they had surrendered to Sir Walter Raleigh, and whose massacre is the only cloud on the fame of that knightliest figure among Elizabethan warriors.

Why is it that every world war, if not actually caused by Irish discontent, has yet made Ireland the theater of its first beginnings? This can not be due to a mere fortuitous combination of circumstances. My purpose is to show that the condition of Ireland has been a constant invitation to every country with a grievance against England to strike her at that spot where she was believed to be vulnerable, and where she will continue to be vulnerable just so long as the oppressions against which the Irish people have struggled for eight centuries are suffered to exist. So that the Irish question is not a matter that affects England and Ireland alone, and one which therefore can be called domestic. It is one that has affected the peace of the world for four centuries and which will continue to affect it, in the very nature of things, so long as it is permitted to remain an open sore in the side of Christendom. To compose this difficulty and settle it is a task imposed upon the statesmanship of civilization, and, therefore, it rests peculiarly on your shoulders, Senators, charged as you are at this moment with responsibility for the conditions under which peace is to be reestablished throughout the civilized world.

Probably the greatest difficulty in dealing with the Irish question is to understand just what it is. It has been so misrepresented—and by the greatest masters of ingenuity in misrepresentation that the world has ever seen—that many men, ordinarily well informed, are in doubt as to just what it is that causes the Irish complaints. We are told that other countries have been conquered as Ireland has been, and yet they have long since ceased to complain of the conquest or even to think about it. We are told that Irish grievances are fanciful, not real; that they are not caused by injuries which are actual, but by recollection of ancient injuries springing from laws which have long since been repealed. We are told that Ulster is prosperous and contented while the rest of Ireland is discontented and poor because its people are improvident, shiftless, idle; and that this demand for Irish independence merely embodies, while it disguises, the desire of an improvident, shiftless, idle majority to obtain and abuse the power of taxation over a thrifty and prosperous Irish minority.

It is also said that there is a religious question involved; that Ireland's refusal to acknowledge the authority of England is but the intolerance entertained by one religious sect against another—the disposition of Catholics to oppress and drive Protestants from the country. These, I think, are all the grounds on which are based opposition to recognition of the Irish republic. They are set forth in a brief submitted to this committee by certain persons claiming to speak for Irish Unionists, which I have just been permitted to read. Now, if these statements are true, if Ireland has been reduced to its present condition by the faults or vices of her own people, sympathy for them would be useless. They are incapable of improvement. They must inevitably disappear from the earth which they encumber and discredit. But if the evils which afflict the Irish people be the direct result of laws which have produced intolerable conditions, that still exist, although the laws themselves have been repealed, and if it be true that England has shown she is incapable of doing justice in Ireland, even when a majority of the English people are really anxious that it should be done, and the English Parliament solemnly resolved to do it, then there can be but one outcome. Either English rule in Ireland must be ended or the Irish people must be exterminated. That is the alternative. I think it is entirely capable of demonstration that the Irish people can not be exterminated, and extermination being impossible emancipation is imperative.

Let me explain to you why it is that although these oppressive laws have all been repealed the conditions they produced still continue. All the history of Ireland ever since the first Norman invasion has been an unbroken record of conquests and seizures of lands—first the devastation of land, always followed by confiscation. But neither conquests not confiscation sufficed to keep the country permanently impoverished. From the first landing of Strongbow, in 1172, down to the final overthrow of Irish independence by William III, the Irish people after each invasion and devastation restored prosperity with a celerity and completeness that have been marvels to all historians.

Mountjoy, under Elizabeth, reported to the Queen that everything capable of supporting life in Ireland had been burned to the roots, that the whole Irish population had been exterminated, except a few fugitives who had taken refuge in morasses where they could not be reached, but where, for lack of food, they must inevitably starve. And yet in the very next reign Ireland was blooming like a garden. In the time of Charles I the prosperity of Ireland had already awakened the envy and cupidity of Englishmen; but the Irish, with that peculiar sense of loyalty which is one of their characteristics—often misdirected because carried to excess—having embraced the side of the King, fell under the vengeance of Cromwell. Again the island was devastated with fire and sword. The whole of the land east of the Shannon was confiscated. The entire native population outside of many thousands who were slain, and other thousands sold into captivity, was transported west of the Shannon to a soil which was believed to be so sterile that it could not afford subsistence to human life. Cromwell's brief statement of his policy was that the Irish must go "to hell or to Connaught." Well, they went to Connaught, but they did not go to hell [laughter], because there was always one Irish champion whom, some way or other, the British arms could never overcome, and that was the Irish girl. Any Englishman who received land and settled upon it soon fell under her influence. That was already so clearly apparent in the time of Richard II that he passed the statute of Kilkenny forbidding any Englishman who had received land in Ireland from marrying an Irish woman. But the Irish girl was too strong for statutes. She continued to marry the English settler in the teeth of all prohibitions, and the offspring of those marriages were the strongest Irish patriots.

Although the land had been laid waste with a fury hardly ever paralleled in the annals of mankind by the English Parliamentary forces, first under Cromwell and after him under Ireton and Ludlow, yet when William III in the next generation faced a patriot Irish army, a large part of it was composed of the sons of those Ironsides to whom Cromwell granted land in Ireland. After that dreadful Cromwellian devastation the recovery of her prosperity by Ireland in the reign of Charles II is declared by Macaulay to be the marvel of all history. It is acknowledged even by Froude—who will not be suspected of any partiality toward Ireland—that in the reign of Charles II practically the entire transportation of goods by sea from the Old World to the New was carried on in Irish bottoms. Irish cattle and horses commanded the highest prices in English markets, and Irish woolen products were considered to be the very finest in the world.

Almost immediately after his accession this king for whose father Ireland had incurred the resentment and fury of Cromwell, yielding to representations by merchants of Bristol, excluded Ireland from the operation of the navigation act. The effect of this was a total destruction of the Irish shipping trade, from which it has never recovered. Next, in obedience to a demand of English agricultural interests, exportation of Irish cattle and horses to England was prohibited. That reduced property in live stock to one-tenth of its former value. But the woolen industry remained, and probably from the fact that the energies of the country were now mainly directed to it, and the whole capital of the nation largely absorbed in it, the manufacture of Irish cloth expanded to a degree unapproached in any other country of the world.

But when William III finally established his authority by the victories of Aughrim and the Boyne, and by his treason at Limerick, the surrender of which he accepted on terms that permitted the garrison to march out of the city and the country, while at the same time guaranteeing to the Irish people the right to practice their faith, prosecute their trade, and retain their property—a treaty that was violated the moment the Irish army had departed from Ireland—then the system was adopted which Edmund Burke has described in words probably familiar to every one of you. He said the Irish penal code was "as well fitted for the oppression, impoverishment, and degradation of a feeble people and the debasement in them of human nature as has ever proceeded from the perverted ingenuity of man." That system produced the conditions which to-day afflict and distress the Irish people and which can be ended only by ending the dominion of England over the country.

After all former confiscations and devastations the country recovered rapidly because the people were allowed to resume possession of the land. But the devilishly ingenious system adopted by William III and his immediate successors precluded any possibility of an Irishman being able to obtain any part of the land on which he lived.

A succession of statutes enacted during 50 years resulted in a body of laws under which no Catholic—that is to say, no native Irishman—could hold land. The whole surface of the island had been confiscated. The original owners of the soil were allowed to dwell upon it merely as tenants at will. The confiscated lands were not bestowed, as in former cases, upon English soldiers who settled in Ireland, but upon favorites of the English court in large areas of 5,000, 10,000, 15,000, and even 30,000 acres, who never lived in Ireland, who never intended to live in it, who seldom if ever visited it. Every Catholic was prohibited not merely from holding land but from leasing it for a period longer than five years. He could not own a horse worth over £5. If a Catholic appeared in a public place mounted on a horse any Protestant could take possession of the animal by tendering the rider a £5 note. Beyond impoverishing the Irish people it was sought to accomplish their degradation by forbidding the education of youth. The only element of the community capable at that time of imparting education was the clergy, and the priest who taught a school was declared guilty of a capital offense. The spectacle was common of a priest's dead body hanging in chains, executed for no other offense than that of having undertaken to instruct an Irish boy. Not content with seeking to accomplish the intellectual degradation of the people these stautes sought to corrupt their morals by undermining the foundations of the family. The son who accused the father of being a Catholic and proved it could at once take possession of the estate. The wife who informed on her husband was at once accorded a separate and independent interest in his property. So that wifely loyalty and filial piety—every emotion which in civilized countries is considered necessary to the well-being of a community, and therefore to be encouraged by government—was perverted in Ireland to the injury of morals and the disruption of society.

Under this system the people hardly ever came in contact with the owners of the soil. In almost every instance an agent represented the alien landlord. The value and efficiency of that agent were determined by the amount of rent which he could extort from the unfortunate occupants of the land. If a man by dint of arduous labor improved the soil he occupied and made it more valuable, the agent at once descended upon him and raised the rent. Not merely were all the fruits of his own labor confiscated but all his neighbors were promptly informed that unless they made their soil equally fruitful and raised the same amount of crops, that is to say, paid the same rent, they would be evicted. And eviction was death. Not merely was industry made unprofitable by this hellish system; it was made unpopular. The laborious man did not benefit himself, but he brought disaster upon his whole neighborhood. The unfortunates who were evicted were left to starve on the highways. There was no other occupation in which they could find a livelihood because, by a refinement or cruelty that is almost inconceivable, the only industry that survived the hostile legislation of Charles II—the woolen industry—was entirely destroyed by William III. It was not taxed out of existence. It was not made to bear burdens imposed avowedly for support of the State, which prevented it from being prosperous. It was prohibited absolutely and unconditionally. All existing factories were suppressed and the people were forbidden, under heavy penalties, from attempting to engage in the woolen trade. More than that, the Irish wool, at that time—the Australian wool not yet having become available for the world's necessities—was of a peculiarly valuable character. Not merely was the manufacture of woolen goods prohibited in Ireland, but exportation of Irish wool was prohibited to any place except six English cities, the idea being that the English manufacturers by these restraints would be enabled to obtain Irish wool on his own terms. But there was an extensive woolen industry in the low countries where a great demand arose for Irish wool as soon as its manufacture was suppressed in Ireland.

Wool that would bring 6 pence at Bristol commanded 1 shilling and 7 pence in Ypres and in other Flemish towns. Quite naturally smuggling of Irish wool to the Continent became one of the chief occupations of the Irish people. But the worst feature of this oppressive measure was not the loss of money or of property that it entailed. It was this: Wool being contraband, trade in it could not be prosecuted through bills of exchange and other devices of banking which govern commerce. It could only be bartered for some commodity not easily discovered, for everywhere the Irish coast was patrolled by British officers charged with the duty of preventing smuggling where they could and punishing the smugglers where prevention was impossible. Wool was exchanged mainly for Flemish wines. This extensive importation of wines was the cause and the beginning of that intemperance that has been the curse, Senator [turning to Senator PHELAN], of your country and of mine, of your race and mine, for 250 years. Before the beginning of the seventeenth century the Irish were a temperate race. But the example of the well-to-do consuming expensive wines soon caused a demand for coarser and cheaper intoxicants by the less prosperous. To meet this demand the manufacture of illicit whisky became extensive and the people gradually sank into that dreadful intemperance from which they have suffered both at home and abroad ever since. Mr. Chairman, the curse of this intemperance has been Ireland's, the shame of it is England's.

I am not saying this on my own authority. Here again, sir, I am quoting from James Anthony Froude—the apologist of English excesses in Ireland—who, indeed, seems to complain that if these enormities had gone further the race would have been exterminated and the Irish question settled finally and without appeal.

Now it is quite true that these proscriptive laws have all been repealed. They began to disappear in the latter half of the eighteenth century. And it is to the credit and glory of this country that their disappearance began when fugitive Irishmen—Presbyterians who fled from the enforcement of the test acts and settled in Pennsylvania, and Catholics who had fled from other parts of the Island—were found fighting side by side under the banner of Washington for freedom, justice, and right. Up to that time religious proscriptions were not confined to Ireland. They were universal. They were based on the assumption that anything like diversity of religious faith among the people of a State weakened it, and therefore, it should be prevented by the government. The Huguenots were placed under serious disabilities in France, so were the Catholics in England. But in Ireland it was the distinctive feature of these proscriptive measures that they were not intended to discourage Catholicism or encourage Protestantism, but to degrade the whole people by plunging them into ignorance, and by corrupting every avenue through which could be reinforced those virtues and qualities that are considered essential to the well-being of every State. In Ireland the faith professed by the people was proscribed with a violence which nowadays can hardly be understood. And this fact must be borne in mind when you consider the Irish question. It is the only country in the world where the people have remained steadfast to a faith that had been proscribed. In every other country the people adopted in a body the religion that its Government established. England became almost uniformly Protestant, or at least non-Catholic under Henry VIII; almost uniformly Catholic again under Queen Mary; Protestant once more under Queen Elizabeth; and it was ready for another change to Catholicism—according to the historians—if James II had but governed with a little more sense. And so the religious complexion of the French people was decided by the result of the religious wars.

But in Ireland the majority of the people remained immovably attached to the faith that was proscribed and prohibited under drastic penalties, though they had to sacrifice for it not merely every element of property they possessed but every hope of improving their condition. The extraordinary thing about their tenacity in this respect is that it was maintained, without those aids to fervor which the Catholic liturgy affords. Such a thing as a great religious ceremonial had not occurred in the country, at the time of which we are speaking, for 150 years. Their lands confiscated, their faith proscribed, they practiced the rites of their church crouching in garrets and hiding in outhouses. Driven from the towns and villages, they took refuge in some mountain glen, and there, under the broad canopy of heaven, the rains falling on them, oftentimes knee-deep in mud, with sentinels posted at each end of the glen watching for the priest hunter, who was an established feature of these conditions, all cotemporary writers agree in saying they worshipped with a fervor never shown in the stateliest cathedral ever raised by the hands of piety to the worship of God. Even after they had regained the right to practice their faith it has been remarked that they showed very little regard for its ceremonials. But nothing could swerve them from attachment to its tenets and teachings. And as they remained immovably attached to their faith, so also have they always been unswervingly steadfast in maintaining their national life. It is a peculiar feature of this determination to maintain their national existence that it does not seem to be based on any hope for the future. This is clearly reflected in their poetry, which is perhaps the most melancholy in the world, as it certainly is among the most beautiful. I am one of those who believe that sorrow has always been the source of exquisite poetry. I have never known a sublime note to be inspired by prosperity. Not merely is there a vein of profound melancholy through all Irish poetry, but it never expresses any hope for the future. Yet there is never a note of despair in it. Every line of it breathes the determination of Irishmen to love the old sod, maintain the old faith, preserve the old race, though they never again should see the light of freedom. Moore describing the Harp of Tara, silent, abandoned, the chord alone that breaks during the night, telling the tale of its ruin, concludes:

> Thus Freedom now so seldom speaks,
> The only throb she gives,
> Is when some heart indignant breaks,
> To show that still she lives.

Freedom has indeed lived in the hearts of Irishmen under all circumstances; under the darkest skies, without any hope of deliverance. Even when there was no chance for Irish arms to fight for it, there was always an Irish heart ready to break for it. Freedom, though denied them as a possession, has always remained an aspiration from which they could never be separated. Such a people can not be seduced from their ideals nor diverted from asserting their right to nationhood. Such a people can not be subdued, and, therefore, Senators, I submit to you with all frankness and perfect confidence that the only alternative which the Irish question presents is extermination or emancipation of the Irish people. You Senators, to whom is confided the treaty-making power of this Government, will not suffer the destruction of such a race as this, and if you will not suffer it to be destroyed, then you must insist that it be free. There is no alternative. [Applause.]

Now, with respect to the religious question: It can not be denied that Ireland has been torn by religious antagonism. But the cause of this is perfectly simple. And it should be remembered that whenever the Irish succeeded in establishing control over the government of their own country, as they did at intervals—in 1642 and again in 1688—the first act of the Catholics when they became dominant was to declare absolute religious freedom for all. The reason why religious antagonisms have divided the Irish people is because in that country religion was made the test of political rights and property rights. When a man could be ousted of his property because he was a Catholic (and that by a person bound to him by the closest ties of kinship); when a man could be deprived of the horse he rode by a total stranger on the tender of a 5-pound note because he was a Catholic; when he was excluded from every office under his government and denied the right even to educate his child because he did not profess the faith established by law, it was inevitable that the victims of such oppression and the beneficiaries of it would be influenced by hostility against each other.

I should add here, in order to explain why Ulster was prosperous while the rest of the country sank into misery growing ever deeper, that a totally different system of laws prevailed in the one place from that which governed the other. In Ulster, ever since its "plantation" by James I, there was in force what is called "Ulster tenant right." Under it the occupant of the soil could till it and improve it with a certainty that every improvement he made was his property, to enjoy it while he remained in occupation.

The landlords had no longer any inducement to remain in the country. Again they became absentees, and the remarkable prosperity produced by that short period of independence was changed to a long, unbroken period of progressive decay. Again the rack-renting agent drew from the soil everything which it yielded beyond what sufficed to afford its cultivators the barest subsistence. And for this chance to live there was the fiercest competition among the members of the wretched population, each one eagerly bidding against all others for the privilege of cultivating the land upon any terms whatever. Under this competition conditions of life sank so low that the Irish peasant never tasted meat from one year's end to the other. The potato became the sole support of his existence. And when in the years of '46 and '47 there was a general failure of the potato crops throughout Europe it was a source of loss to the people in other countries, but in Ireland it caused actual starvation. We often hear of the "famine" in Ireland. But strictly speaking there was no famine. While the people were dying by hundreds of thousands for lack of food, there passed before their eyes along the highways droves of cattle, wagons laden with foodstuffs, all products of their own labor, sent out of the country to be sold and the proceeds paid to alien landlords.

In any other country in the world these abundant supplies would have been seized and the people would have used them to avert hunger. In Ireland an exaggerated sense of property led the people to perish of starvation rather than take what, according to law, belonged to the landlord. But it is said Ireland is governed by exactly the same law as England with respect to land. Quite true, but the conditions established under these laws in the two countries are widely different. The English landlord always lives upon his estate, the Irish landlord seldom, if ever. The English landlord has always held himself to be the chief of an industrial family, the head of a great industrial organization, dividing the whole product of the soil with those who have aided in cultivating it.

I know of nothing more impressive in civilized life than the manner in which these English lords of the soil exercise their ownership over it for the benefit of the people who cultivate it and for the glory of their country. The manor house which to many casual observers is a mere abode of elegant luxury is actually to the great agricultural organization of which its owner is the head, what the countinghouse is to a factory. From it the landlord directs all the energies of his tenants and dependents. This landlord is never "off his job" for a moment. Even in his amusements he is always discharging his duty, fulfilling his task.

We often hear of the claret-drinking, fox-hunting squire, as though his whole life were devoted to the consumption of wine and the hunting of foxes, and he does spend a good part of his time in these agreeable occupations. [Laughter.] But when he is hunting over his own fields and those of his neighbors he is scrutinizing his fences and the condition of his farmers' and laborers' cottages and comparing them with conditions existing on the estates of other landlords. When he is shooting he may be conscious of nothing except a desire to kill patrtridge or snipe, but to reach this game he must walk through the stubble in which the birds are concealed, and there he is necessarily informed of the manner in which the field is cultivated by his tenant. If the fences are broken, cultivation of the field inefficient, cottages dropping into decay, the tenant is required to explain. If that tenant can show that he is not responsible for these conditions and could not avoid them, the landlord himself always feels bound to repar them. If, for instance, the tenant by reason of a large and growing family finds himself unable to continue paying the rent he had previously paid, no English landlord would ever think of evicting him. The opinion of his own order would forbid it. To throw a deserving man out on the highway who for reasons beyond his control was no longer able to pay his rent would be an offense against his obligations as a gentleman, almost worse than cheating at cards. But while public opinion in England makes the landlord a trustee for the benefit of those who under his direction cultivate the soil, the Irish landlord, who seldom lived in the country or saw his property, was under no restraint whatever in dealing with his tenants. His sole object was to obtain and enjoy the uttermost penny that his agent could extort from them. And thus it came to pass that the very same man—and I am speaking now, Mr. Chairman, of matters within my own knowledge—who in England is the very embodiment of paternal care for his tenants, would suffer an estate owned by him in Ireland to be administered with a ruthless cruelty which produced conditions difficult for us to conceive in this country. The absentee Irish landlord, though he was oppressive, was not always consciously cruel in the treatment of his tenants. The system made him a tyrant or at least tempted him to tyranny even when he himself was naturally well disposed.

One man of my own acquaintance who is still living, and who occupies a very prominent position to-day in English public life, the younger son of a great noble, became a naval officer and received from his father when he came of age a property that yielded about £1,000 a year. This property which he had never seen was managed by an agent. He went on the turf and in the course of a few weeks the thousand pounds which constituted his annual income passed from his pockets into those of enterprising bookmakers. As was usual with Irish landlords living out of the country, he wrote a letter to his agent asking if he could not send him some more money. The agent answered that the income from his property might easily be doubled. "Why the mischief then don't you double it," he asked. "I want to be sure," the agent answered, "that I will be sustained." Now this man is quite an extraordinary person, gifted with a mind singularly effective in analysis. Concluding from the agent's statement that there was something about the matter which needed explanation, he resolved to visit the estate and ascertain for himself the real condition. The agent met him and escorted him over the property, showing him various farms for which the rentals paid, he said, were entirely inadequate, and finally reached one which seemed to be particularly well kept and prosperous. "There," said the agent, "is one of the best farms on the estate. It is easily worth 2 guineas an acre, and all that the tenant pays for it is 2 and 6 pence." When the landlord asked why the higher rental was not obtained for it, the agent answered that when rentals had been raised on Irish estates the agents always incurred bitter enmity. This they were prepared to face, but they had not always been sustained by their principals. And this particular agent before he took any steps to increase rentals wanted to be assured that he would be supported by the landlord in any trouble that might ensue.

Now, this particular landlord from his entrance into the naval service, had always made it a rule when anything under his authority went wrong to go and ascertain the cause of it for himself. Even after he rose to be an admiral—I may as well say that the man of whom I speak is Lord Charles Beresford—if an engine on any ship of his fleet was reported out of order he never contented himself with sending an engineer officer to find out what was the matter. He always ordered a boat lowered and went and ascertained it himself. And so when the agent made this statement about the farm renting at what appeared to be such an extraordinarily low rate, Lord Charles concluded that he would go and see the tenant personally and get his side of the matter. The following morning he appeared at the cottage door and was welcomed by the occupant, whose name, I think, was Monahan. To enter a house in Ireland, no introduction is necessary. Anyone who appears on the threshold is sure of a cordial reception. After exchanging a few pleasant words with Mr. Monahan, Lord Charles made some observations on the excellence of the farm. Now, an Irishman who receives congratulations on the farm he occupies always discerns in the compliment a potential, if not probable, rise of rental. And so, when Lord Charles asked him how it happened that he only paid 2 and 6 pence an acre for land easily worth 2 guineas, the tenant said, "And may I ask, sir, why you busy yourself about my farm, or the rent I pay?" Whereupon Lord Charles said, "I am your landlord." And then this man, well-nigh 80 years of age, broke down and wept like a child. The dread stroke, which every Irish tiller of the soil who has made it productive always apprehends, seemed to have fallen. In piteous accents he sobbed, "Oh, my lord, for the love of God, don't take the farm from me. It is true I am paying but 2 and 6 pence an acre for it, but when I came here that land was not worth 6 pence an acre. The value it has to-day is the result of work put into it by me and my boys during the last 50 years." Four sons, the oldest nearly 50, the youngest over 40 years of age, had all spent their lives in helping him to effect this improvement. "My lord," he said, "I will give you half of it, I will pay 1 guinea an acre, but let me keep the rest," and Lord Charles said, "No, Mr. Monahan, I am sorely in need of money, but I would have to be much harder up before I could take away from you the fruits of your life work and of your four sons. Keep your farm at 2 and 6 pence an acre as long as you live."

Now, suppose this particular landlord had not taken the trouble to ascertain for himself just how his agent could have increased the rentals of his property, that tenant and his four sons would have been evicted, turned out on the road to die, unless they could obtain enough money to buy a passage to this country. And in just that way and under just such conditions hundreds of thousands—aye, millions—of Irishmen, victims of this accursed system, have been driven from their own hearthstone to seek asylums in this country and other lands beyond the sea. But their love of Ireland instead of diminishing grew deeper by absence from the soil. That love they have transmitted to their children and to their children's children, many of whom have never seen the country which they love, with an ardor that is unquenchable. It is this greater Ireland beyond the seas which rises now to denounce that accursed system before the bar of public opinion throughout the world. The conscience of Christendom has already decreed that the system must end. And I pray, Senators, that you will not, by ratifying the treaty, prevent the United States from proving itself, through all the years to come, as it has been in the years that are past, the most effective agent in enforcing the decrees of civilization in favor of liberty and justice.

So you see the conditions produced by the abhorrent laws of the eighteenth century have continued down to the present day. The laws themselves have been repealed, but the conditions they produced remain. It is true that in law Irishmen can now purchase property and hold it without any disqualification on the ground of religion. But practically land in Ireland was, until very recent years, absolutely unattainable; first, because the Irishmen, excluded from all avenues of productive industry for generations, had not the capital wherewith to purchase land, and if by any chance he became possessed of sufficient means to purchase land, it was a point of honor among the landlords not to sell. Thus conditions originally produced by law have been perpetuated through custom. They continued unbroken until the Wyndham Act of 1912 was passed.

The results produced by that measure before the war were amply sufficient to convince the most skeptical that the wonderful industrial efficiency which enabled the Irish, after every devastation of their country, to restore prosperity in an incredibly short space of time so long as they were allowed to regain access to their soil, had not deserted them or diminished in the slightest degree. Just consider for a moment the immediate effects of that legislation. Remember that by this measure the Irish land was not taken from the landlord and given to the tenants without compensation of any kind, as it had been originally taken from its occupiers. It was taken at a high valuation, and after this high valuation had been fixed by mutual consent 12 per cent in addition was given to the sellers as a bonus. That was all charged upon the land, the occupier of which was empowered to take possession and to become the absolute owner on paying the total amount of the purchase price in installments extending over 62 years—I think that was the number of years. Under that law one-half of the land of Ireland passed into ownership of its occupiers. The transfer involved some twelve hundred thousand transactions. And, what absolutely seems to transcend the possibilities of human capacity, there was not a single default, so far as I know, in fulfilling any of these agreements. Never in the history of man have transactions on a scale so stupendous occurred without a single breach of agreement.

Not merely was the letter of every agreement observed by the Irish but they cultivated the soil thus restored to them with such energy and efficiency that by 1914 they had already effected a wonderful revolution in their condition. The cabins—the hideous, noisome cabins which I myself remember, in which we would not suffer a pig to exist now, where human beings, 9 and 10 in number, and animals, if they were lucky enough to have a pig or two, dwelt together promiscuously under a few sods placed against an upright pole, an open space at the top allowing smoke from turf and such articles as they burned to escape—have all disappeared. Decent white-washed cottages have replaced them. Implements of industry are kept in excellent order. I never saw better horses anywhere than in Ireland while I motored through it in 1913. It seemed as if the Irish people were once more on the very threshold of a prosperity such as had blessed the land between 1782 and 1800—the monuments of which are those beautiful buildings that ornament the city of Dublin to the admiration of visitors from every part of the world.

At this time while prosperity was returning apace, and prospects brightening steadily, the British Government undertook to pass a measure of home rule, encouraged doubtless by the excellent use which the Irish people had been making of their land. This measure did not in fact provide for home rule at all. The body it proposed to create was not a parliament but a commission to propose measures for the English Parliament. Certain subjects were relegated to this new body, but the power of the English Parliament over it was supreme—so complete that not merely was the right reserved to set aside any act which the Irish Parliament might pass but where that parliament had acted on a subject entirely within its jurisdiction the British Parliament was free to pass a different act, and this act of the Imperial Body was to prevail as the supreme law of the land. Here surely was a measure which the most radical English opponent of Irish home rule could well have afforded to accept. Though it did not establish an Irish Government in any sense of the word, yet the Irish representatives who then appeared to speak for the majority of the people accepted it. And there was every reason to believe that its enactment might effect a complete settlement of this difficulty which for centuries had disturbed the peace of mankind. But a number of Ulsterites, encouraged by leading politicians of England—openly by all the Tories and secretly by many of the so-called Liberals—resolved to resist by arms the establishment of anything resembling a government in Ireland even though the limitations of its powers reduced it to little more than a shadow or simulacrum of government. These men were among the most prominent of the community. They organized regiments, paraded them in public reviews, and audaciously imported 100,000 stands of arms to be employed against the British Government if it undertook to enforce a home-rule act.

Mr. Carson, who had been a high official of the Crown, organized what he called a provisional government, and one F. E. Smith, who is not an Irishman, who has not a drop of Irish blood in his veins, who had no connection whatever by blood or property with the island, came over to Belfast, visited various places in Ulster and joined in arrangements to resist establishment of home rule. After this rebellion had been proclaimed and its forces actually organized, the Irish nationalists, who, mind you, were maintaining in office, the British Government then in power (it did not command a majority in parliament, except by the votes of Irish members) undertook to organize a volunteer force for the purpose of supporting enforcement of the home-rule measure. And then what happened? This Government, maintained in office by Irish votes, forbade by proclamation admission of arms into Ireland, after the Ulsterites had obtained arms sufficient to equip the regiments they had organized for rebellion but before the nationalists volunteers were able to obtain any military equipment whatever. But even this did not satisfy these audacious rebels. Disregarding the proclamation of the Government and flouting its authority they brought a cargo of arms into an Irish port and were suffered to land them without molestation or interference. Their defiance of authority was in fact treated as an execellent joke and became a subject of laughter. Gun running promised to become the favorite sport of these chartered rebels—chartered by the very Government they were defying. But when the nationalists undertook to bring in a cargo of arms the British soldiery appeared upon the spot and with bayonet and bullet prevented them from landing a single rifle, shooting down women and children who happened to be spectators. And so sedition was preached and practiced with impunity in Ulster while Irish nationalist volunteers when they attempted to sustain the Government were prosecuted and dispersed by order of the very men they kept in office. But even that was not all.

Under a new development of the British constitution a measure may become law notwithstanding its rejection by the House of Lords after it has been enacted three times in the House of Commons. This home-rule bill had been enacted once, and while the second enactment was in progress the military authorities—not the volunteers—but the regularly organized military forces of the Empire encamped at Kildare—were notified that possible violence in Ulster might require intervention by the soldiery to overcome it. And forthwith all the high officers, with the exception of Gen. Paget, resigned their commissions and announced they would not draw their swords to maintain the authority of their Government because it would be drawing them in behalf of a cause which the Irish people supported and against the Ulsterites who were their personal friends and with whose openly proclaimed intention to resist by arms the operation of a law enacted by the British Parliament they were in full sympathy. And these mutinous officers, instead of being court-martialed, degraded, discharged, and shot, were not even questioned. Not merely were they suffered to retain their commissions, but most of them were actually advanced to higher commands.

Can you wonder at what followed? The Great War came on. Mr. Redmond, acting for the nationalists, pledged the Irish people to support the British cause. I think he made a capital mistake when he said that the Irish people would be satisfied to wait for enforcement of the home-rule bill after the war was over. However this may be, certain it is that when the enlistments opened Irishmen went to the colors in great numbers. The nationalist leaders asked that these Irish soldiers be performed separately so that such deeds of valor as they accomplished would redound to the glory of their race. The request was denied. They were drafted into various regiments and companies. But wherever the fortunes of war were desparate and the casualties heaviest there Irishmen were found in numbers far in excess of the proportion they bore to the entire body of the British soldiery. And though they suffered heavier losses than any other men in the English service, their sacrifices were allowed to pass unrewarded and indeed unnoticed.

But worse was to follow. While Irish nationalists were dying by thousands under the British colors, repeating the sacrifices and services of their ancestors at Flanders a century earlier, it was resolved by the British Government to arrest the leaders of the nationalist volunteers and seize such arms as might be found in their possession. That purpose having become known it provoked immediate spontaneous resistance. Without preparation or opportunity to rally even the scanty force they could command these Irishmen arose in revolt. Numbering less than 2,000 they held two entire British divisions at bay for over a week. And when, after a display of gallantry at which the world has wondered, and without having committed any excesses as their bitterest enemies acknowledge they laid down their guns, the leaders (some 17 in number) were shot in cold blood. These men were the very flower of Irish life. The officials who took the lead in butchering them or in directing their butchery were the very men who had themselves preached rebellion and resistance to the Government. Once more the very best in the land, men of resplendent genius, of virtue personal and civic, absolutely unspotted and untarnished, were slaughtered, and over their dead bodies the basest were rising to conspicuous positions. The same accursed system that raised Emmet to the scaffold and Norbury to the peerage has in these days sent the brightest ornaments of Irish life to stand before a firing squad, and raised to the English woolsack the man who had counseled the course these victims pursued.

Now, this simple narrative of facts which we all remember, demonstrates, it seems to me beyond a question, the absolute incapacity of England to do justice in Ireland. Everywhere else her rule may be beneficent. In her own country she maintains a government certainly better than any other in Europe. Many think it the best in the world. But in Ireland, by the confession of everyone, her own statesmen included, her attempt to govern the country has been the most wretched failure in the whole range of human annals. The reason for it is plain. It arises from a difficulty that is insuperable. For nearly 250 years all legislation in Ireland has proceeded on the assumption that the Ulsterite is a superior being, and that all other Irishmen are his inferiors. This, though fantastically absurd, is not to be wondered at. Because you can not very well rob a man and then admit that he is your equal or that he is possessed of any merit whatever. You must admit and declare him unfit to enjoy either liberty or property at the same time that you despoil him in order to justify the spoliation. English writers and politicians are driven in self-defense to contend that the Irish are a shiftless, worthless, thriftless race, the Ulsterites embodiments of industrial efficiency and frugality. In support of the misrepresentation they quote the prosperity of Ulster, always omitting to point out that it enjoyed the essential conditions of prosperous commerce while the rest of Ireland was excluded from them. The different treatment always extended by British Government (no matter what party controlled it) to the different parts of Ireland, can not be explained upon any other theory. Remember, it was not only English Tories who have discriminated against one set of Irishmen in favor of the other. Liberal Englishmen have done it in even a more marked degree. It was a so-called Liberal Government kept in office by Irish votes that persecuted and suppressed the Irish nationalist volunteers who sought to support the measure of the British Government and encouraged the Ulsterite recalcitrants who proclaimed their intention to rebel against a law which aimed to do a faint measure of justice in Ireland.

All of which shows conclusively that England can not do justice in Ireland. She is absolutely incapable of it. Even when she has tried to do it, she has failed signally and dismally. I believe that the majority of the English people were really anxious to establish home rule in Ireland before the war. They had voted in favor of it. Their representatives in Parliament enacted it, and yet when it came to putting it in operation forces too strong for the Government were able to prevent it.

And all of this, Senators, I believe, leads to one conclusion. Ireland must be released from this incubus. She must be delivered from this body of death, called English rule. She can not continue to exist under it. She will not. She would not deserve to exist if she accepted these conditions of degradation. She will never accept them. Her whole history shows that. There is no way in which her national spirit can be quenched. Efforts the most ruthless, backed by the utmost power of England continued through centuries, have failed to destroy Ireland's nationality. All the leagues of nations which might be formed on this earth could not keep Ireland submissive to this wrong. Thank God for it. In saying that for Ireland, I think I can say as much for America, too. [Applause.] I do not believe all the powers on earth, organized in a league of nations or otherwise, could keep America submissive under a wrong. [Applause.] I do not believe there is any chance that America will be reduced to a position where her people must revolt against her Government in order that justice may remain their birthright. And, therefore, I am as certain as I can be of anything that this treaty will be rejected, root and branch, as an abomination which the American people can not take to their bosoms. There is but one thing necessary now to effect the emancipation of Ireland and the regeneration of the world. It is that we acknowledge and recognize the simplicities of the situation which this war has created, as Senator Knox described them yesterday, and then govern our course by this infallible guide. What is it that the world needs? Everyone will answer, "Peace." Of course, it is. But what is peace?

Peace is not merely the removal of contending armies from the field of battle. It means deliverance of the nation from the preoccupation and obsession of wasteful preparations for war. For years before the late conflict began the world was practically in a state of war. It was paying the price of war. Notwithstanding a great increase in the production of commodities prices instead of falling were rising. This increase in the cost of living could be accounted for on no basis except the tremendous expense of supporting 5,000,000 of men in the very flower of their productive efficiency idle in barracks and equipping them with the weapons which would make them effective in battle. That was a terrible burden before the war. But now if that burden is to continue it must destroy or at least imperil the solvency of the entire world. And an insolvent world must necessarily be a starving world.

Remember that during the 100 years of peace which followed Waterloo there was an enormous growth of population. That growth was confined almost entirely to the cities; rural populations declined rather than increased. In all those cities there is not a single human being who produces the necessities of his own existence. Five or six millions of people have established themselves on the Hudson River and the East River in what is called the great city of New York. There they live on the contributions of workers from all over the world. Everything that enters into their industry must be contributed from outside the city. Anybody who has ever looked upon those great chimneys and seen the smoke of manufacture rising to the heavens—incense with industry burns before the throne of God—must realize the close interdependence between all human beings in the world to-day. Everything that enters into manufacture, the very stones of the structure in which industry operates, the very beams of the building in which it is sheltered, the raw materials of manufacture, the clothing of the worker, all come from outside. The dweller in the cities depends for his subsistence upon the labor of all the world.

Before the war 4,000,000 of these 5,000,000 people lived literally from hand to mouth. And the same is true of people in every other great city. But now $250,000,000 of the capital by which industry was formerly made effective has perished. Ten million human beings in the flower of their industrial efficiency are dead, maimed, and rendered inefficient. With this loss of capital and of productive energy how are these mighty populations to continue to be fed, clothed, and housed? There is but one way. The waste of war and of preparation for war must be ended. All over the world men must put away weapons of conflict and take into their hands implements of industry. If disarmament can be made universal, then this war will be converted from the greatest scourge ever laid upon the backs of the human race into the greatest blessing which a Merciful Providence has ever extended to them. It is the unbroken lesson of history that sacrifices imposed on one generation are the necessary price of every great advance, material and moral, accomplished by other generations. The French Revolution, which caused wars that devastated the Old World for over 20 years, resulted in uprooting survivals of feudalism which had seriously hampered industry, and it was followed by an improvement in human conditions so remarkable that when we contrast the conditions of the world during the last hundred years with its condition during any previous period, it seems as if we were considering two separate planets peopled by a wholly different species of animated beings.

And after our Civil War, notwithstanding its enormous waste, the substitution of free labor for slave labor opened a fountain of prosperity which more than repaired in five years the terrible destruction of battle. And now if we can absorb all the energies of mankind in production of commodities necessary to human subsistence, the ravages of this war will be repaired in five years, and the human family will reach a plane of prosperity higher than it has ever achieved. The world is at the parting of the ways. Either it must take, through disarmament, the path leading upward to prosperity that will be immeasurable, or else through efforts to maintain huge military establishments it must sink through confusion and disaster to ruin which will be irretrievable. Which path shall be chosen? Your action, Senators, on this treaty will decide. Mr. Chairman, if we follow the path marked out by this attempt through a new covenant to perpetuate the conditions from which we hoped that the war would deliver us, if we increase armaments instead of abolishing them, if, in a word, this proposed treaty is ratified, the league of nations, which it establishes, which is a league not to promote peace but to prohibit peace, as Senator Knox has well said, it will prove to be the greatest curse that has ever blighted the prospects of humanity. [Applause].

But I have not the slightest apprehension on this score. Thank God, a spirit of genuine Americanism survives in the Senate which will deliver this country from the peril that threatens it and dispel from our horizon the cloud that darkens it. I think

I may say with perfect confidence that since this treaty was laid upon the table of the Senate the discussion which its provisions have evoked has raised the standard of senatorial eloquence and senatorial statesmanship to a plane higher than ever before attained in its history. [Applause.] I can quote speeches delivered by men who sit around me that can not be paralleled by any delivered in the Senate since its organization, and I do not except even that much-lauded reply of Daniel Webster to Senator Haynes, of South Carolina. When we realize the wealth of information those speeches disclose, the high spirit of patriotic devotion they attest, the stern resolution in the teeth of misrepresentations, as ingenious as they are reckless, to maintain the integrity of our institutions, which they establish, nothing in the past history of Congress compares with them. But even if the Senate were indifferent or inefficient, there would remain the unerring judgment, the infallible wisdom, the sensitive conscience of the American people. America has accomplished the greatest things ever achieved in the history of mankind, things which have been so universally recognized as of transcendent value to civilization that even if they could be changed no human being would venture to disturb them. If anybody had the power to disturb them and should attempt it, the whole conscience of Christendom would rally to preserve them as priceless possessions of the whole human family. Yet these great achievements were attained not through politicians or statesmen but largely in spite of them. The people have always done better than the politicians or statesmen had advised.

This war which we can all now see was absolutely essential to preservation of our civilization was not a distinctive policy of the President who conducted it. He went into a campaign and sought reelection—with perfect sincerity, as I believe—upon a proposition that he had kept us out of war. He could not have intended to advise a declaration of war when he called the extra session, because he did that only after failure of a measure recommended by him which did not look toward war but merely to the arming of merchant ships. It was essentially the war of the American people, not of the American President.

The war with Spain was forced upon a reluctant Executive, as I think the chairman of this committee will admit, close as he was to the administration of the very distinguished President who caused its declaration. And the reconstruction of the Southern States after the Civil War was not what anybody had suggested. It is now clear that if either party had had its way the country would not yet have recovered from its ravages. I remember when Mr. Tilden was—as I believed at the time and have not wholly changed my opinion—cheated out of the office to which he had been elected, I thought it was the end of this Government. I thought that the South must remain indefinitely under the cruel heel of oppression, with rival governments in three different States, and that all possibility of reconstruction on the basis of reconciliation had faded away into limitless distance. Looking back now, I can see that it was the providence of God that put the task of withdrawing the Federal troops from South Carolina, Louisiana, and Florida into the hands of a Republican President, thus making it a common policy of the whole country, which Democrats were delighted to welcome and which Republicans were not in a position to criticize.

The War of 1812 was forced on President Madison. Senator KNOX, who has undoubtedly studied closely the archives of the State Department, knows that the purchase of Louisiana as we understand it was never contemplated by Thomas Jefferson. He sought only to acquire the Island of Orleans. The purchase of the great territory north of the present boundary of Louisiana was forced on him. It was accepted as a necessary condition by his supporters, and urged as a reason for rejecting the whole treaty by others, on the ground that these desert wilds could never be of any value to us. But the people builded wiser than the statesmen of those years.

And now, when the greatest emergency that has ever confronted the country is upon us, I believe that the people's conscience, the people's judgment, and the people's wisdom, will reinforce the determination of these Senators who have already checked, and who I believe will succeed in defeating the attempt by this treaty to betray the causes and purposes for which the war was fought. I do not charge deliberate treason against anyone, but I do say that betrayal of the causes for which this war was fought and won will be the net result, if the purposes of those who negotiated this treaty shall be accomplished. We are told that even an amendment of this treaty will lead to its rejection. Well, what of that? Suppose it is defeated, could we conceive anything more auspicious? The league of nations which it undertakes to establish is imperfect by the concession of everybody.

The Shantung provision is an abomination. Yet we are told that we must yield to that abomination and make ourselves parties to it. My God, Mr. Chairman, when did it come to pass that the word "must" can be addressed to the American Nation? [Applause.] When this Nation consisted of little more than a few villages straggling along the Atlantic coast, the suggestion was made that forbearance of the greatest military power in the world at that time could be secured by a substantial advance of money. The answer was given without an instant's hesitation: "Millions for defense; not one cent for tribute." [Applause.]

And, sir, are we now to pay not a tribute of money but a tribute of infamy, by the confession of everybody, in order to establish a league which has not and can not operate for peace, but in the very nature of things, as has been conclusively shown by Mr. KNOX and other Senators, must operate to make war frequent, if not perpetual? Is there in that treaty one single word of which any American should be proud? Does it liberate a single people who seek emancipation, except as an act of vengeance against the countries that were overthrown? Does it hold a word of hope to nations that are languishing in chains and determined to break them? Far from that, it creates new spoliations and makes us a party to them. Without our participation they could not become effective. [Applause.]

But we are told that we can ratify this treaty and pass a resolution declaring that we don't like these infamies at the very time that we are perpetrating them. Now, I can have some respect—at least I can understand the attitude of a man who perpetrates an infamy because he wants to—but I have no patience with a man who, after making himself a party to an infamy seeks to excuse himself by saying that he dislikes it. [Applause.] One man is formidable to justice, the other is contemptible in every sense. But thank God the Government of the United States is not going to be contemptible. [Applause.]

Now, in all this I do not intend the slightest reflection on the President of the United States. I think I ought to say that. [Laughter.] No, no; Senators, let me say this to you: I think the place of the President in history is a high one, and I think it is secure. I think it is so secure that it can not be overthrown by anything except ratification of this treaty, and against that the Senate is, I think, immovable. His definition of the cause which led us into this war has become one of the priceless possessions of humanity. The 14 points are not dead. They are alive; they are here. [Applause.] We are appealing to them now, and the appeal will not be in vain. They can never die.

I was one of those who sincerely deplored his going abroad. I did not believe then, and I do not believe now, that the President of the United States is ever justified in placing his person under the jurisdiction or in the power of a foreign Government, especially when he is engaged in a negotiation affecting the sovereignty of the United States. While his person is under foreign jurisdiction he can be coerced in many ways. I think he was coerced in one way which proved effective, and that was by threatening him covertly or openly with some manifestation of disapproval or by withholding from him the applause which they gave him in overflowing measure when he first appeared on the European Continent. It is impossible otherwise to account for his acceptance of provisions in this treaty which he himself declares to be objectionable. But I want to say this: The world which heard the words he uttered when urging Congress to declare war became that moment a different world from what it had ever been before. I wrote to Mr. Tumulty at that time, and I felt deeply in my soul that this address of the President would pass into history as the most momentous utterance that ever fell from human lips since Pope Eurban II preached the First Crusade at Clermont-Ferrand, over 800 years ago. When he said this war was waged to make the world safe for democracy, and men shed their blood to make his declaration effective, it became impossible for the earth which received that libation ever again to tolerate, in Ireland or anywhere else in the world, conditions those heroes died to overthrow. [Applause.]

After speaking these words it became as impossible for the President to come back and set up such a machinery of force to dominate the world, as is embodied in this treaty, as it would have been for Godfrey, of Bouillon, or any other leader of the Crusades to establish Mohammedanism in his own dominion after his return from attempting to overthrow it in the Holy Land. Even though the President has himself forsaken the 14 points, the principle embodied in them remains to render the dominion of brute force impossible anywhere within the limits of civilization.

How the reign of brute force will be abolished in Ireland I can not tell at this moment any more than anyone at the close of our Civil War could have foretold the splendidly successful reconstruction of the Southern States that followed it. I am sure the chairman of this committee will recall that the leaders of the dominant party at that time, men like Charles Sumner and Thaddeus M. Stevens and Oliver P. Morton, patriots of the highest type, believed it would be necessary to take the most drastic precautions against a renewal of secession. On the other hand, the leaders of the Democratic Party in the South believed that they were entitled at once to unconditional restoration of their government and freedom to reestablish their social and economic life as they pleased. A golden mean was struck between the two. Their governments were given back to the southern people when it became clear that there would be no attempt to restore slavery or to fasten the Confederate debt on any part of this country. And then those States which had been ravaged as no other land had been ravaged before, whose industrial system had been subverted, whose cities had been burned, whose fields had been devastated, where the last dollar of capital had been expended, rose from the ashes of defeat almost in a night and marched forward to a prosperity greater than that which has blessed any other part of this country.

So I firmly believe that out of all this discussion, contention, and confusion of views the thing will emerge which the world needs. And that is disarmament. When disarmament becomes universal, then peace will be firmly established, for the very simple reason that when all nations are disarmed there will not be any means with which any of them can fight against another. Let us, then, insist that the outcome of this war shall be disarmament of all nations. We have the power to enforce this policy, and we need not lift a finger to do it. As Senator KNOX pointed out yesterday, the whole world is bankrupt. Many nations are still intent on maintaining great armaments, but they can not support them unless we give them the means. It is certainly impossible for any of them to reorganize its industry and at the same time maintain a great military establishment. The hope of each one is that we will advance it the capital essential to its industrial reorganization, and then it will use its own resources to maintain a great armament on land and sea.

I do not believe any American would object to aid the restoration of stricken Europe, but I do think it is our paramount duty to insist that before we extend the benefit of our resources to any other country all its own resources be devoted to restoring its industry. We should not aid it while it diverted one penny of its own possessions to military enterprises. To force universal disarmament, therefore, it is only necessary that this country resume the rôle which it has played since its organization.

For the first time in the history of the world a great war has ended leaving one power able to maintain the greatest armaments on land and sea and that power does not want to establish them. That power possesses the resources to resuscitate society, and it does not want to exercise the power thus given it for any other purpose than to benefit the whole human family. And now, while we are ready to expend our treasure for the welfare of all the world, what is it that by this treaty we are asked to do? As Senator KNOX well said yesterday, we are asked to use our resources for regeneration of the world, not according to our own idea of what would be most effective, but by submitting our judgment to that of other nations whose policies have led them to the pass out of which they are crying to us for deliverance. Now, if there be in all this world any force, country, government, or political system better qualified than America to employ enormous resources for the benefit of mankind by enforcing justice, I am ready, for my part, to see our resources turned over to that superior agency. But where it is? Where can it be found? Where is there in the universe any force comparable to the United States as an agency to use unlimited resources for the improvement of human conditions? Such a power or force can not be found. It does not exist. And yet we are asked to subordinate our control over our own resources to the judgment of nations which I think nobody here will dispute are inferior to us in intelligence and in love of justice. We are asked to give up the greater for the less, to abase ourselves from the lofty position to which Providence has assigned us and deliberately sink to a lower level. But it is said that if we maintain control over our own destiny we are in danger of isolation.

Well, Mr. Chairman, our isolation was decreed by Almighty God when He gave us the first place in civilization. Eminence is always isolation. But the eminence which we have always enjoyed is not an isolation which we want selfishly to retain. No; no; no; America invites all the world to end that isolation by coming up and sharing the eminence which she has occupied since the organization of this Republic. [Applause.] From the spirit that has been displayed in this gathering here to-day I have unbounded confidence that this country will not terminate that eminence by coming down from it and abasing itself to the prejudices and hostilities and cupidities of those European powers that have plunged the world into the welter of blood from which we have just delivered them, and from whose consequences we now hope to shield them.

Senator KNOX has stated, much better than I can state it, the true policy we should pursue. When disarmament is secured the nations can not fight. And then an unarmed world will naturally and inevitably produce a league of nations to adjust disputes. While unarmed nations can not fight without at least three years' preparation, there will be disputes as long as there are human beings on the earth. Now, there are but two things that men or nations can do when they engage in disputes—they can either fight about them or they can talk about them. If they have not the means to fight, then there is nothing left for them to do but talk about them. And when by disarmament they are placed in a position where all they can do is to talk, they will inevitably take measures to make that talk effective, which means they will establish tribunals or bodies of some description before which these disputes can be adjusted, if they are capable of adjustment. Leagues of nations can not produce peace. But peace can and will produce a league of nations—a true league of nations—a league capable of meeting the requirements of civilization. And with all the world disarmed no nation can be held in subjection against the will of its inhabitants to another. Ireland will be free, and every nation now denied the blessings of liberty will obtain them. That, Mr. Chairman, I believe will be the outcome of this situation. It may not come immediately. But come it must and come it will. Anything else spells not merely danger but ruin to civilization. Mr. Chairman, these are the conclusions which I submit respectfully but most hopefully to this committee. Peace—not merely cessation of war, but cessation of preparations for war—is absolutely essential to human existence under the conditions which now govern the world.

Peace must be established in Ireland before it can be made permanent throughout the world. Peace can not be established in Ireland by England. Eight centuries of history prove that. The Irish people who have resisted foreign domination for nine centuries will not submit to it, even though an attempt to force it upon them were made by a thousand leagues of nations. The league of nations here proposed is an abomination, an attempt to use the conscience of Christendom to sanction and perpetuate wrongs which morality and justice condemn. But although judgment and good sense may have departed from quarters where we have a right to expect that they would be found, yet we feel profoundly confident that here in this body the wisdom of the fathers will be vindicated by such a display of patriotism, such an exercise of vigilance, as will insure to this people the rights to which they were born, the rights which some of us who came here from other lands have acquired through the operation of our constitutional system; and by maintaining this Constitution intact you Senators will become the effective instruments ordained by Providence to keep trimmed and shining before the eyes of all men the lamp which will guide their footsteps, to freedom, to justice, and to unending prosperity.

Judge COHALAN. Gentlemen of the committee, we thank you on behalf of those who have come here and on behalf of those who have had the opportunity of addressing you.

BRIEF OF PROTEST.

The brief of protest heretofore referred to, filed in opposition to the arguments submitted at the morning session, is as follows:

The FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE,
SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.

GENTLEMEN OF THE COMMITTEE: We beg to present a formal protest to the attempt of representatives of a faction in Ireland, known as the Sinn Fein party, or of kindred organizations favoring this movement in the United States, to have the so-called Irish question thrust into the discussion in the Senate of the peace treaty and the league of nations.

In presenting our brief of protest we do so as American citizens of Irish birth, and not as agents of a foreign Government nor as local political factionists with an ax to grind. We are just plain, hard-working American citizens, engaged in various commercial and professional callings, prompted by a legitimate sentiment for the land of our birth and by a whole-hearted devotion to the land of our adoption.

We are not here, sirs, to argue either for or against the peace treaty and the league of nations, but we are here through your gracious courtesy to declare ourselves opposed to the thrusting of a foreign political issue into the discussion of that great subject.

Our opposition, gentlemen, is based on the following arguments:

I. THE ARGUMENT OF RIGHT.

The league of nations is a proposal to unite the forces of the Allies who fought during the late war to preserve the future peace of the world. This faction in Ireland has no right to be considered in the discussion, for they failed to support the Allies in that war and failed to do their part in the struggle. We present two simple statements in our argument:

A. They failed to support by sentiment. Their propaganda during the war period was hurtful to the allied cause.

B. They failed to support by deed. They gave aid and comfort to the foe by creating strife and turmoil at home. The British Government, in order to quiet this faction, could not and did not enforce conscription in Ireland. Granted they had a real cause to present at the bar of American judgment, they have no more right to be heard at this time, when they failed to support the allied cause, than the foe has to be heard at this juncture.

II. THE ARGUMENT OF FACT.

It is stated by this element that Ireland has not self-government and is therefore entitled to be heard. We are prepared to testify by actual experience that Ireland has self-government on the following basis:

A. Ireland has the franchise—franchise in local as well as national government.

B. Ireland has representative government. It has representatives of the people, by the people, and for the people.

C. Laws are made by the Parliament in the same manner as for England, Scotland, or Wales—the procedure is the same in each case.

It is further stated by this element that Ireland is suppressed by Britain. We reply:

First. It is not suppressed religiously. Freedom of worship is granted to all and is enjoyed by all.

Second. It is not suppressed industrially. Ireland possesses some of the largest plants in various industries to be found in the world, for example, shipbuilding, linen, tobacco, rope, collar and shirt, distilling, etc. The lace industry of Ireland is proverbial. Ireland is enjoying prosperity now to a vast degree.

III. THE ARGUMENT OF HISTORY.

The claim is made that Ireland was and should be a nation. This claim is false, and the assumption is without historical grounds. Ireland neither during the Druidic nor the Christian periods has been one whole, undivided nation. The four Provinces represent the smallest areas of nationhood. Historically, Ireland has had many kings and rulers at the one time, but never one king or supreme chief. Only under British rule has Ireland ever approached unity in these historic divisions. The present political divisions in Ireland are religious and not racial.

IV. THE ARGUMENT OF PRINCIPLE.

We are opposed, gentlemen, to the Irish question being thrust into American politics for the following reasons:

A. It raises a racial question. American citizenship is built not on foreign nationality but by adoption of the principles of the Constitution of the United States of America. The United States exists not for the foreignizing of America but Americanizing the foreign who seeks to live in our land. Whatever arouses racial feeling in America is dangerous to our national consciousness. We are opposed to hyphenated Americanism.

B. It raises a religious question. This is foreign to the principles of American national life. The propaganda of this element is such as to arouse sectarian animosity, denominational bigotry, and injects religious controversy into American politics. We are opposed to the religious hyphenate as well as the racial, whether it be Jewish, Roman Catholic, Protestant, Christian Science, or otherwise. The Irish question at home is a matter largely of religious association, and this is its tendency abroad.

In conclusion, sirs, we feel that the Irish question should not have official recognition at this time, when in the interests of the democracy of the world there should be fostered a friendly feeling between the two great English-speaking democracies of the United States of America and the British Empire.

We desire to thank you in behalf of those who think and feel as we do on this question, not only of Irish birth but also as direct American citizens, as well as an appreciation of ourselves personally for your courteous treatment and patient hearing. With absolute confidence we leave the matter in your care.

The following documents, numbered from 1 to 20, are printed as a part of the hearing by direction of the committee:

No. 1.

STATEMENT OF REV. JAMES GRATTAN MYTHEN, ASSISTANT MINISTER CHRIST CHURCH, NORFOLK, VA., AS MADE TO THE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE SATURDAY, AUGUST 30, 1919.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, your committee has served notice that only American citizens shall appear before you in relation to the matters which you are discussing, and it is, therefore, my privilege to appeal to you primarily and, in fact, solely as an American citizen on the question to which you have given a hearing to-day, namely, the freedom of the Irish people in their motherland.

As you note, I am a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, and as a follower of the Nazarene my training has taught me to be a pacifist. I could in no other way in conscience follow the Prince of Peace, however, when in holy week the President of the United States, in an appeal made to the American people through his address to the Houses of Congress assembled in joint session, promulgated what to me seemed the most forceful Christian utterance since the days of Apostolic inspiration, whatever difficulties had previously been made manifest from the Christian ethical standpoint in regard to war were swept away. As a man, as an American, then Mr. Wilson convinced me as a Christian, it was my absolute and bounden duty to support the great crusade of which he seemed to be the modern Peter the Hermit.

On Easter Day I preached a sermon in favor of the war, and when the young men of my parish enlisted I felt that I, being unattached, economically responsible for no one, that it was unbecoming of me to be content merely to stand in the pulpit and urge other men to give their lives for the principles which I considered worthy of life giving. And so, with countless numbers of young men of the Nation, I enlisted voluntarily, although I was exempt from the draft on account of my clerical profession and also since I was beyond the draft age. I was content to serve in the ranks in the humblest capacity, feeling that the menial tasks which fell to my lot were noble because even in their small way they were aiding in achieving the high purport of the sacred mission to which our country had committed itself.

It was not that Belgium appealed to me so tremendously—I could sympathize with Belgium because I am of Irish extraction—but it was the statements of our President that the crusade which he had inaugurated meant enfranchisement of the world; that all peoples everywhere were to determine for themselves the sovereignty under which they might desire to live. When he specifically told us that it was not against the German people but against the imperial autocracy of Germany that we were to fight, I understood him as a clear, logical, and consequential thinker, and I knew that he did not mean alone the new-born imperialism of Germany, but also the age-long imperialisms of which no student of history could possibly be ignorant, especially the author of The New Freedom.

From the textbooks of Mr. Wilson I had learned much, and so I gladly followed him in the war in which we were to exemplify by the force of militant argument the principles which he had enunciated.

During my career in the Navy I was charged with helping along the work of morale. I addressed countless numbers of enlisted men; I wish to tell you that on one occasion I preached in St. John's Church, Hampton, Va., to a congregation composed almost entirely of men in uniform. I had to say in defense of the President, because he was then being attacked, that he did mean all that he had said, and that imperialism everywhere was to go. I distinctly mentioned Ireland, India, and Egypt in my sermon. A member of the President's wartime Cabinet was an auditor, and he sent for me—I mean Dr. Garfield, the Fuel Administrator—and he told me that I had echoed the thoughts of the President. I was glad to hear him say that, because in my sermon on that day I had said that if the thing that I was preaching were not true, I would gladly be taken out and put up against a wall and shot, because the uniform I was wearing under my priestly vestments would be a disgrace to the world.

Now, gentlemen of this committee, if a treaty of peace, so called, is ratified by you as the coordinate treaty-making power, and the so-called league of nations receives your sanction, I shall feel, first of all, as an American citizen, secondly as a minister of the Gospel, and, thirdly, as an enlisted man in the Navy, that I have been betrayed not only by the executive power who led us to a victorious war and brought us to defeat in peace but also betrayed by your honorable committee.

However, I do not fear such results. The principles enunciated in the 14 points are more than Mr. Wilson's theories. He wrote them first in black and white and we read them, but since that time they have been written in red by my comrades, your sons, and your brothers in the fields of France, and though Mr. Wilson may wish to erase the things he wrote, he can not erase the indorsement of his principles which has been written in blood by the men who fell in Flanders and France.

The Irish issue might well be called the acid test of our international honesty. It is an acid which, if properly neutralized, will work well for the common weal, but if left in sullen despair will, without doubt, ally itself with every agency which makes for discontent and through which it may find a voice. Is it the will of this honorable committee to throw the twenty millions of our people into the already too large accumulation in the discard of discontent?

It is not necessary for me to attempt to convince your honorable body that there is no question of religion in the Irish situation as it is. The roster of Irish Protestants who might well be called the Protestant saints of Catholic Ireland answers that question for me: Grattan, Wolfe, Tono, Lord Edward Fitzgerald, John Mitchel—grandfather of the late mayor of New York City—Francis McKinley, hanged and quartered uncle of the late President of the United States; Robert Emmet, and Parnell. These Protestant leaders of Catholic Ireland need no apologists.

There is a religious question, however, which is international in scope when, for instance, from the interior of India, mercenary Gurkhas are imported to police Ireland. Those Gurkhas made themselves known in France when, stripped to nothing but a gee-string, with oiled bodies, with a knife in either hand and another in their mouths, disdaining the use of modern weapons, they leaped like tigers at the foe. This, gentlemen, is England's contribution from India to Ireland. And from Ireland the equally mercenary Sir Michael O'Dwyer, a man whom all Irishmen repudiate, was sent to rule over the Punjab, and whose rule has been exemplified in these last few months by suppressing particular demonstrations of unarmed Indians by the use of machine guns and bombs from the airplanes, killing thereby in cold blood hundreds of innocent men, women, and children.

These are the ways of English imperialism which manufacture religious animosities where none exist in reality. Thus, gentlemen, does England attempt to keep her belligerent subjects from realizing the unity of purpose which they should have in common in the destruction of her perfidious empire. She tries to make the Irish hate the Indians and make the Indians hate the Irish. So has she done in Ireland. She has created a fictitious animosity between Protestant and Catholic which exists only as political propaganda. She claims through Sir Edward Carson that the Protestant religion requires for its preservation the maintenance of British rule in Ireland. As a Protestant, sir, and a clergyman of the Protestant religion, I resent the implication that Protestantism requires the sustenance of British imperialism to maintain itself in Ireland or elsewhere. Were I convinced that this were a fact, that only through the power of British arms could my religion maintain itself in Ireland, then I would repudiate my religion at once. So, it is quite true that in this country we have heard the British propaganda that there is a religious difficulty in Ireland.

I want to say to you, sir, and gentlemen, that as a Protestant Irishman, whose family to-day in Ireland are representatives of the Protestant religion, that we would all gladly have Ireland free under any religious leadership rather than remain, as we are, the only white race still in slavery.

No. 2.

STATEMENT BY FORMER CONGRESSMAN JOSEPH F. O'CONNELL, REPRESENTING A DELEGATION OF THE BENCH AND BAR OF MASSACHUSETTS, BEFORE THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS.

AUGUST 30, 1919.

MR. CHAIRMAN: I have been authorized on behalf of the delegation of 25 lawyers sent here to-day by the bench and bar of Massachusetts to register our protest against the ratification of the peace treaty now under consideration in its present form, and to say to you that the proposed league of nations is in our judgment un-American, illegal, and contrary to the ideals of the American Republic.

It was my great honor and distinction to sit as a Member of Congress for four years in the great Chamber at the other end of the Capitol, and every time that I have viewed it in person or print my mind has traveled back to its beginning and history.

Sometimes, Senators, I am inclined to believe we forget the history of this very building in which you will assemble in deliberation on this treaty. Can you forget that in 1814 British troops marched from Annapolis on their errand of destruction and captured Washington, at that time an unfortified city! I will not detain you to narrate all the violations of so-called civilized warfare that were committed by the British officers and troops in that campaign, but I do make bold to recall to your attention the infamous conduct and unforgetable incident committed by the British troops in destroying the seat of our Government, because it carries with it the evil omen of what it will do again if it ever secures the chance.

The story of the exploit of Admiral Cockburn should be burned into the memory of this committee and every member of the Senate. Let me refresh your minds on a few of the details. After capturing the city, Cockburn marched with his soldiers into the Capitol building and, assembling them in the House Chamber, addressed them as follows, as we are told by English and American historians:

"We have met to-day in the building dedicated to the liberties of the American people—all in favor of burning this building to the ground, will say 'Aye'."

The vote was unanimous, and the orders were given "Burn it." And the original home of our Government, the emblem of our liberty and the original house of our Government in this city was destroyed by the ruthless devastating torch of the British soldier.

Let me warn you who are inclined to trust England that the same spirit of contempt for the American Republic still persists in the same quarters that inspired the orders to destroy our Capitol. If England ever secures the power of dominating American ideals, such as is contemplated in the proposed league of nations, is there any of you who can guarantee to the American people that England would again not do the same, if not worse, than Cockburn did in 1814?

This incident of American history is not recalled to you in any spirit of hatred against England, but only from the prudence of my American citizenship that can not still the fear that we will be taking a grave chance in entering into this proposed entangling alliance with monarchial powers, and as a lawyer representing a group of practicing lawyers I counsel and advise against taking any chances with our historical and traditional enemy. A small leak can lead to the destruction of the mightiest dam and your care should be to prevent anything that might lead to a leak of American and republican principles, for if the dam that has been built to protect the American people and the principles of liberty ever gives way the best minds of the world must agree that no man can foretell the awful destruction that will follow.

The President may cling to his ideals, but as an American lawyer and on behalf of this delegation of lawyers from New England we deliberately assert that the President has no right to entertain in his official capacity ideals that interfere or modify or control in the slightest degree the accepted and established ideals of American liberty as laid down in our Declaration of Independence and National Constitution. We in this delegation represent the traditions and teachings of James Otis, Samuel and John Adams, and Daniel Webster, and we fervidly and earnestly appeal to you, most of whom are lawyers, in their name not to forget the basic reasons that brought about the establishment of the United States of America as a Republic separate and distinct from all other races and governments.

We urge that if the principles of a Republican form of government were sufficient to justify the establishment of the American Republic in 1776 they are just as sound in 1919 to justify the establishment of an Irish republic in Ireland. This Republic was established on the doctrine of majority rule and all authorities agree that over 80 per cent of the Irish people have followed the course of the American Republic and have established for themselves an Irish republic, and hence we respectfully urge, that, having expressed to the Irish people the sympathy of the American people on the efforts of the Irish people to secure independence by a vote of 60 to 1, the consistent and proper thing to do now is to officially recognize Ireland as a republic. You have heard to-day from the lips of eminent Americans who have been in Ireland enough to justify you in acting immediately and stating to the world that you are satisfied that the Irish people have legally established themselves as a republic.

So much has been called to your attention to-day on this very important matter that I will not tire you by recurring to any of the various points dwelt upon by those who have already addressed you. But it does seem pertinent to lead your thoughts to that old bogey and masterpiece of British propaganda, the Ulster question, and, at the risk of taxing your patience, I ask your indulgence to read an authoritative statement from Ernest A. Boyd, one of the leading Protestant Irishmen of these days and an official of the British consular service: Ulster is a purely geographical term which describes the northern Province of Ireland containing the nine counties of Donegal, Cavan, Monaghan, Tyrone, Armagh, Fermanagh, Down, Antrim, and Derry.

This region is intimately and gloriously associated with the greatest traditions, literary, and historical, of the Irish nation from the earliest time, when it was the scene of the epic masterpiece of Celtic literature, down to the eve of the union, when Wolfe Tone conceived his dream of the United Irishmen in Belfast, and Grattan founded at Dunegannon the volunteers of prophetic significance. Evidently this Irish Ulster is not the "Ulster" which has called forth the rebellious enthusiasm of Sir Edward Carson and his English friends. The one is a national, the other a political phenomenon; yet, strange to say, owing to the absence of inverted commas, it is on behalf of the political "Ulster" that a plea of self-determination is often raised by those who argue that she can not deny to Ulster the right which she claims for herself. In other words, the demand of the Irish people for self-government presents itself as indistinguishable from the claim of "Ulster" to revolt against the laws of national and political unity. If the principle of national be the test to the right of self-determination, then it is important to distinguish between Ulster and "Ulster." The history of the Plantation of Ulster need not be recapitulated to-day. The facts are historical, and, whatever else may be said of them, they are hardly the best foundation to a claim to special consideration at the expense of the native population of the country upon which the settlers were thrust.

The present obstacles in the way of any acceptance of the theory that Ulster is a homogeneous entity are sufficient to dispense with a return to ancient history in the manner of which we Irish are accused of being over fond. In 1911 the total population of our northern Province was 1,581,696, of which 690,816 were Catholic Nationalists. Politically this division was emphasized by the return of 17 Nationalists as against 16 Unionist members of Parliament. Even since the last election, when a redistribution of seats and the split of the Nationalist vote between Nationalists and Sinn Feiners affected these figures to the advantage of the Unionist, there is still a majority in Ulster united with the majority elsewhere in Ireland so far as the demand for an Irish Parliament is concerned. Ulster is neither Unionist nor Protestant. Three counties, Donegal, Cavan, and Monaghan, are almost wholly Catholic. Catholics and Protestants are about equally divided in Armagh, Tyrone, and Fermanagh; and it is only in the three counties of Down, Antrim, and Derry that there is a strong Protestant Unionist majority. Even there Belfast has returned one Nationalist member representing the Home Rule Catholic minority. If the four counties known as Northeast Ulster are grouped together for electoral purposes, it is found that 5 Nationalists are elected as against 14 Unionists. The remaining five counties returned 12 Nationalists and only 2 Unionists. Clearly, it is impossible to consider Ulster as a political and religious unity. If the right of Ireland to self-determination be granted, not only will a minority of the whole country be coerced, but a minority in Ulster itself.

To do Ulster justice, those interested have rarely dared to base their demand for separate treatment on the ground of a majority right to self-determination. Carsonia is frankly antidemocratic and particularist, demanding special concessions for a majority on the sole ground of local advantage, and without any thought for the rights of the majority in Ulster or for the remaining Provinces of Ireland. It is alleged that Ulster has prospered since the union, that it is passionately devoted to England—not the Empire, for colonial home rule is abhorent—that its interests are opposed to those of the rest of Ireland, and that these would suffer at the hands of a legislature representing an agricultural community and dominated by Catholicism. The very arguments cited in favor of Ulster are a proof of the particularism and purely local selfishness of their champions. So far as the prosperity of Ulster is concerned it is limited to a few industries in a restricted area.

The Province shows the second highest total of emigration for all Ireland between 1851 and 1911—namely, 1,236,872—and between 1841 and 1911 the population of Ulster had declined by 805,177 persons. Three Ulster counties are on the list of Irish counties with the greatest number of emigrants, and two of them are in the superprosperous, supercontented "northeast corner"—namely, Antrim, with 297,605, and Down, with 162,571. And as showing that this decline of man power is not a heritage of papel superstition, these figures are higher than those of the third county, Tyrone, whose emigrants over the same period numbered 149,243.

As for the pretense that a poverty stricken agricultural population would victimize the "prosperous" industrial minority, it is worth noting that the taxable revenue per head is lower in Ulster than in Leinster, being £3 9s. 8d. in the former, £4 8s. 9d. in the latter, and that congested districts, with all the misery the words can note, are found in Ulster no less than in Connaught. On per capita valuation the highest northern country ranks only twelfth in Ireland. In fact, what Ulster fears even more than it fears democratic government is democratic taxation. Its claim to self-determination is a claim for capitalist determination alike for Ireland and Ulster.

Every Irishman knows how profound is the indifference of Ulster to English interests or English sentiment whenever these threatened to clash with the interests of Carsonism. The professions of undying affection for England no more corresponds to individual sentiment than do the boastings of economic independence to individual interests. Should northeast Ulster become Carsonshire under separate English administration, nobody would be more seriously disturbed than the Ulster bankers and the thousand and one business men who do not own the few favored industrial independent of Irish support. In other words, these purely selfish manifestations of loyalty to England and independence of Ireland made possible only by exploiting popular religious bigotry do not represent real political and social conditions. They are as remote from the facts of Ulster's life as are the panic fears of Catholicism which haunt the imagination of the Protestants where they are a dominating majority, but are proved groundless by their absence in the scattered Protestant minorities outside of northeast Ulster.

"Ulster" is not, as has been shown, a geographical entity; it is certainly not a national organism; it is not even a homogeneous in religion and politics. It is an integral part of the Province whose name it usurps, and its separatism flourishes solely because a small portion of the community, led by strangers, has not been exposed to the process of incorporation into the national and economic being, such as has everywhere resulted in political unity. We do not anticipate civil war, which has in most cases preceded the welding together of similarily divided communities, for we hold that the work of absorption will be painlessly effected by economic pressure. At the worst, a trial of strength in war, as between the Federal and Confederate States of North America, would lead to the definite establishment of a dominant majority. It is immaterial which side should win, provided one were irrevocably defeated. The consequences of an Irish civil war could not mean one-quarter of the misery, waste, and disruption which a continuance of this unsettled problem has brought upon Ireland. Fortunately, however, there are not even two parties of extremists who believe in the probability of civil war, and one set of extremists in a nation of essentially moderate and well-disposed people will have some difficulty in making Ireland follow the example of other countries faced with the same problem.

Irishmen plead that as the word "Ulster" is misused in this connection, so is the word "coercion." The coercion in question is the same as that to which all minorities have submitted. It does not stand for the forcible oppression of an independent people by an alien government, for, whatever their political origin, Ulstermen are self-confessedly and aggressively Irish. They are asked to rid themselves of their hallucinations fostered by those who exploit them brazenly. It is a peculiar fact that the people of "Ulster" have never yet been allowed to speak for themselves. The Catholic peasantry became articulate in the person of Michael Davitt, the Catholic worker in James Connolly, both notable spokesmen of the ideals of democracy, it is interesting to state. Orangeism relies upon lawyers and capitalists for the expression of its views, and these representatives have a consistent record of opposition to every progressive measure passed by the House of Commons and to every progressive idea which has captured the Irish people. To witness the savage carnivals, the "annual brain storm," as it has been termed, in which "Ulster" renews its barbarous hatred of the phantoms which blind the people to real issues, is to understand the imperative necessity of liberating the victims. They can be freed not by special recognition of their primitive tribalism, but by sharing the common duties and privileges of Irish self-government.

Senators, if there be a free Ireland, there will be a free "Ulster."

STATEMENT SUBMITTED BY DISTRICT ATTORNEY JOSEPH C. PELLETIER, OF BOSTON, FOR THE BENCH AND BAR COMMITTEE OF THE IRISH VICTORY LEAGUE.

After hearing the wonderful presentation of the case against the proposed league of nations set forth in such logical, powerful, and truly American spirit, I feel the thrill of the schoolboy after first learning the story of Washington and the patriot fathers who won our independence and made possible this great Republic.

Every man of Irish blood or descent, every man from the country of oppressed peoples, felt that the 14 points laid down by President Wilson justified the last sacrifice and the greatest conceivable loss. We entered the World War for humanity, for democracy, that men everywhere might be lifted from oppression and restored to their God-given right of self-determination. Which of all the subject peoples of the world so nearly fell within the limitations prescribed by our President, which of them all so clearly appealed to the American heart and head and hand as the republic of Ireland?

Always a nation, ever protesting foreign oppression, more recently adopting a free government by public vote, to-day as ever held in subjection by the armed forces of the dominant aggressor of 700 years, Ireland claims her right to recognition, her right to the fruits of this great world conflict, and the American people will not deny her rights. The league of nations as presented ignores the declaration of President Wilson, ignores the right of the subject people of Ireland, ignores the government of the republic of Ireland lawfully set up—to adopt it as written is to deny the principles upon which we entered the war and to say to subject peoples, unless the Big Four say so you shall not be recognized, you must invoke bloodshed and war to assert your rights, and we will use our joint united forces to keep you down.

Gentlemen, let there be no league based on fraud, on the rule of might! Unless the republic of Ireland is openly acknowledged, let us refuse to join in a conspiracy to cheat the downtrodden of the world! Let us insist that the 14 points be accepted as declared, not subject to hidden treaties and agreements making them null and void.

STATEMENT OF REV. F. X. MCCABE, C. M., LL. D., PRESIDENT DEPAUL UNIVERSITY, CHICAGO, ILL.

I would like to present before your honorable body this short statement. The war was fought, according to the pledges made to the people of this country by the President of the United States, to put an end to all autocratic forms of government, and thus make the world safe for democracy; to liberate the nations held in bondage by stronger powers and give them the opportunity of selecting their own form of government. On the strength of these pledges American men fought and died, and their sacrifices and valor won the war. The time for making good the pledges has come. As American citizens we have done our part and more than our part. We have a right to demand that the pledges made be kept and can not tolerate post-armistice interpretations made by the Chief Executive for the purpose of evading the fulfillment of those pledges. We can not as American citizens tolerate a league of nations that impairs the sovereignty of these United States. We believe that your committee will stand firm and save our country from the catastrophe of being made the cat's-paw in European politics. We feel that you can see that both the treaty and the league of nations make the two greatest empires of the world stronger than ever, and place our country between them to be crushed by their combined force any time they see it to their interest. The giving of Shantung to Japan and the refusal to recognize the rights of the people of Ireland are crimes against the democratic ideals of our country, branding us before the world as absolutely faithless to the men that died, to the men that fought, to the American people, and to the oppressed nations of the world. In the name of justice and decency repudiate the league of nations and demand the fulfillment of America's word of honor.

JOINT STATEMENT OF REV. JOHN J. MORAN, OF YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO, AND CHARLES P. MOONEY, OF CLEVELAND, OHIO, REPORTING IN BEHALF OF THE STATE CONVENTION OF THE ANCIENT ORDER OF HIBERNIANS OF OHIO.

GENTLEMEN OF THE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE:

Ireland has, by its recent vote at the last parliamentary election held in that country, given expression to its demand for complete independence and voiced its opposition to a union with Great Britain by a vote of 1,516,779 in favor of an Irish republic as against 308,713 votes in favor of the union. As the men who advocated complete separation had been leaders of the revolution of 1916, and most of them had just been released from British prisons because of their part therein, they squarely raised the issue of complete separation in their campaign for election. There can be no question raised that the Irish people misunderstood the issue involved in that election. It was an overwhelming majority of the people of Ireland expressing the right of self-determination and expressing their desire to establish an Irish republic and govern themselves.

Since that election, the executive officers have been elected and are now in a position to take over the government of that country and perform all of the functions of government so that the question of separation of Ireland from England is not one that may become a serious problem in the future. It is the present existing condition—a condition which has resulted in the occupation of Ireland by a large military force with all the paraphernalia of war. Large districts throughout Ireland have been occupied and the free movement of the people has been repressed in the same manner as the movements of the Belgians were repressed during the invasion of that country by Germany; in other words, Ireland to-day is in a condition of insurrection and England is using the same methods that were used by Germany when they occupied Belgium. The right of self-government of Ireland and the expression of the people for separation was supported by the American people as enunciated by our President that small nations desiring self-government and giving expression to that desire would have the protection of this great Republic in establishing a government suitable to their desires and wishes. The effect of article 10 of the covenant of the league of nations is to completely withdraw that promise of protection and to declare instead that we will not permit small nations, excepting such as were in possession of the enemy, to establish and exercise the rights and functions of independent government.

The men who are fighting for the covenant of the league of nations as it now exists with article 10 included therein are as false to the principles under which we were asked to enter the war as a human being can be false to any principle, because in accepting article 10 we are doing the reverse of what we promised to do. You may ask what effect article 10 of the league of nations will have on Ireland? This question involves the present international status of Ireland as distinct from the wishes of the people as expressed in the last election. Under international law, Ireland is recognized as an integral part of the British Empire and I presume in considering article 10 you are bound to recognize her status as such. This being so, in adopting that part of article 10 which reads as follows:

"The high contracting parties undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all States members of the league. In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the executive council shall advise upon the means by which the obligation shall be fulfilled."

In other words, you are undertaking to pledge this great Republic to continue Ireland as a part of the British Empire, and under article 11 you are placing in the hands of the countries party to this treaty, namely, the United States, Great Britain, Japan, France, and Italy, and such other countries as may become a party to the league, the power of determining for this body the necessity of entering into a war with any country that should attempt to assist the Irish people in their struggle for independence. This is not a possibility, as it has arisen in the history of Ireland in the last three centuries. In 1601 Spain landed armed officers in Ireland for the purpose of assisting the Irish people in securing its independence. If there had been a league of nations at the time, the league under articles 10 and 11 would be obliged to come to the assistance of England, and we, when we obtained our independence, become a party to such league of nations, we would have been obliged to enter into war with France in 1798 when Napoleon sent Gen. Humbert with 6,000 men and landed in Killala Bay in Ireland for the purpose of assisting the Irish in securing independence. International conditions may bring about a similar situation at any time.

The effect of article 10 is to take out of the hands of the Congress of the United States the power to declare war and to place it in the hands of the high contracting parties to this covenant. In other words, the adoption of the covenant of the league of nations is a surrender or an attempt to surrender the power to declare war, which is vested in the Congress of the United States. To my mind the insuperable obstacle of articles 10 and 11 is that it takes away from Congress the power of making war and places it in the hands of a body other than the Congress of the United States. The granted power to Congress by the States to declare war is a delegated one and is limited to the power expressly granted for such powers as may be necessarily implied from the granted power. The declaration in article 1, section 7, of our Constitution is, "The Congress shall have power, among other things, to declare war."

This section does not say that this body shall have power to delegate the right to declare war to any other body. This can be done only by a constitutional amendment, an amendment transferring the power to declare war from Congress and give it to the high contracting parties in the league of nations.

I am here first as an American citizen to protest against the adoption of the league of nations; as an American citizen, a citizen of the State of Ohio and an accredited representative of the Ancient Order of Hibernians of Ohio, not only on the ground that such action would be unconstitutional, but on the larger ground that it is wholly immoral for this country, the leading Republic in the world, to endeavor to enter into an agreement which has for its object the repression of the rights of a liberty-loving people to decide for themselves the form of government under which they desire to live.

STATEMENT OF MRS. MARY F. MCWHORTER, NATIONAL PRESIDENT LADIES' AUXILIARY, ANCIENT ORDER OF HIBERNIANS IN AMERICA.

Mr. CHAIRMAN AND GENTLEMEN: When the President of the United States issued the call to American manhood to go to the battle fields of Europe to vindicate American ideals of democracy none answered the call more readily than did American boys of Irish blood.

During the time our country was engaged in winning the war the women of the organization which I represent rendered splendid service to the Nation in every line of war work. In order that the service rendered along this line might be of the very best, it was my duty to visit 33 States of the Union during that time. During these visits I addressed gatherings of the members of this organization in from two to eight towns in each one of those States. In this way I had the privilege of meeting many of the mothers of the American boys of Irish blood who were fighting in the trenches in Flanders. The sacrifices made by these mothers would wring tears from the eyes of the most hard-hearted. Many of them are widows who had worked hard to give their boys the necessary education to fill good positions. A soldier's pay was a very poor substitute for the salary these boys were earning. I know well that in many cases these widowed mothers had to go to work again in order to keep the little home intact. They never uttered a complaint, because they felt that their boys were given to a holy cause—that of freeing the enslaved peoples of the whole world, among which they surely thought were included the people of the land of their origin—Ireland. And so, as I have already said, they bore all their privations cheerfully and uncomplainingly, and, besides earning their daily bread by the sweat of their brow, they also gave splended service to Red Cross and other war-service societies.

During the war, while every member of my organization was actively engaged in war work, you may know very little was accomplished in the way of recruiting new members, hence since the signing of the armistice a period of reconstruction has set in. This, too, has kept me constantly traveling from one State to the other. I find a great change in the spirit of our members, in which keen disappointment is the dominant note. The glowing words of our great President, uttered on our entrance into the World War, have no longer the power to inspire and uplift, for the people have lost all faith in them. I find this feeling of discontent not only among the American people of Irish blood but among other Americans as well. The press of America, with but few exceptions, make it appear that the great mass of the American people favor the league of nations. Gentlemen of the committee, there is a growing spirit of opposition to this proposed league that it would be well for those who sincerely and honestly love America and who wish to safeguard America's real interests to heed. It is my honest opinion that if every American was made familiar with what this league really means to America there would arise such a storm of protest against it that it would be heard around the world. Liberty-loving Americans who have a just pride in our great Nation will never stand to have this Republic made the tail of the British kite.

Speaking for the people of Ireland who have aroused the admiration of all liberty-loving people the world over by their brave fight for their national rights, I have this to say:

The contemplation of what these people are suffering to-day is the cause of great agony of mind to those of their blood on this side of the Atlantic. The sanctity of the Irish home is violated night after night. I ask you, gentlemen of the committee, to picture the condition of the minds of the mothers in Ireland—they never know from one night to another when their homes are to be invaded and the children of their affection dragged out and thrown into prison. Have pity on these mothers and refrain from an act that will continue this suffering indefinitely, for the Irish will never give up their fight for freedom while a remnant of the race remains.

The Irish republic was established according to the expressed sentiments of our great President; "the right of self-determination for all peoples" echoed around the world at the time this now famous slogan was uttered; it even found its way into Ireland, despite the wall of silence England had built around that unhappy island. The young men of Ireland were inspired with a new courage, and when they had an opportunity last December at the general election they "self-determined" for an Irish republic, feeling sure they were carrying out the wishes of the President of the United States. They still have faith in our President, despite unfavorable appearances.

Eamonn de Valera, the President of the Irish republic, is in our midst to make an appeal to the American people. He has already won millions of Americans to his cause. He is a young man who has made untold sacrifices for the ideals which he represents. Life would be very easy and comfortable did he but choose to abandon those ideals, but he has taken up the harder but the nobler cause while his young wife and his six small children languish in Ireland and sigh for the absent husband and father. Eamonn de Valera is typical of the young men of Ireland to-day. Surely to the minds of all liberty-loving Americans their cause is a just cause, and surely this is the time for America to pay her long-standing debt of gratitude to Ireland. The millions of Americans of Irish blood expect this debt to be paid, and they have a right to expect it.

STATEMENT BY JAMES E. DEERY, INDIANAPOLIS, NATIONAL PRESIDENT OF THE ANCIENT ORDER OF HIBERNIANS IN AMERICA.

To the FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE, UNITED STATES SENATE:

The Ancient Order of Hibernians, at their recent national convention held in San Francisco, Calif., last month, adopted a resolution insisting that in the event that a league of nations covenant was adopted that provision be made therein for the recognition of Ireland as a member thereof. The Hibernians feel that every nation in the world, and particularly America, was inspired to victory in the recent war by the thought that when the terms of peace were drawn up the world would be made safe for democracy and that all small nations would be given the right to determine the form of government under which they desired to live. The Hibernians are interested in this question now before the Senate committee solely as American citizens and lovers of liberty. The Hibernians are proud of the record for 100 per cent Americanism made by the Irish in this country from the days of the revolution to the present time.

When America was looking for outside help prior to the War of the Revolution, they sent Benjamin Franklin to Europe, and in no country did he receive more encouragement and support in behalf of the American cause than from Ireland. They not only held meetings throughout Ireland, but they raised funds with which to help finance the Colonies.

Recently the President of the United States, in asking the United States Senate to ratify a treaty with France regarding her boundaries, urged that we were but repaying our debt of the revolution. History records the fact that the first troops in France to petition permission to come to the assistance of America in the days of the Revolution were the members of the Irish Brigade, a part of the French Army, and the first French troops to land on our shores were 2,300 Irishmen under Count Dillion. Likewise, exiles from Ireland found their way to America and fought throughout the war in the continental forces. It is estimated that 50 per cent of Washington's army was made up of Irishmen. In an investigation made by the English Parliament at the time of the Revolution it was shown that in some parts of the American Army the Gaelic language was spoken more than the English. So that if we have any debts to pay for assistance rendered us in the War of the Revolution, Ireland's claim should come first.

As the league of nations now stands, we feel that article 10 prevents America repaying her debt to Ireland. The Hibernians sincerely trust that before the terms of peace are ratified by the United States Senate the Senate will officially recognize the republic of Ireland as a free and independent nation.

STATEMENT PRESENTED BY THE ADVISORY COMMITTEE OF THE IRISH VICTORY FUND, BOSTON, MASS.

The delegates to this hearing from Massachusetts, representing an overwhelming majority of the 875,000 persons in the Irish racial group in Massachusetts, wish to add their protest against the approval in any form of the proposed league of nations.

The enactment of this proposed league will accomplish effectually what the British Government has in various ways been trying to bring about for more than a generation, to wit, the creation of a supertreaty body, which will nullify the power of the whole people, as represented in the United States Senate, to pass on and approve treaties with foreign governments.

We protest against this treaty because of its certainty of economic enslavement of the United States, with its inevitable consequence in unemployment and attending train of evils.

Because of its geographical isolation from the sources of raw material and the buying population of the United States, New England has a peculiar interest in the failure of the Paris conference to even mention, provide for, or to regulate the "freedom of the seas," and in thus doing has, as a result of the victory over the Central Powers, substituted the menace of British sea control, based on "navalism" for the "militarism" defeated through American intervention.

From the headquarters of Tory sentiment we appeal to the American spirit, which in the first part of the nineteenth century opposed a similar British attempt to control the seas and gave to the world the Monroe doctrine.

We appeal to the spirit which, in the forties, after the advent of the iron ship, met another English attempt to control the seas by building in 15 years the largest merchant marine up to that time ever produced in the world, and contrast this with this attempt in the proposed league of nations again to enslave the merchant marine of this country.

We appeal to the spirit which built the Panama Canal that our surplus products could have opened to them the market of the Orient, and contrast it with the action which in 1913 removed by law the preferences to American shipping then obtained, and to-day in the Shantung outrage has closed to the trade of the United States a market of a half billion souls.

We protest against British dominance over the cables and mail communications of the world, and refer the committee to the recent report of the United States Foreign Trade Council on this subject.

We refer the Senate committee to the report of the Senate investigation committee of 1913 on the operations of the alien shipping trust, the conditions then complained of and admitted to exist, which remain to-day to menace the commercial future and economic progress of the United States.

We respectfully suggest to your honorable committee that they investigate the stifling of American aspirations for freedom of the seas, through the influence in the various chambers of commerce and business organizations in the largest cities in the United States, of the paid agents of steamship companies, and others representing foreign shipping interests.

We respectfully suggest that before coming to a decision on this question your honorable committee make inquiry into the action during the war of the British Government, which, through "orders in council" not sanctioned by international law or the comity between friendly nations, committed numerous acts obviously designed to cripple our commerce and trade during the war, and especially with relation to the effect of these "orders in council" as obvious preparation for the proposed British league of nations now being considered.

We protest against any situation which permits British vessels to demand and to get free wharves in practically all the cities on the Atlantic seaboard, which represent approximately 5 per cent interest on an American investment of $200,000,000, and which puts it within the power of the alien shipping trust to deny American cities the right to do foreign business through these ports, except at its pleasure.

This we do in the name of justice, of honor, and in the American spirit of independence. While the United States remains on the seas by favor of any foreign Government, this country is in economic slavery.

This is an American question. If America settles this question right and the principles under which we entered the war are insisted on, Ireland, with the rest of the world, will share in the resulting benefits.

We are Americans first, last, and always.

We ask that the present proposal for the league of nations be opposed for the honor of our country.

STATEMENT OF MATTHEW CUMMINGS, OF BOSTON, MASS., EX NATIONAL PRESIDENT OF THE ANCIENT ORDER OF HIBERNIANS.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, I believe that it is admitted by fair-minded men everywhere that Ireland is entitled to her freedom. The Governments of Australia and Canada have passed resolutions repeatedly in favor of Irish freedom. The labor organizations of England have gone on record demanding that justice be done to Ireland and that she should be allowed to determine her own form of government. The legislatures of a majority of the States in the Union have passed resolutions advocating Irish independence. The House of Representatives of the United States Government and later on the Senate of the United States, by a vote of 67 to 1, advocated freedom for Ireland and asked our representatives in Paris to see to it that Ireland got a hearing at the peace conference. The Irish race convention, representing 20,000,000 in America of Irish blood, sent three commissioners to Paris for the purpose of having President Wilson and the American representatives at the peace conference place the Irish question before that body.

The President on this country entering the war stated repeatedly that all nations must be granted the right to determine their own form of government, and more than a million American boys of Irish blood fought under the Stars and Stripes convinced that American success in the war meant also the freedom of the land of their ancestors. If the pledges made by our Government during the war are not carried out, a stigma will rest upon the splendid traditions of this country. Therefore we appeal to you as the treaty-making power under the Constitution of our country to see to it that the pledges to small nations made by the Chief Executive in the dark hours of the war are fulfilled and that Ireland should be accorded the right of self-determination. We earnestly protest against the covenant of the league of nations and ask that it be rejected as a whole. We believe that it is impossible to amend it so as to protect American rights and sovereignty. We believe that if articles 10 and 11 of the covenant of the league of nations are adopted Ireland would be deprived of her liberty for all time and that the people of that long-suffering country should be given an opportunity to lead their own life in their own way and under their own form of government, at peace with the world and established as an independent nation.

ADDRESS OF MR. SHAEMAS O'SHEEL, REPRESENTING THE WILLIAM PEARSE BRANCH OF THE FRIENDS OF IRISH FREEDOM AND THE WILLIAM ROONEY SOCIETY, BOTH OF NEW YORK.

Mr. Chairman and Senators of the committee, within recent months not only have I been made aware of the sentiments of the two societies which I have the honor to represent here, but, having addressed 46 audiences in New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire, I have felt the pulse of thousands of American citizens, and I am convinced that in the two thoughts which are all I shall try to present to you I correctly represent very widespread and deeply felt convictions.

In the first place, Americans of Irish blood oppose any such league of nations as here proposed far more vehemently from a purely American standpoint than from any thought for Ireland, a fact which is proved by the earnest and thoroughgoing approval which every audience I have addressed has expressed when I said that if Irish Americans were to be offered the bribe of immediate liberation of Ireland, with the repayment to Ireland of every penny ever drained out of her by England, as the price of their support of a league which would infringe American rights, there would not be a man or woman of all the millions of them who would consider the proposition for a minute.

The other thought is this: Two or three Senators have asserted that Ireland's real hope for liberation must be found in paragraph 2 of article 11 of the present league of nations covenant, which reads:

"It is also declared to be the fundamental right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb either the peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends."

The idea advanced is that under this paragraph a member of the league might befriend Ireland by bringing its condition under military rule to the attention of the governing bodies of the league. That is undoubtedly true—so true that the English authors of the league covenant have guarded against it by a paragraph which, I think, has not yet been noticed to-day—paragraph 7 of article 15, as follows:

"If the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them and is found by the council to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the council shall so report and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement."

It has been proved here to-day beyond even the attempt to question that the case of Ireland is not a domestic matter, but under all international law an international matter; but that is not the point; the point is that the council shall decide whether they will consider and promulgate it as a domestic or an international matter. If they decide that it is domestic, that is the end. If the people of Ireland were being slaughtered and the American people were aflame to help them, our Government could not even protest further after the council shall have decided that massacre of the Irish people is an English domestic concern. Surely it will be said the American members of council and assembly would never in such circumstances agree to such an interpretation, but if they did not and all others did, there being no unanimous decision, surely the majority decision would necessarily prevail to the extent of estopping all action by the league or its members.

And the final point to consider is that this paragraph was not in the original draft of the league made public in February, but added entirely anew in the revised draft—purposely, I believe, Mr. Chairman, purposely to further safeguard England against American sympathy for Ireland being expressed through the league. I thank you.

LETTER OF THOMAS F. COONEY AND OTHERS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 30, 1919.

TO COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIRS: The Irish race of Rhode Island, through its duly-accredited representatives, in attendance at a meeting of your committee, held on Saturday, August 30, 1919, to consider a proposed league of nations, hereby enters its protest against the adoption of the proposed league in its present form.

The reasons for our protest are: That it is un-American in that it means the abandonment of the traditions and ideals for which this country has always stood; that it creates an alliance with Europen powers and forces us to take part in the embroilments of those powers; that it means the enslavement of millions of people; and that it denies to those people the right to determine for themselves the form of government under which they want to live; and that it means the absolute surrender of the principles for which this country fought.

Further we protest against the ratification of the proposed league and peace treaty, because it fails to recognize the government of the republic of Ireland, a government that is the choice of 80 per cent of the people of Ireland, and which is prevented from functioning in every department because of the military power maintained by England in Ireland—a military that is brutal and savage in its treatment of the Irish people.

Further, it condones and perpetuates a flagrant breach of the promises made by the representatives of England in procuring the entrance of the United States into the war.

The representatives of the Irish race in Rhode Island urge upon your consideration, in support of this protest, the numberless and invaluable contributions of the Irish in establishing and maintaining the American form of government, to which they have looked throughout its history for encouragement and support of the inalienable right of freedom—"That government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth."

The protest herewith presented is submitted by us primarily as American citizens, mindful of the debt of gratitude owed by our country to Ireland, and desirous of preserving the fundamental principles of our Government in their pristine strength and purity.

THE IRISH RACE OF RHODE ISLAND,
By THOMAS F. COONEY.

STATEMENT OF JUDGE O'NEILL RYAN, OF ST. LOUIS.

Senators, as I understand, you desire to hear our views on the league of nations in so far as we represent public sentiment in our respective communities, and also what is our special viewpoint as to the effect of the league on Ireland's right, which she has determined to be a republican form of government. Together with my colleagues from St. Louis, I represent many thousands of Americans of Irish birth or descent in various organizations; also we believe we speak the sentiments of many more thousands of the race who are not in any organized bodies, but who are profoundly interested in this question and who believe that Ireland should be recognized by this Government as a republic. We may safely say that all for whom we speak are confident that if this league is adopted in its present form and this Government becomes signatory, Ireland will continue as she has been for centuries, a subject country, and under a power that has never hesitated to drain her life's blood physically and economically. Personally, I am absolutely opposed to my country becoming a signatory to this league no matter what amendments or reservations thereto may be made. I believe in its essence it strikes at and is antagonistic to the Constitution of our country and the fundamental principles of human liberty upon which that Constitution is rested. We have guaranteed by our Federal Constitution a republican form of government to every State of the Union. By this instrument we would undertake to guarantee the perpetuation of forms of government which are hostile to our own both in their principles and in their practices. That the United States should undertake to guarantee with its blood and treasure the perpetuation of monarchies and empires should be unthinkable to any sound American mind. I believe this sentiment against any league of nations so far as our country is concerned is rapidly growing, and that the great debates which have been going on in the Senate Chamber are informing and convincing the American people, who have hitherto been kept in ignorance of the facts and have been deluded by the specious pretext that the league meant peace.

So far as its immediate effect upon Ireland is concerned, I recall the question of just this morning, that Senator BRANDEGEE addressed to Mr. Walsh, inquiring if he had read the address of Senator WALSH, and what he believed as to his argument that this league would protect Ireland. Mr. Walsh answered he had not read the speech. I read every word of it, as I have read perhaps every word of all the addresses upon this subject in the Senate, as they have appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The answer is that the argument of Senator WALSH is absolutely fallacious. By article 10, we undertake in substance to respect and guarantee the territorial integrity and political independence of the signatory powers, guaranteeing that territorial integrity against external aggression. No one but knows that Ireland unaided can not throw off by force the yoke of British tyranny. But in one of two ways can the Irish republic become de jure as it is now de facto. One is by its recognition by the United States and the effect of that being to compel its recognition by England, and the other is by a revolution aided by outside power. Ireland to-day is an armed camp. It is under a military despotism like unto that to which Belgium was subjected by Germany, and Egypt is now subjected by England and Korea by Japan. If this league were joined in by this Nation, and Ireland sought to overthrow that power which now dominates her by military force and there was interference on her behalf by any other country so that the words "external aggression" came into effect, if England needed or asked our aid it would become our duty at once to give to her our military power to destroy Ireland's efforts at freedom. In other words, it is absolutely impossible for Ireland unaided to successfully revolt against English power. We would guarantee by this covenant that no foreign power could interfere on her behalf without knowing that this Nation would, with her money and men, take England's side of the conflict. That is the plain reading of the covenant.

However, my own feeling—and, as I said before, I believe the feeling is growing enormously—is that in no circumstances and with no reservations or amendments should we become signatory to the league. Not even if Ireland were independent, if she were a republic, and her territorial integrity and form of government guaranteed by this Nation, would it still be either just or wise for this Nation to become party thereto. That I say in view of what we know to be the gross injustices and flagrant violation of the rights of subject peoples that have been perpetrated by at least two of the great signatory powers and that we would guarantee if we became party, and we know not what other secret arrangements have been made by which other peoples are plundered and their countries divided like the vultures plucked at the vitals of Prometheus, Ireland would not want her liberty at the expense of the liberties of other peoples. The Senate alone stands between the people of this country and the Constitution of our Government and those who would destroy the people and violate the Constitution. Many of you gentlemen have made a magnificent fight against this league, and once again it becomes manifest that the people of this country must turn to the Republicans to save it from desecration and division.

STATEMENT OF HUGH O'NEILL, OF CHICAGO, SPEAKING AS A REPRESENTATIVE OF THE COMMITTEE OF ONE HUNDRED FOR AN IRISH REPUBLIC.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the Americans of the Irish race in the great Middle West, as in all other parts of America, urge the defeat of the proposed league of nations because it impairs the sovereignty of the United States, violates the principles for which we entered the war, creates an unholy alliance, nullifies the Declaration of Independence, creates a superstate, endangers the Constitution, destroys the Monroe doctrine, recognizes the breakdown of nationalism and the creation of an international power, gives to England the control of the seas, and guarantees to England the possession of Ireland against the wish of the Irish people.

The league of nations impairs the sovereignty of the United States because it places the United States Government under the control of a superstate operating through an assembly and a council, the United States in the assembly having only 1 vote in 45, and England having 6 and the practical control of the majority of the other votes, and in the council only 1 vote in 9 and no vote at all when her interests are at stake. Because it requires us to maintain permanent armies upon foreign soil to police the discontented subjects of bloated monarchies or crush the tumults of peoples indulging in the wild theories of socialism or anarchy.

Because it takes away from the United States Congress the right to declare war or conclude peace. Because it creates a supergovernment that would be an unrestrained and unlimited trust which would dominate our international and domestic affairs. The league of nations violates the principles for which America entered the war, and as the President, the spokesman of America, says, "We entered the war for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its people; for the rights of nations, great and small, and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their own way of life and obedience; for the reign of law based upon the consent of the governed; for the rights and liberties of small nations; for affording material guaranties of political and territorial independence for great and small nations alike.

"We are fighting for the liberty, the self-government, and vindicated development of all people." (May 26, 1917.) "And that the people of the world shall choose their own masters and govern their own destinies, not as we wish, but as they wish."

The league of nations creates an unholy alliance and violates the doctrine of George Washington as to no entangling alliances. Are we ready to admit that Washington was a dreamer, that nationalism has broken down, and that a Bolsheviki internationalism shall be the form of our new freedom? An alliance would be destructive of American liberty, and an alliance with England in a league of nations would be abhorrent to the great body of the American people.

The league of nations would nullify the Declaration of Independence because it ignores the fundamental truth declared as the basis of good government that all just governments derive their powers from the consent of the governed. It ignores the self-evident truth that all peoples are born free and equal, because it would leave the Irish in political servitude and seal their doom by article 10, which guarantees the territorial integrity of the signatory powers.

The league of nations endangers the Constitution because it suspends the guaranties of the United States and the State constitution. It limits the functions of the Congress, limits the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States, and dislodges the powers of both the legislative and judicial branches and either assumes them or places them under the control of the President, thereby making him a virtual dictator.

The league of nations destroys the Monroe doctrine, as it takes away from it the character of a national policy and reduces it to the level of a regional understudy.

For these reasons we are unalterably opposed to the league of nations.

STATEMENT OF JOSEPH P. MAHONEY, CHICAGO, ILL., FORMER STATE SENATOR.

Mr. Chairman, a time has again arrived when the Senate of the United States must exercise the power imposed on it by the Constitution for the preservation of this great Nation. As president of the United Societies of Chicago, I am commissioned to attend the meeting of your committee to-day to inform your honorable body of the views of some 750,000 people of Irish blood who reside in Chicago upon the question of adopting or approving the league of nations pending before your committee. As American citizens we stand unalterably opposed to this measure, and we most earnestly call upon your committee to report it back to the Senate with the recommendation that the Senate refuse to concur in and approve of it. We believe that the country has greater cause to-day, in view of the intrigues, secret treaties, and deception on the part of the great nations who propose to be the signatories with us to this proposed league of nations, to refrain from entering into any entangling alliance with European nations than we did at the date of the warning in Washington's Farewell Address. For more than a hundred years we have prospered in attending to our own affairs; let us stick to the old plan. Gentlemen, in the name of freedom, let us return once more to that honorable and independent position among the nations under which we have made such remarkable progress, that to-day we are the foremost Nation of the world. Let us stand firmly for the struggling young Republics growing out of the recent war, and extend to them our early recognition and support. This is the wish of the people of Irish birth or descent in the United States and of all Americans who love their land.

STATEMENT OF MR. PATRICK J. LYNCH, OF INDIANAPOLIS, IND., CLERK OF THE SUPREME AND APPELLATE COURTS OF INDIANA.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, citizens of Irish blood are appearing before your committee in the earnest hope that out of the great world conflict recently ended there may come, as a part of the fruits of victory, a fulfillment of the great principle of self-determination for all nations, weak and small, as laid down by President Wilson.

Throughout all the annals of civilization there is no parallel of the steadfast and continuous courage shown by the Irish people for more than 700 years, cherishing without intermission the hope and national aspiration of that freedom for which they have so often fought. Racially the Irish are a separate people; theirs is a national spirit; their country is their own, and has been wrested from them only by the power of might; not upon the great God-given principle of right.

At this time when the hopes and aspirations of all peoples, the world over, especially those long oppressed, is to gain their national freedom, and in the light of the charter enunciated by the President of the United States of the right of all nations, great and small alike, to live under that form of government which they themselves want, and such hopes are being realized by younger nations, surely Ireland may, in truth and justice, ask that the centuries-long struggle in this dawn of the new era of making the world safe for democracy be ended forever.

STATEMENT OF RICHARD W. WOLFE, OF CHICAGO, FORMER PRESIDENT COOK COUNTY REAL ESTATE BOARD OF CHICAGO, IN BEHALF OF THE COMMITTEE OF 100 FOR AN IRISH REPUBLIC.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am opposed to the proposed league of nations because its provisions are in opposition to the great principles for which our country fought in the big war, to make the world safe for democracy and to secure the rights of small nations. This denial of the principles for which we fought has filled the hearts of American citizens with disappointment, dissatisfaction, and unrest.

I am further opposed to the proposed league of nations because it would doom Ireland to perpetual servitude to England. To do this would be a grave injustice not only to Ireland but also a grave wrong to America.

You, gentlemen, have red blood in your veins, and you resent an insult. You are human, and you resist and strike back at anybody or anything that robs you of your property, your rights, and opportunities.

It is because of these very human reasons that the Irish question is an American question. We of the Irish race in America resent insult and resist and strike back at the enemy who would rob us and assassinate our character. England, in order to maintain her hold upon Ireland, thinks it desirable to destroy the influence, assassinate the character, and injure in every conceivable way the Irish race in this country. So that it takes 10, 20, or 30 per cent more brain and more energy for a man of the Irish race than for a man of the English or Scotch races or other races to accomplish the same results in this country. Now, there can not be inflicted upon a part of the community or a part of the nation a loss or injury without corresponding loss and injury to the community or the nation as a whole.

The stage Irishman was manufactured in the London music halls and shipped to this country to aid the deadly work of the murderer of the Irish character by that deadliest of weapons, ridicule. Newspapers, books, periodicals, the lecture platform, and more recently the motion picture—every avenue of publicity—has been used to besmirch the Irish race in America. Provost Marshal Crowder has reported that the percentage of Irish who waived exemption was much higher than that of English or Scotch or other races. But the English propagandists would have us believe differently. England has spent millions for propaganda, and the lies told about the Irish are enough to curse the world. It is, I submit, sound American policy to remove the cause of this friction, of this humiliation, insult, and injury to American citizens of the Irish race. The cause is the enslavement of Ireland by England. A free Ireland would remove the motive for English attack upon American citizens of the Irish race.

Besides, it would, more than anything else, help to bring about that which every good American citizen wants to see, that it is a harmonious American Nation, all of the races coming together in the melting pot, and commingling and uniting for the common good of the Republic. There should be no friction between the English race and the Irish race in this country, and there would be none if Ireland were free, because then the business of the propagandist was at an end. The paid lecturers spreading poison and hate against the Irish race in America would be out of a job. The Irish question is an American question, and we appeal to you to look upon it as such.

We went to war to right the wrongs of small nations, to make democracy safe for the world. Ireland by a plebiscite has declared for a republic. Indeed, Ireland is the only one of the small nations that has had a plebiscite and expressed its self-determination. How can any American consistently deny Ireland's right to a republican form of government? How can any American deny a republic in favor of an empire with a caste system which is mediocre, where the law of primogeniture and entail persists, where a state church takes part in government, where a house of lords rules with all its power of titles, wealth, and prestige?

Ireland's case furnishes the supreme example of merciless profiteering and exploitation. Let us take the figures on Irish population. I quote from a British publication, the Statesman's Year Book. It shows that in the year 1800 the population of Ireland was 6,000,000, while the population of England was 8,000,000. In 1850 the population of Ireland rose to nearly 9,000,000. The population of Ireland to-day is less than 4,500,000. The population of England is 36,000,000. John Stuart Mill, the English economist, has stated that Ireland can support a population of 25,000,000. And everyone who knows anything about it knows that Ireland can support a population of 25,000,000 to 30,000,000. Belgium has a population of 8,000,000 and is less than one-third the size of Ireland. Belgium and Holland combined are not so large as Ireland. The decline in population is an arrow sign as to Ireland's decay in other ways—industrially, socially, educationally. Before the war Ireland was doing less than one-third of 1 per cent of the export business of the United Kingdom.

The ruling class of England is blind, as privileged classes have always been blind. If it was not blind, this English ruling class would realize that Ireland fully populated and prosperous would be a better customer and certainly a better friend to England than Ireland depopulated and disaffected. Ireland would be a profitable customer of this country, far more so than countries far away whose trade we are eager to get. Ireland occupies a very advantageous position in the highway of commerce, a position similar to that of important business corners in the center of city life.

Ireland free would be a country of 25,000,000 to 30,000,000, prosperous and thriving, and of great potential value to America.

The question is asked, Would we go to war with England to free Ireland? That is not a fair or honest question. That question is not now before us. That question was settled when we went into the war for democracy and the rights of small nations, and when England accepted our aid with that declaration sent out to the world. To keep faith with our soldiers dead in France and Flanders and other parts of the world, to keep faith with the crippled and maimed, to keep faith with weeping mothers and sad firesides of America, that is the question now confronting us. We ask you to save American honor. It is not America, but England, that would go to war should you decide to preserve the faith. England will not dare do it.

STATEMENT OF R. E. O'MALLEY, OF KANSAS CITY, MO.

Gentlemen, I am here as the authorized representative of the Irish-American societies, of Kansas City, Mo., having a membership of more than 5,000 persons. I know of no better method of expressing their opinion on this important question than to file with you a set of resolutions adopted at the thirty-second annual picnic of the Irish-American societies, of Kansas City, Mo., held in Fairmont Park on Sunday, August 17.

The majority of the people I represent are American born of Irish ancestry.

In addition to the sentiments expressed in the resolutions filed herewith, I think I can say without fear of truthful contradiction that a great majority of the people of my community are opposed to the document known as the league of nations and opposed to any document that might involve this Nation in entangling alliances.

The resolutions referred to follow:

Whereas there is now before the Senate of the United States for that body's ratification or rejection an instrument known as the league of nations covenant; and

Whereas article 3 of said covenant gives the British six votes in the league's assembly to America's one, even in passing on America's questions. We, with a hundred million population, are given only the same voting power as the Negro Republic of Liberia in Africa, the nondescript kingdom of Hejaz in Asia, and the semisavage island of Haiti in the Caribbean Sea; and

Whereas under article 8 the representatives of foreign nations advise us what size fleet and army America should have; and, once the size is agreed on, it can never be increased except by the unanimous consent of those foreign nations; and

Whereas article 10 binds us to make war for monarchies against smaller nations seeking freedom from imperialism, militarism and tyranny, should any one of said smaller nations in its struggle for freedom receive help from outside sources such as was given our own beloved country by France in the Revolutionary War, such as we gave the Republic of Cuba in its struggle for freedom from the horrible atrocities inflicted on it by the Spanish Kingdom. Under article 10 we are bound if China should ever attempt to recover Shantung, which is under the peace treaty given to Japan, to wage war against a friendly people, who have patterned their Government after our own, in the interest of a pagan monarchy. Likewise, should the recently formed Irish republic resist further misrule by Britain and outside aid is given her, we as Americans are compelled to send our boys across the seas to fight a people struggling for freedom from oppression, a people that in America's struggle against the same nation that is now the oppressor of the Irish race gave their encouragement, sympathy, men, and a sum of $300,000, a large sum indeed at that time, for the cause of American independence: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Irish-American societies of Kansas City, Mo., gathered at their thirty-first annual picnic, held at Fairmont Park, Sunday, August 17, 1919, gratefully acknowledge the patriotic service Senator JAMES A. REED is rendering our country in his able and courageous opposition in the Senate of the United States to this measure, and respectfully urge Senator SELDEN P. SPENCER to join with Senator REED in an unrelenting effort to prevent this shameful abdication of this Nation's sovereignty and this unwarranted attempt to make Great Britain a superstate with six votes, while our great Republic, which is and should remain the leading Nation of the world, is ranked alongside the petty kingdoms and barbaric nations of the world. Be it further

Resolved, That we most heartily approve the Mason resolution appropriating necessary funds for the establishment and maintenance of diplomatic representation to the republic of Ireland and that copies of these resolutions be forwarded by the chairman of this gathering to the distinguished Senators mentioned herein and to the Hon. WILLIAM T. BLAND, Representative in Congress from this district; also to the press of the State.

UNANIMOUSLY ADOPTED BY THE DELEGATES TO THE CENTRAL LABOR UNION OF PHILADELPHIA, PA., JULY 13, 1919.

[Presented by William J. Boyle, of Philadelphia, Pa.]

Resolved, That this Central Labor Union, representing upward of 300,000 workmen, record its protest against the adoption by the United States of the league of nations as at present constituted. It has ever been the policy of America to encourage democracy everywhere, and it is unthinkable that we should now array ourselves on the side of autocracy by agreeing to article 10 of the covenant of the league of nations, which would compel us to aid in keeping millions of the people of the world in perpetual bondage. We abhor the thought that any group of men other than Americans be empowered to dictate our policies in peace or war. Our slogan is, "America first," and we especially approve that part of the resolution adopted by the delegates to the American Federation of Labor convention held in Atlantic City, N. J., June 9–30, 1919, which declares,

"That nothing in the league of nations can be construed as in any way interfering with the freedom of Ireland as recognized by the vote of this convention."

STATEMENT OF EDWARD F. McSWEENEY, OF BOSTON, MEMBER OF THE ADVISORY COMMITTEE OF THE IRISH VICTORY FUND AND NATIONAL OFFICER FRIENDS OF IRISH FREEDOM.

As I have stated in a series of articles published by the Boston American, the desperate need of civilization to-day is peace—from armed strife; from capitalistic oppression; from industrial terrorism; to get the world back to a semblance of brotherhood between men. Above all, the American people want peace with honor. Only two years ago a presidential election was won on the slogan that "He kept us out of war." At that time Belgium had been occupied for more than three years; the richest parts of France were in the hands of the Germans and the allied enemy was irresistibly pushing forward to control of the channel ports; England was threatened with invasion and starvation. For three years and three months the world was ringing with stories of atrocities, outrages, barbarism; yet the American people were so opposed to war that even with all the facts before them they decided the choice of the greatest officer in the world on the antiwar issue.

At this time the German plans for world control were substantially consummated, the Teutonic dream of centuries was about to come true. From Berlin to the Persian Gulf the Central Powers were practically in mastery, and with the ultimate victory which was admitted unless America intervened, Germany would retain its control over South Africa, which, with Siberia, will in another generation be the source of the world's food supply.

The imminent collapse of Russia assured German control of the wealth of food and minerals of Siberia and the other undeveloped parts of the former dominion of the Romanoffs.

GERMANS FOUGHT WITHOUT PRETENSE.

Moreover, there was no German pretense about the rights of small people, self-determination, freedom, or democracy.

German control was autocracy, based on the power of might over right.

When the presidential campaign was held in 1916 this was the exact situation in Europe, yet a majority of the voters in the United States voted to reelect the President who had asked for their support because "he kept us out of war."

When, in response to the urging of the Allies, the President, in 1917, announced that American intervention was necessary, he laid down, in language which seemed divinely inspired, a declaration of purposes which made participation seem a holy cause—another Crusade to save the world from sin; to repeat in our generation the story of the American Revolution. With purest altruism and without hope of reward, the United States entered the war to insure for the world forever the things for which Washington fought and secured by American independence.

The war was won by the intervention of the United States, and to-day, eight months after the signing of the armistice, the national delirium of joy shown at its ending has not been justified. The great, patient, loyal heart of America is uneasy. The end of the war has brought, not happiness and contentment, but doubt and apprehension.

At the root of the national distress is disappointment at the failure of the United States delegates to the peace conference to fulfill the solemn promises made to the nation when it entered and won the war; to the 4,000,000 young men called into armed service, 75,000 of whom were killed believing that they died for a high idea; and to the 250,000 more or less permanently maimed, each one a living demand for redemption of our pledges.

The altruistic and unselfish spirit which flamed into action with the President's declarations of the purposes for which he made the call for arms has not changed in the slightest. The United States asks for nothing, wants nothing, but it has awakened to the fact that after defeating German military despotism it is now asked to abandon American ideals and repudiate America. Having won the war, the United States is denied the right to dictate any vital part of the peace pledges to accept a monarchical dominance, based on "navalism." It welcomed eagerly the idea of a league of nations which was in line with the declaration which caused us to enter the war, but as the facts became known, the people are determined to repudiate the proposed "league of nations," written by Lord Cecil, which, in its lengthy preamble, does not even mention or hint at "liberty" or "self-determination," while confirming mastery of the world in the great powers. At its best, the proposed league of nations is a provocation to war, and at its worst a buttress of imperialism.

ENGLAND BLAMED FOR GREAT WAR.

The nation, willing to make full allowances for the necessary give and take of conflicting national interests to achieve the main end in view, has been reluctantly forced to believe that if the peace conference had insisted on a peace based on our declaration of purposes made before we entered the war the world would to-day be well on the road to peace, and that the seduction of American ideals and pledges by allied flattery, intrigue, and power of persuasion will, if confirmed by the Senate, establish with crushing force the secret treaty agreements, regarding which, on April 7, 1917, at Leeds, President Jowett, of the independent labor party of England, said: "The world war came as the result of England's secret treaties."

It will perpetuate the diplomatic intrigues and selfish balance-of-power agreements with their inevitable consequences of human, racial, and economic oppression, which it was the hope of the United States the war would remove forever.

The league of nations, in short, will undo the work of the American Revolution. It will make Great Britain supreme in the world. Under the pretense of friendship it is a carefully laid and skillfully worked out plan to retain, hamper, and dwarf the power of the United States to progress to its manifest destiny to be the leading commercial nation of the world, a consummation urgently to be desired in the interest of civilization, because the history of the United States has proved that its progress has ever been accompanied by a willingness to give equal freedom to all, as opposed to the repressive and arrogant overlordship which has been the distinguishing characteristic of British control, which for centuries has made it a definite policy to cripple or remove by whatever means at hand its business rivals.

It was British hatred of colonial progress and hope to destroy a potential commercial rival that caused the American Revolution.

It destroyed the commerce of Holland, Spain, and France.

It has repeatedly tried to control or destroy the commerce of the United States. Every time it has had opportunity it has shown its hatred of this country.

It has now destroyed Germany and would again control this country.

It went to war with China to force it to accept the opium trade, and then took Hongkong and $30,000,000 indemnity.

IRISH OPPOSITION TO PACT.

The Irish stock in America, whose forefathers had bitter experience for centuries of the economic, political, and religious degradation, due to English rule, has found here economic, religious, and political freedom. Their first allegiance is here. They are, above all, Americans.

Will the United States Senate, whose intimate knowledge of the various processes by which Great Britain reaches its goal, permit our best friend among the nations to be wronged; allow the principal commercial district to be stolen from China to be exploited by Britain's partner in the Orient, Japan, which did not send a soldier to Europe to aid the war?

While the nation abhors war, there is a price which is too high to be paid for a shameful peace. This is a strictly American question, yet the commonest defense of the league is that opposition to it is stirred up wholly by Irish hatred of England. That the American Irish are against the league proposed is true, but not for the reason given. The first object of every person of Irish blood in this country is the safety, prosperity, and happiness of the United States.

As they made the largest single racial contribution to the armed forces of the United States during the war, they are to-day the largest single racial force in the present struggle to save America from the consequences of the surrender of American liberty at the Paris conference.

APATHY ABROAD REGARDING LEAGUE.

This much may be said in addition—if the persons of Irish blood in the United States who accepted without reservation the President's promises and in every way met the call in men, money, and war service, not obtruding themselves, keeping quiet under a systematized campaign of falsehood and misrepresentation, would now consent to remain silent under the fact that they are under this proposed league marked to be the only subject white race on earth, they would in justice forfeit the respect of all men—worse than this, they would lose their self-respect, and thus prepare the way for an automatic discrimination against themselves in every field of human activities. As Americans first, however, they put the United States first. When its liberty and future are safeguarded, Ireland will incidentally be benefited, because there is no difference in the principle involved.

The astounding fact is that the United States is the only Nation where the league of nations is taken seriously. The apathy concerning it among the allied nations is because it is known to be what it actually is: A British plan to get dominance over the United States, which the other nations are satisfied to let happen, while each (with the exception of Italy) shares in the division of loot parceled out in secret treaties made during the war and confirmed in Lord Cecil's league of nations.

As the creditor nation of the world, the only one with no ax to grind, the United States was in a position to command compliance in the peace negotiations with the ideal which forced it into the war. At the beginning every wish was complied with. When President Wilson proposed the ridiculous conference in the Sea of Marmora with the Russian Reds the conference smiled, shrugged its diplomatic shoulders, and consented, whereupon Mr. Wilson appointed as the representative of the United States the Rev. Herron, whose peculiar notions regarding marriage and other long-observed American ideals are, to say the least, liberal. Inasmuch as the Nation has since the war become familiar with the Herron type of internationalists, who have come into prominence and power, it loyally gagged hard and swallowed. The Princes Island conference, as the wise ones who voted for it expected, never was held.

EUROPEAN "GRATITUDE" PATHETIC.

The gratitude of the people of the European nations to the United States as represented in its Chief Executive was pathetic. They believed that he was the magic worker—they wanted and expected him to give to them peace, three meals a day, and a roof over their head, and got a Pandora's box, from which the colony of mischiefs is escaping despite the assurance that it would remain closed. The world, and the United States in particular, is beginning to realize what Wellington meant when he said after Waterloo: "There is only one thing worse than defeat—victory."

France has so little confidence in the league as a power to restrain war that it insisted on and obtained a separate defensive alliance with the United States.

In the Belgian Chamber of Deputies on August 8 the premier said that the league offered Belgium so little guaranty of peace that it forces that nation to look to its own defense. Italy, which alone has been denied its secret-treaty loot, is defiant and resentful.

When the league was presented to the British Parliament its reception, according to the London press, was derisive laughter, the joke being at the expense of the United States. It was naturally not opposed.

The King of England paid unprecedented honor to Lloyd-George on his home-coming from Paris because of his diplomatic victories for Britain, and well he might. While the power of every other monarchy has been lessened, where not abolished, Great Britain is in political control of every third human being on earth, and is absolute on the seas; its only formidable European rival is out of the way; it has only one real business competitor left—the United States, which it obviously proposes to subdue by the arts in which it has no peer—diplomatic finesse, flattery, deception, intrigue.

To accomplish this end a campaign of British misrepresentation has been permitted to be carried on in this country and in South America, in which country it is designed to stifle, obstruct, and control the competition of the United States. In the United States it has largely been directed to isolate the Irish question from the other questions of British imperial policy in their relation to American interests to force it forward as matter peculiar to the Irish and by invoking religious, racial, and personal passions, in the intensity of the controversy, to sidetrack discussion of matters of vital interest.

Decided on merit, there can be no permanent union between the government theories of Britain and the United States. It is the marriage of the serpent and the dove, doomed in advance to disaster.

"MILITARISM" AND "NAVALISM."

There is no difference to the future of liberty between "militarism," as represented by Germany, and "navalism," which is the power behing the Government whose policy is thus explained by Lord Thring:

"The means by which the possessions of Great Britain were acquired have been various as the possessions themselves. What is the link which fastens each of these possessions to the mother country? The inherent and indestructible right to exercise imperial powers; in other words, the supremacy of the Queen and the British Parliament. What, again, is the common bond of union between these vast colonial possessions, differing in laws, in religion, and in the character of the population? The same answer must be given, namely, the sovereignty of Great Britain. The mode in which the materials composing the British Empire have been cemented together is exactly the reverse of the manner of the construction of the American Union. In the case of the American Union independent States voluntarily relinquished a portion of their sovereignty to secure national unity, and intrusted the guardianship of that unity to a representative body chosen by themselves."

While Lord Thring is in error in his conception of the "guardianship" of American sovereignty, which reposes in the people alone, he draws a correct picture of the power of British sovereignty, the exact opposite of the purposes of which the United States entered the war. With "militarism" temporarily defeated, inevitably to grow again if the league of nations is approved by the United States, the present fight is on "navalism," the present and future menace of world peace.

HOW ENGLAND HAS DOMINATED THE WORLD.

With the exception of one decade in the nineteenth century, about the fifties, when the United States awakened and took the control of the seas, only to relinquish it again with the coming of the Civil War, England, by the power of her navy, has absolutely dominated the world.

When the armistice was signed in November, 1918, the United States had a quarter of a million more soldiers in France than Great Britain, the balance of British soldiers necessary to equalize the number of United States forces at the front having been diverted to police duty in Egypt, India, and Ireland.

The British Navy was strengthened constantly during the war. The United States was permitted to build a merchant marine, but without freedom of the seas, which was not even brought up for discussion at Paris. England retains the power over the United States that it has exercised for a generation to control rates, freights, sailings, and ports, which leaves this country in commercial bondage to it. As a result the workingmen of the United States are in imminent danger of being unemployed for four months of each year.

Secretary Lansing made two statements in his testimony before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, either of which is sufficient to justify the defeat of the league of nations as being inimical to the future of American commerce.

One was that the "freedom of the seas was not discussed." While it later appeared in President Wilson's belated submission of his draft that a weak and innocuous mention was made of this subject, it did not even skim the surface of "navalism," the real menace of world peace. And the other, that the secret treaty between England and Japan, by which England gave something she did not own to a nation which had no right to receive it, was known before the terms of the peace treaty were decided, and objection was made against it to Mr. Wilson, without effect, by himself and his colleagues.

When the nation contrasts the verbal chastisement which Mr. Wilson gave Italy over the Fiume claims, largely of academic interest to this country, with his concealment and final indorsement, against the advice of his colleagues, of the pro-English-anti-American antihonor and decency Shantung deal, it must be admitted that the American people have shown wonderful patience, although there is little doubt of their resentment and determined opposition, which will be shown in the final action of the United States Senate.

The President has decided, however, that the league must go through, whatever happens, and, with his marvelous skill in phrasing, dragged into his address to Congress on the "cost of living" an appeal to wage earners to come to his assistance. Before doing this workmen and manufacturers should consider the consequences to themselves, their families, and the Nation.

Sir Walter Raleigh said that the control of shipping meant control of world trade, and this meant control of the world.

For more than 20 years the need of a foreign market for the surplus products of the United States has been manifest. To facilitate access to the trade of the Orient and the Far East, which is thrown away by the Shantung steal, President Roosevelt built the Panama Canal to offset the advantages to British shipping of the Suez Canal. When it was completed an advantage to American ships using it was given by law. This displeased Great Britain, which protested without effect until the Democratic administration came into power in 1913, when, in violation of campaign promises, the law was repealed.

Britain was not only mistress of the seas, but could and did control adversely the internal policies of this country designed to encourage and extend our sea power.

Under improved methods of production, tremendously stimulated by the war, the workers of the United States can produce in eight months all that the country can consume in a year. The solution of unemployment and its accompanying evils is in disposing of our surplus products of manufacture in the open markets of the world. The neglect, as admitted by Secretary Lansing, even to discuss at Paris the matter of the freedom of the seas is unexplainable, when we realize that in a United States Senate investigation held in 1913, recorded in several volumes of testimony, it was conclusively demonstrated, and admitted by the representatives of the Shipping Trust, that under trust methods it was impossible for the United States before the war to build or maintain a merchant marine.

HOW FOREIGNERS HIT BOSTON PORT.

A small body of foreigners sitting in an office in London could, and did, not only determine the price and character of American freight, but could determine and limit the ports in America from which freight and passengers could be sent. Means were provided where competition by independent American transportation companies was made impossible. Baltimore, Boston, and Philadelphia were forced to build and maintain expensive marine terminals, the use of which the Shipping Trust received free, while the alien ships received these favors had to pay for similar facilities in their home ports.

This was possible only because it was within the power of the Shipping Trust to close to foreign trade any one of these ports refusing to comply with its demands.

Neglect of the United States after the Civil War to maintain its sea strength left it at the beginning of the great war with its merchant marine only two-fifths what it was in 1855 and substantially the same tonnage as the United States had in 1810.

Under Shipping Trust control, exports of the United States were restricted largely to the food and raw materials which Europe could not get along without.

As a result of this control, the price of products, such as cotton, copper, potash, food, meat, and grains was in most cases dominated in England, and in some combinations by England and Germany together.

ENGLAND FLOUTS AMERICAN RIGHTS.

During the war England contemptuously disregarded and opposed our business rights. It held up our ships dealing with neutral nations, blacklisted and confiscated our products, and refused to permit our doing business with neutral countries, while it sold the same kind of goods to these neutrals. In its effort to get control of trade formerly done by Germany it shut us out of South Africa. When our progressive manufacturers attempted to build up the dye industry it put embargoes on exports to the United States of logwood and barks from Central America—all this through its control of the seas.

Cotton grown in the Southern States was sold by English middlemen to continental European manufacturers at a lower price than the same cotton could be bought by cotton manufacturers in New England. Of eighteen millions' worth of manufactured cottons imported into Argentina the year before the war, the United States, the greatest producer of raw cotton in the world, sold but $300,000 worth.

One can not read a daily paper without seeing various items which indicate that England has her finger in every business pie in all corners of the world.

Further, nothing in the league of nations prevents—in fact, it encourages—the right of England and Japan to prefer each other in their respective colonies and thus automatically to discriminate against the products of the United States.

Nothing in the league regulates or prevents shipping arrangements to be carried so far as to create lower rates for Japanese and British shipping than for United States commerce.

ANOTHER BLOW TO AMERICAN TRADE.

In June, 1916, there was held at Paris an "economic alliance" of the Entente Powers, which, while the purposes were disguised, was actually designed to substitute a system of trade preferences for the most-favored-nation relation upon which the commercial intercourse of Europe and America rested before the war.

It was openly stated at this Paris conference that this would operate against the competition of the United States, and carry its commerce below normal equity in world commerce.

The feeling of the British shipping interest toward the United States was expressed in the following quotation under date of August 10, 1916, from Fairplay, the leading journal devoted to shipping finance in England:

"America so far has evaded the fight, but she is bound to recognize two things (apart from the fact that we are not out to be beaten): Firstly, that the nations who win this war, whether they be the Allies or the Central Powers, will not be in a temper to stand any nonsense from any neutrals; that the winning combatant countries will represent the main armed forces of the world, and that no one else will be in the running. Secondly, America will appreciate that the Allies, pace Mr. Asquith, do intend, where it pays them to do so, to put up a tariff wall between themselves and neutrals. They mean to restore themselves and to become self-supporting—at some expense it may be while the operation lasts, but certainly not for the benefit of neutrals. And if this be so, then America has perhaps a somewhat awkwardly restricted market. She has already experienced the pleasure of a Chinese boycott, but at the close of the war she will be facing as a competitor a Japan which economically, financially, and by treaty is a vastly different proposition from the Nation which could be openly flouted over California issues a few years back."

WRITTEN AFTER SECRET PACT WITH JAPAN.

The fact that this friendly comment was written shortly after the secret treaty between Japan and England was made is so significant that comment is not necessary.

In January, 1917, at the very time when Balfour and Viviani were in the United States pleading with President Wilson for American intervention, a great convention was being held at Pittsburgh by the United States National Foreign Trade Council, at which 1,000 delegates from the largest business concerns in the United States were protesting against the action of the Paris alliance and devising methods to avert its threatened consequences.

It is believed by many that the growth in United States exports during the war is a healthy indication of progress and that we are on a firm foreign-trade basis. It is, in fact, quite the contrary, because this increase has been brought about almost wholly by the export of war needs, which substantially ceased with the war. Our trade balance during the war on a peace basis went steadily downward. We gained money during the last five years in our foreign trade, but not business.

Nothing practical has been done by the United States Government to stabilize our foreign commerce and the league of nations threatens it with paralysis.

A most important but little considered factor in British plans is its control of the mechanics of news distribution. Through this power it could and did during the war refuse to neutral nations the right to communicate with each other on their strictly neutral business and personal matters. Before the war merchants in the United States complained repeatedly of interference with their mail and cables.

SO-CALLED "LIBERTY" MEANINGLESS.

While the world is compelled to get the consent of any one nation to sail the seas or freely to communicate with each other, the liberty for which the war was won is a meaningless word. Under date of August 8, 1919, the United States Foreign Trade Council announces the appointment of a committee to take up the matter of American systems of cables and wireless. Present conditions are described as "intolerable."

Any nation that, in addition to control of the seas (which Great Britain has under the league) can dominate the world's food supply of the earth, is double master of the world's destiny. In 1912 James J. Hill called attention to the progressive diminution in food production of the United States, and looking ahead not for a year, but a generation, there is no question but that the United States and Canada are fast getting in a position where they will not be much more than able to feed themselves. The same conditions apply in South America and Australia. If the peace treaty and league are approved, England, which can not produce within its own island boundaries food enough to supply it for more than two months in the year, is in control of the future food supply of the world.

When the attempt was made by Cecil Rhodes to reduce the Boer Republic to vassalage to Great Britain, afterwards successful, after one of the most iniquitous wars in the world's history, he openly declared it his ultimate purpose to paint the map of the world red, and as the first step to run a railroad line from Cairo to the cape.

The treaty of peace has actually painted Africa red, and it is important for us in this country to know that in Africa there has been turned over to England one of the largest potential food areas left in the world, and American assistance is also being exerted to place Siberia, the second largest potential unused food-supply area in the world under the control of Great Britain.

WHEN BRITISH ATTITUDE WILL CHANGE.

A Great Britain freed from dependence on the food supply of the United States will be a vastly different nation to deal with than a Great Britain which would starve without us.

Since the war, the United States has become the creditor nation of the world. If we gauge correctly the sentiment of the people of this country we are safe in assuming that the tremendous debts due the United States by the rest of the world will not be used as a source of exploitation, coercion, or oppression, but since we are in the dominant financial position by virtue of our national resources there is no reason why we shall permit injustice to be done the people of our country by allowing British financial manipulation to neutralize this situation adversely to our national interest.

England has a floating debt of twenty-seven billions, eight and a half of which comes due this year. There is a balance in favor of the United States of more than four billions. On the ordinary basis of business England is to-day bankrupt, with internal, economic conditions making it worse.

There are signs and portents of a secret campaign now beginning, which has for its object the purpose of repudiating not only the interest but the principal of the United States war loans. It may be that something of this nature must be agreed to by the United States to save the world, but whatever action is taken must not be to restore England's lost financial leadership but equally to sustain the credit and economic security of all nations alike. Only a rigid inquiry by the Congress into these questions, and especially as to the process by which the exchange value of the pound sterling is being maintained at what many believe to be an artificial ratio, at the expense of the United States, will enable the people to deal fairly with debtor nations, and in the real spirit of world peace determine the problems and responsibilities of the position of the United States as a creditor for the world.

MAY CLOSE FAR EASTERN "OPEN DOOR."

Aside from the humiliating betrayal of China, our best friend and most powerful potential partner among the nations, in its sacrifice to the commercial ambition of England's ally and secret partner, Japan, the people of the United States are vitally concerned in the control of the "Key to the Orient" by Japan and England. Hongkong, the other important entrance to China, is also in control of Great Britain, whose joint control with Japan of Kiaochow will mean the abandonment of the policy of the "open door" established as a result of American diplomacy. It will give monopoly to the two principal competitors of the United States to a market of a half billion people. While the principal opposition to the Shantung pact is based on our betrayal of a friend, the commercial consequences to America of approving any league which shuts it out of the "open door" to the Orient merits serious consideration.

Other items might be added to this protest. The tremendous expansion during the war of the United States merchant marine on an oil-burning basis frees this country from the dependence on English coaling bases throughout the world, which have been the principal sources of her sea strength. The change of motor power from coal to oil would have given opportunity, under real "freedom of the seas," for the United States to compete on a basis of equality. British control of the oil-fuel fields in Russia, China, and Mexico should be denied and these localities made free for themselves and the world.

These considerations are presented in the belief that they are American issues vitally connected with the discussion regarding the league of nations, which, as proposed, settles every one of them adversely to the United States.

If America is true to herself in this crisis, the decision of the United States Senate will transform and purify the politics, policies, and business practices of the whole world.

STATEMENT OF DANIEL T. O'CONNELL, DIRECTOR OF THE IRISH NATIONAL BUREAU.

The wave of spontaneous support of the cause of Ireland that has swept America and finds voice at this hearing is convincing proof that the people of the United States demand that Ireland be free.

The teachings of Washington, Jefferson, Patrick Henry, John and Samuel Adams, John Hancock, James Otis, and the patriots who founded the United States have not been forgotten. America is aroused in defense of the liberties the Revolutionary patriots won for the colonists, their descendants, and the millions of immigrants and their descendants who found under the Stars and Stripes protection from oppression and all the privileges of human liberties.

The league of nations treaty now before the Senate must be rejected. It is the product of British scheming. If ratified, it will destroy our most cherished traditions, and Ireland will be more fettered by British chains than ever before.

STATEMENT OF KATHERINE HUGHES, SECRETARY IRISH NATIONAL BUREAU.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in 1916 hero hearts in Ireland again rose in armed rebellion and proclaimed, "in the name of God and of the dead generations from which she receives her old traditions of nationhood," that Ireland had a God-given right to freedom.

They fell—Ireland's latest of hero rebels—but in the travail of 1916 the Republic of Ireland was born. This Republic lives to-day, as truly a Republic as that of America in 1778, when its Congress, through its envoy, Franklin, pledged itself to aid in the liberation of Ireland if her oppression by England continued.

This Republic of Ireland has to-day the recognition of but one State—that of Russia—as the American Republic in its infancy had only the recognition of France.

America's recognition to-day would make Ireland an independent nation without a drop of bloodshed and only a passing protest from England, so lately America's ally in a war for democracy.

JOINT STATEMENT OF MICHAEL L. FAHEY, PAUL F. SPAIN, AND JOSEPH T. BRENNAN IN BEHALF OF THE BENCH AND BAR COMMITTEE OF BOSTON, MASS.

Ireland's claim for independence was given a new birth upon the declaration of President Wilson when our Nation joined in the contest for the defeat of Germany. For centuries her patriots had waged the fight for freedom against a world tyrant, against a people who dominated through force, a people who ruled with an iron hand, whose hands were red with blood, and who were guilty of the most abominable crimes.

What country in all the world has suffered as Ireland in the contest to regain independence? The most outrageous crime, and the one to which little attention has been given, which England perpetrated upon the Irish people occurred during the nineteenth century, when, through its cruel laws the Irish people were scattered throughout the world. But that result, as shown to-day, strengthened her people, and to-day their power will be shown to be sufficiently strong to compel England to grant to Ireland the independence her people have long prayed for.

THE CASE FOR THE GREEKS.

The CHAIRMAN. We will hear the Greeks at this time, whom we appointed to hear this morning. The hearing was unavoidably postponed and we will give them one hour, which is as much time as we can devote to their hearing, inasmuch as we have to finish this other hearing subsequently.

STATEMENT OF MR. WILLIAM S. FELTON.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Felton, you reside in Salem, Mass.?

Mr. FELTON. Yes.

Senator KNOX. Were you at the Paris conference?

Mr. FELTON. I appear as president of the National Congress of the Friends of Greece. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, a convention was held last week in Washington comprising 350 delegates from all over the country, representing 75 cities and towns. They gathered in Washington to express their views, and to bring those views upon the question of the disposition of Thrace to the President and to the Senate of the United States. There are approximately 500,000 Americans of Greek origin and descent in this country, of whom 60 per cent are American citizens.

Interested in this convention and represented by what might be called non-Grecian delegates are a very large number of liberty-loving Americans, who sent delegates from their number to join with the Grecian-American delegates. This convention left behind, authorized to represent it upon this occasion, a committee of four gentlemen, of which the chairman is Prof. George M. Bolling, professor Greek language and literature at the State University of Ohio, at Columbus. Prof. Bolling has also been professor of comparative philology and Sanskrit, and has contributed upon these subjects a number of well-known technical articles and works. Mr. N. J. Cassavetes, director of the Pan Epirotic Union, organized by Americans of northern Epirotic origin, its purpose being to bring to the attention of the American people the desire of the Christian northern Epirotic populations for union with Greece. Mr. Cassavetes is the chairman of the advisory committee of the Massachusetts organization on Americanization. The third member of the committee is Mr. Constantine C. Moustakis, of Salem, Mass., chairman of the educational committee for Greek immigration in Massachusetts. The fourth member of the committee is Paul Demos, a lawyer of Chicago, a member of the faculty and board of administration of the Chicago Law School, president of the American Association of the Greek Community of Chicago, and now chairman of the Greek branch of the Americanization committee in Chicago, formerly secretary of the Chicago Liberty loan committee, foreign language division.

Before presenting Prof. Bolling, Mr. Chairman, I desire to read a brief letter, which I think will make its own appeal.

It is from a Greek girl in the city of New York and reads as follows:

AUGUST 24, 1919.

Hon. WILLIAM S. FELTON,
Chairman Delegation of the Committee of the Friends of Greece, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: I am a poor little Greek girl, 16 years old. I have given to United States all I had.

My dear brother, Dannis Malfreda, before he volunteered in the Army, he was with me in New York. He went to France and he died there for liberty. He died in France; he never came back to me. He left me in New York all alone. He died for liberty, justice, and democracy.

Please tell the Americans, tell the American women, tell the American girls that lost their brothers like myself to help you, to speak to our President to give Greece her rights. Please tell them to help the Greek girls and women get their freedom from the Bulgarians and Turks.

I wish I was a man to come and speak to the President myself. The Greeks and the Greek women of Thrace they prefer to die but not to go under the Bulgarians.

From a little girl that lost her brother in the war for liberty.

EUGINIA MALFREDA.
New York, N. Y.

Mr. Chairman, I now have the pleasure of presenting Prof. Bolling, who will conduct the hearing from this point.

STATEMENT OF PROF. GEORGE M. BOLLING.

Prof. BOLLING. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, Mr. Felton has just read to you a very touching appeal, and he has spoken of the congress that has sent us, and of what it represents directly. I should like to emphasize, first of all, that it represents also, among others, Americans. Their number it is impossible to compute, but I have in mind all those who recognize the indebtedness of the modern world to ancient Greece, who admire and love the heroic spirit of self-sacrifice with which the Greeks have thrown themselves into our great struggle for liberty and who believe that Greece, under the leadership of Eleutherios Venizelos, is pursuing a policy characterized by wisdom and moderation and conducive to the peace and happiness of the world.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are here above all as Americans. Our friendship for Greece has given us knowledge of certain facts, has enabled us to gain certain points of view which are not accessible to all of our fellow citizens. We desire now to serve America by presenting to you this knowledge and these points of view, believing that you will find them of value in the consideration you are about to give to our treaties with the allies of the Central Powers, Bulgaria and Turkey.

The question on which all hinges is the disposition to be made of Thrace, and, with your permission, we shall confine ourselves to that question.

To define sharply the conclusion at which we have arrived, I shall quote the pertinent paragraph in the resolution introduced by Senator KING on August 13 and referred to your committee:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that in the treaties of peace with Bulgaria and with Turkey western or Bulgarian Thrace, including Adrianople, to the line from Enos, on the Ægean Sea, to Midia, on the Black Sea, should be awarded to Greece, proper facilities for Bulgarian commerce to be reserved at Saloniki, Ravalla, and Deleagatsh."

The solution there proposed is in substantial agreement with the request of Greece as presented by Mr. Venizelos. In the peace conference it is indorsed by the delegates of Great Britain, of France, of Italy, and of Japan. It had the support, we are told, of the first experts attached to our delegation in Paris. But the latest report is that our new experts have reached other conclusions, so that our delegates to the conference are now urging, in opposition to all of our Allies, a very different settlement of the question; and one, too, which is open to the gravest objections.

We ask, Mr. Chairman, that you, your committee, and the Senate use all the powers intrusted to you by the Constitution to secure such treaties with Bulgaria and Turkey as shall conform to the spirit and substance of Senator KING's resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. Do I understand you to say—and I know that you are informed on the subject—that our delegates array themselves as against giving Thrace to Greece?

Prof. BOLLING. That, we understand, is the only hitch to the solution of the question.

Senator KNOX. I think that is correct. That is the way I understood it.

The CHAIRMAN. I want to have it appear clearly in the record.

Senator BRANDEGEE. It was in the newspapers the other day that Assistant Secretary Polk had arrived at a compromise of the question. Do you know whether that is true or not?

Prof. BOLLING. Are you referring to the article published a week ago in the New York Times?

Senator BRANDEGEE. I think it was about that time, yes; in which compromise one-third of Thrace was to be given to Greece.

Prof. BOLLING. We have no direct information on the subject. We have no official connection with anybody. We have only the sources of information that are open to American citizens, but we do not believe that such a plan as outlined by Mr. Polk would ever gain the firm support of Venizelos.

The first question involved is a question of fact—the character of the population of Thrace. While we are not, of course, basing our request upon historical considerations, we nevertheless believe that an understanding of the way in which the present distribution of this population was brought about will help to carry conviction.

A little more than 1,000 years B. C. the inhabitants of the Balkans could have been classified on the basis of language into three well-defined groups. The trunk of the peninsula was divided between the Illyrians on the west and the Thracians on the east, while its southern extension was in the hands of the Greeks. All three were members of the Aryan family of languages and all were, relatively speaking, newcomers in this part of the world. Two of these languages have passed away without leaving any but the most insignificant traces; for of Illyrian and Thracian, practically nothing is left save a few names of persons and localities. The future was in the possession of the third group—of the Greeks. They were distinguished, among many other things, by a genius for colonization—for an ability to go among other peoples and not only govern but assimilate them—that is, make Greeks of them in language, ideals, and feelings. They flowed across the islands of the Ægean, first to the shores of Asia Minor.

Then the tide turned toward the northern coast of the Ægean through the Dardanelles, the Sea of Marmora into the Black Sea, reaching as far as Trebizond and the Crimea. The movement began in the eighth century B. C., lasted through the seventh, and on into the sixth century. The result, as far as it concerns us, is a fringe of Greek cities running around the coast from Saloniki to Constantinople and beyond. These cities were then the outposts of civilization, but by the middle of the fifth century they were equal to any part of Greece in art, science, or general cultivation. How rapidly their influence worked upon the natives of the hinterland is unknown in detail; but prominent Athenian families like those of Miltiades and Thucydides were soon intermarrying with the Thracians and proud of the connection. There is some reason for believing that the frontier of Greek influence reached at this time a line drawn west from Midia. A century later Philip of Macedon founded Philippollis and other cities in the interior of the country and fought his way to the Black Sea at Varna, spreading Greek civilization as he went. A few years later Alexander completed his father's work by carrying the frontier to the Danube. It is very significant that his fighting seems to have begun when he reached the Balkan range—the old boundary between Bulgaria proper and eastern Rumelia. Apparently that was then the limit of the Grecian influence.

Under the Romans, the land remained Greek in language and civilization. Thrace being the last Province (46) in this part of the world to be incorporated in their empire. The Latin language never gained south of the Danube a foothold comparable with that which it won beyond that river. That points to the presence in all Thrace of a more highly civilized people, of a Greek-speaking population.

Coming to the retrogression of Hellenism in this territory, I need not trouble you with the raids of the Celts, of the Goths, of the Huns, and of the Avars. These marauding peoples came and went without permanent results. But there was another great migration which I must mention—the coming of the Slav. Its effect is seen even to-day in the presence of the Slovenes, the Serbo-Croates, and the Bulgarians in the Balkan Peninsula. The movement began from the north bank of the Danube early in the sixth century of our era and lasted to the middle of the seventh century. It affected most of the Balkan Peninsula profoundly, but the remarkable thing is the extent to which Thrace (in the modern sense of the word) escaped. The situation may be seen at a glance on the ethnological map published by L. Niederle (Slovanske Starozitnosti ii, 2, 1910, p. 296), showing the status in the seventh and eighth centuries.

The red circles on this map represent the Bulgars proper. Like the Huns and the Turks, they were a Tartar people from Asia. The modern Bulgarian is a cross between them and the Slav—a hybrid people with Tartar name, Slavic language, and mixed blood. Into the combination the Bulgar put what the Slav had lacked—initiative and organization. They established a kingdom in the region between the Danube and the Balkan Mountains—the territory that is Bulgarian in the strictest sense of the word and was known as such from 1878 to 1885. It was a State with a checkered career into which I shall not go. It dreamed fitfully of vast dominion. The dreams took shape at times and led the Bulgars to the walls of Constantinople and Saloniki. But these cities were never destined to be theirs. The dreams vanished—the Bulgar could never establish himself upon the shores of the Ægean. His subjection in 1393 to the Turk put an end to such efforts. Bulgars then disappear from history until the year 1877.

Senator BRANDEGEE. What is the title of the red-backed volume containing the map to which you have referred?

Prof. BOLLING. Slovanske Starozitnosci, by Dr. L. Niederle, professor of Ceske at the University of Praze.

I have told this story at some length to lead up to the question: Must we expect to find in Thrace a Bulgarian population or a population that is part Turkish, part Greek? On the answer to that question the whole issue depends. For, as Americans, we believe that the most fundamental of all rights is the right of a people not merely to good government but to self-government. That is something entitled to precedence over considerations of policy and over economic desires.

Who, then, make up the population of Thrace? The most reliable statistics available are those of the Turkish Government for 1912, which have been used both by Venizelos (Greece before the peace conference of 1919, appendix 2) and Prof. Sotariades (an ethnological map illustrating Hellenism in the Balkan Peninsula and Asia Minor, London, 1918). These figures come from an ally of Bulgaria, and yet they show that in the whole of Thrace there are 957,000 Turks, 730,000 Greeks, 112,000 Bulgarians, 183,000 Armenians, 65,000 Jews, and 151,000 inhabitants of other nationalities.

The Turks are thus the most numerous element in the population. But there is one thing on which all parties are agreed. Four and one-half centuries of misrule, tyranny, and oppression on the part of the Turks have rendered it impossible to plan for any continuance of Turkish Government in Europe. The Turks must either leave Thrace or accept the government of some other people. Their destiny is clear. Of the remaining element the Greeks have a large plurality, and in particular they outnumber the Bulgarians—the only others to be considered seriously—in the proportion of 7 to 1.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is possible to bring an objection to the form of this presentation of the case. I wish to consider it in order to show that the vital issue remains unaffected. It may be said that Mr. Venizelos is asking only for a part of Thrace and that our statistics should refer only to that part. I recognize the force of such an objection and will attempt to present such statistics. They can not be given with absolute exactness, because the figures are based on the old administrative district and the new lines cut across them. The inexactness, however, shall not be permitted to work to our advantage. I subtract, therefore, the villayet of Constantinople and the Sandjaks of Rodosto and Gallipoli, which lie in the main beyond the Enos-Midia line, with a population of 489,000 Greeks and 9,000 Bulgars. I subtract also four northern Sandjaks—Achi-Tchelembi, Kirdjali, Mustapha-Pasha, Tyrnovo—not claimed by Mr. Venizelos, because they contain only 9,000 Greeks to 35,000 Bulgarians.

The result is 232,000 Greeks as against 68,000 Bulgarians, or a proportion of over 3 to 1—certainly a sufficient preponderance on which to base a valid claim. It is to be noted also that the other nationalities (except the Turks, 348,000) have practically disappeared, there being but 5,000 Armenians and 13,000 Jews. In the territory claimed the Greeks are thus much more than double the Bulgars, Armenians, and Jews taken together.

Senator KNOX. Do you mean to say that the Greeks are willing to give up the territory when the population is so disproportionate?

Prof. BOLLING. That is the offer, for the nationalization of everything beyond, and concessions so liberal surely entitle them to favorable consideration when they present other claims.

To attempt a similar calculation for the various divisions said to be proposed by Mr. Polk for the partition of Thrace is impossible. The details of his plan are reported too indefinitely and his lines seem to conflict more seriously with the administrative districts. You can form a better judgment by consulting an ethnological map.

In this connection, I wish to call your attention to the character of the authors of the maps which support our contention. I have already cited the map of Soteriades. He is a professor of history at the University of Athens. His map is based upon these figures and so adds nothing more to our claim. But there is the map published by Herman Hirt (Die Indo-Germanen, Strassburg, 1905-1907, map 2). It is on a small scale, but clearly corroborates our position. Prof. Hirt is the leading authority of the world upon the question of the original home of the Aryans and their dispersion through Europe and Asia. No scholar's opinion is entitled to greater weight. His work has been largely with the Slavic languages—that fact, his German nationality, the date of his book, all combine to free him from any suspicion of prejudice in the case. Then there is the map facing page 20 in the Balkans, Oxford, 1915, written by four English scholars, Nevill Forbes, Arnold T. Toynbee, D. Mitrany, D. G. Hogarth, at a time when it was hoped that Bulgaria could be won to the side of our allies. Of these Toynbee and Hogarth are eminent names in the field of classical scholarship. Another excellent map is to be found in the Rise of Nationality in the Balkans, by R. W. Seton-Watson, lecturer in East European history, King's College, University London, London, 1917.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Toynbee is one of the great classical scholars.

Prof. BOLLING. Yes; and Mr. Hogarth, as you will remember, is the great explorer at Ephesus.

Then we have a book with quite a remarkable map by Anadore-Vergilj, entitled La Questione Rumeliota e la Politica Italiana. The map is ethnological, but it shows the distribution of Greek and Bulgarian schools and churches. I would be glad if the Senators would look at it, because it proves not only the population but it shows also that the Greeks are better educated, more interested in education, as well as more numerous than the Bulgars.

Senator SWANSON, does that answer your question?

Permit me to call the attention of the committee to the character of the maps. We know that there are others that show a different result—a Bulgarian population where a Bulgarian corridor was wanted. Soteriades mentions one such "issued under the auspices of the Daily Telegraph by the firm of Geographia (Ltd.)." I have not been able to consult it. Another was published by Leon Dominian; a third appeared in the National Geographic Magazine for December, 1918. Of the last two, one was by a graduate, the other by a former professor of Roberts College. Is there any significance in this fact?

Senator BRANDEGEE. Can you state briefly what conclusions you draw from the study and consideration of the maps and the volumes upon which you rely, what deductions you draw?

Prof. BOLLING. That the population of the part of Thrace in question is overwhelmingly Greek as compared with Bulgarian.

Senator SWANSON. How is it as compared to the aggregate population?

Prof. BOLLING. The Turks, as I said a few moments ago, have a plurality over the Greeks, a substantial plurality.

Senator SWANSON. What is that substantial plurality?

Prof. BOLLING. In the whole of Thrace there are 957,000 Turks and 730,000 Greeks. In this particular part of Thrace there are 232,000 Greeks. I do not recall at the moment, but I think it is 348,000 Turks.

Senator MOSES. When you say Turks, you mean Mohammedans?

Prof. BOLLING. Very largely. I mean people who feel that their national consciousness is Turkish.

Senator MOSES. Many of them are not of Ottoman blood?

Prof. BOLLING. Many of them are not of Ottoman blood.

I will not trouble you with the citation of authorities, nor with the statement of what we could prove by the testimony of American citizens familiar with Thrace and with the nationality and sentiments of its population. Our opponents seem, indeed, to be inclined to shift their position. Our statistics, they say, are right for 1912, and our maps also. But the Bulgars have held the country since 1913—their troops have been there during the war—and the ethnology of the country, they tell us, has changed. We should, they urge, recognize the changed condition. In plain language, Mr. Chairman, that means we should reward murder and frightfulness. Such an argument needs no answer.

To sum up, Mr. Chairman, our view of the situation is based upon the principle of a people's right to self-determination.

In the part of Thrace asked for by Mr. Venizelos there are more than three Greeks to every Bulgar. They represent a population which has held to this land for over 2,500 years in spite of indescribable cruelty and oppression. They desire ardently to govern themselves by uniting again with the land from which their fathers came. It seems to us, as Americans, a plain duty to place no obstacle in the way of this desire.

Mr. Cassavetes will now explain to you the plans suggested for the thwarting of this desire, the reasons urged in their support, and our reasons for finding them unsatisfactory.

I thank you most sincerely for your attention.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Before you leave the stand, will you allow me to ask one question? You alluded in one portion of your remarks to the books published by a professor—one by a professor, and the other by a graduate of Roberts College, and made some suggestions about that college. That college comes out in a good many of our hearings on these matters. What is its position there? Does it wield any influence in its vicinity on political questions, or the determination of any such matters as we have been discussing?

Prof. BOLLING. Senator, if you will recall in the article in the New York Times to which you allude, it was claimed there that it was Roberts College that was responsible for this new plan, and at the same time it reminded us that it was Roberts College that kept us out of the war with Bulgaria, and with Turkey. I have no personal information with regard to Roberts College. Some of the members of the committee may be able to inform you more definitely.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I remember at the time the committee was considering the wisdom of the declaration of war against Turkey and Bulgaria, that several clergymen appeared before the committee protesting against it, and that they were interested in Roberts College. That was one of the reasons I asked the question.

Prof. BOLLING. We see statements such as were made in the New York Times, which I have quoted, and I ask you gentlemen whether it is not a strange coincidence that two maps giving a pro-Bulgarian view of the situation should be that connected with Roberts College?

Senator MOSES. Did you at any time in the course of your statement, before I came in, discuss the commercial question to show that the outlets of the Ægean, which the Bulgars desire, are not necessary to their development?

Prof. BOLLING. No; I have left that to the others who will follow.

Senator BRANDEGEE. I do not know that it is germane to the subject, but for my own information, which is meager on this subject, you spoke of the Bulgarians as being a cross between two nations?

Prof. BOLLING. Slavs and Bulgars.

Senator BRANDEGEE. What is the origin of the Slavs?

Prof. BOLLING. The Slavs are one of the Indo-European people.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Are the Slavs Tartars?

Prof. BOLLING. No, sir. The earlier homes of the Slavs would be along the middle and the upper courses of the Dnieper, and going back joining with the Lithuanians, and then closely with the Germans.

Senator BRANDEGEE. Are the Tartars Mongolians?

Prof. BOLLING. That is not an anthropological but a linguistic term, but I believe that is correct.

I thank you for your attention.

STATEMENT OF MR. N. J. CASSAVETES.

Mr. CASSAVETES. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have the honor, together with my distinguished colleague, Prof. Bolling, to present to you the sentiments of half a million Americans of Greek descent. As an American of Greek descent, I desire to emphasize the fact that we have come before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee only as American citizens to plead the case of an allied and friendly nation which looks for justice at the hands of America. Whatever the decision of our Government in the case of Thrace, we wish to assure you, Mr. Chairman, that it will in no way affect the loyalty of the American citizens of Greek descent to this country, nor in any way interfere with the faithful discharge of their duties to their adopted country.

My distinguished colleague has, I believe, established beyond doubt the fact that the numerical, cultural, and economic superiority of the Greeks in Thrace is in the proportion of 7 to 1 in favor of the Greek element. This fact alone should be sufficient to induce our country to decide in favor of Greece in the question of Thrace. Unfortunately, we understand from the reports which come to us from Paris that our American delegation, while admitting the numerical superiority of the Greek element in Thrace, is not prepared to allow Thrace to be united with the mother country Greece. What imperative reasons are forcing themselves upon our delegates at Paris to disregard the principle of nationality in favor of the ally of our enemies and at the expense of one of our faithful Allies? Mr. Chairman, permit me to trace on the map the latest plan submitted by our American delegation at Paris in connection with the solution of the question of Thrace. According to this plan, the entire Province of Thrace is divided into two parts, eastern and western Thrace, separated by the river Hebrus or Maritza. Eastern Thrace is further divided into two parts by a line running from the Gulf of Saros to the town of Midia on the Black Sea.

That portion lying to the east of this line is to become international with Constantinople; the other part is to be given to Greece. Western Thrace is divided into three parts, as follows: The territory included between the old Greek frontier on the Ægean Sea and the town of Maronia between a line running north of this town to a distance halfway between the sea and the old Bulgarian frontier and between a line from this central point to the old Greek frontier is given to Greece. The portion included between the Maritza River and the Greek portion of Western Thrace is internationalized and the rest of Western Thrace is given to Bulgaria. The most important objection to this plan is, of course, the violation of the principle of nationality and that of the economic unity of the Province of Thrace. No less serious an objection is the fact that the portion of Eastern Thrace given to Greece is absolutely disconnected from Greece proper, remains suspended in the air, without harbors on the Black Sea or on the Ægean, a temptation, inviting Bulgarian aggression, with Greece absolutely incapable of rendering military assistance in case Bulgaria should decide to invade the territory. What are the reasons adduced by the American delegation at Paris in justification of this plan? In the first place, it is contended that Bulgaria needs an economic outlet on the Ægean. Secondly, it is argued that unless Bulgaria has a guaranty of a free access to the Ægean Sea, she will not cease from plotting and preparing for a Balkan war. Thirdly, it is argued that the American delegation is forced to oppose Greek claims to Thrace, in order to discourage the desire of the Great Powers for splitting Bulgaria between Roumania and Serbia. We shall take up these arguments one by one.

Bulgaria has no economic need of an outlet to the Ægean. Bulgaria, a nation of four million and a half, has two excellent ports on the Black Sea—Varna and Bourgas. Roumania, a nation of 15,000,000, has only one port on the same sea—Constanza. With the internationalization of Constantinople and the Dardanelles, Bulgaria can not be said to be barred from an access to the Ægean. The only port included in the international strip of Thrace is the port of the De-de Agach. This port is absolutely unavailable for commercial purposes. The De-de Agach is only an open roadstead, which will take millions of dollars to render available for commercial purposes. Bulgaria has held that port since 1913, and she not only has not seriously attempted to use this port for commercial purposes, but she has not passed any legislation providing for future improvement of this port for commercial purposes. She has, however, provided the De-de Agach with a very small railroad line, which was meant to feed the submarines. Nor is it possible to believe that with the internationalization of this port Bulgaria will avail itself of it. No Bulgarian Government would be willing to make financial appropriations for the improvement of this port, which will not be in the possession of Bulgaria. The eastern portion of Bulgaria, in which the two great ports, Varna and Bourgas, lie, is the commercial and industrial part of Bulgaria, and it so happens that it wields a preponderant influence in the politics of the country. It is impossible to believe that this preponderant influence will permit an appropriation in favor of improving the port of the De-de Agach, which is not Bulgarian and which will mean the death of the ports of Varna and Bourgas and the transference of the commercial and industrial center of Bulgaria from that portion of the country to the internationalized strip of Thrace. It becomes evident, then, that by internationalizing a portion of western Thrace, Bulgaria's economic necessity, if there be any, can not be satisfied.

We now come to the second argument, namely, the fear that unless we give a guaranty to Bulgaria of a free access to the Ægean Sea she will agitate for war in the Balkans. This argument may be considered from two points of view. It is either an American concession to a threat on the part of Bulgaria, or a fear on the part of the American delegates and an attempt to placate Bulgaria. If it is an admission of threat on the part of Bulgaria, the American delegation by yielding to this threat is clearly admitting that there is no moral force behind the forces of the Allies to enforce justice. If it is merely a fear and an attempt to placate the Bulgarians, the American delegation shows that it ignores the lessons of the events which have transpired since 1913, and also, it seems to ignore the dreams and ambitions of Bulgaria. In 1912 Mr. Venizelos, in the hopes of establishing the Balkan league, and in full realization of the fact that Bulgaria would not consent to become a member of that league without serious concessions on the part of Greece, offered Bulgaria not only the whole of western Thrace and a very large portion of eastern Thrace, but also the largest portion of eastern Macedonia at a small distance from Salonica. Was Bulgaria satisfied? In the summer of 1913 she treacherously attacked both Greece and Serbia, in the hopes of seizing Salonica and Monastir, and in the hopes of reaching the Adriatic Sea. The Bulgarian armies were completely crushed. At the treaty of Bucharest Mr. Venizelos was disillusioned as to the possibility of pacifying Bulgaria with any concessions lesser than the entire Balkan peninsula. This time he refused to repeat the error of 1912, and insisted upon occupying Thrace, but Russia and Austria-Hungary, each vieing with the other for the friendship of Bulgaria as a military power in the Balkans, imposed upon Mr. Venizelos the necessity of yielding Thrace to Bulgaria. Was Bulgaria placated? Immediately upon the occupation of Thrace the Bulgarian authorities initiated the most cruel persecutions against the Greek element, and in 1914 Bulgaria concluded a treaty of alliance with Austria-Hungary, Germany, and Turkey.

In 1915 France and England insisted that Mr. Venizelos should make concessions to Bulgaria in eastern Macedonia, in order that she might be detached from the Central Powers. Mr. Venizelos, while completely convinced that Bulgaria was already determined to throw her weight on the side of the Central Powers in the expectation of annihilating Serbia, of crushing Roumania, and of driving Greece to the old boundaries of 1912, yielded to the demands of the allied powers and offered Bulgaria the port of Kavala. We read in the Echo de Bulgaria of January 1, 1916, the following editorial, republished in the Berlin Tageblatt January 3, 1916:

These three instances in the course of six years show beyond doubt the ambitions of Bulgaria in the Balkans; that infinitely greater concessions have been made to Bulgaria by Mr. Venizelos and have proved futile, and that the thought of the American delegates that Bulgaria would be satisfied and placated with the internationalization of a strip of Thracian territory is undeniably erroneous.

In closing the reply to the second contention of our delegates we should not fail to understand that an international strip of territory, far from succeeding in placating Bulgaria, will only expose the eastern Thracian portion which will be given to Greece to constant dangers from Bulgaria and will encourage Bulgaria to watch for an opportune moment to invade this international strip. The unfortunate events that took place between 1900 and 1906 in Macedonia under the very eyes of the European commission of control will inevitably be repeated in this international strip of Thrace.

The Bulgarians will subsidize immigration into western Thrace, and the Greeks, in order to counteract this movement for the alteration of a national character, will do the same in their turn. Friction will be inevitable; revolutionary and guerilla warfare will take place in the international territory, in which the Greek element will side with the Greek revolutionists and the imported Bulgarians with the Bulgarian comitadgis. War will thus be inevitable. We have so far proved that the plan of internationalizing a part of western Thrace, far from creating conditions which will foster permanent peace, creates the causes for inevitable wars. Bulgaria will not be satisfied, no matter what concessions the peace conference is disposed to make. The only plan which can be a guaranty of a permanent peace in the Balkans is the plan originally suggested by Mr. Venizelos and subscribed to at first by the American delegation at Paris. That plan is, as indicated on this map, that Greece should occupy those portions of Thrace west of the Saros-Midia line to such points in the north as are preponderantly Greek, leaving the district of Moustapha-Pacha and of Tirlove to Bulgaria, because here the Bulgarian element is numerically superior to the Greek. This plan is a guaranty for peace in the Balkans, because, in the first place, it is based on absolute justice. The Greek Nation will be completely satisfied, and the better elements of the Bulgarian Nation, which are not poisoned with imperialistic ideas, will be satisfied with this solution of the Thracian question.

In case Bulgaria should think of disturbing the peace of the Balkans, a strong Greece, with a united Thracian front, allied to Serbia and to Roumania, will be a convincing argument to the practical Bulgarians that it will not pay them to launch again upon the adventures of 1913 and 1915.

Finally, we come to the last argument, that the American delegation is forced to oppose the claims of Greece in order to discourage the desires of the allied powers of Europe for the complete extinction of Bulgaria. We believe that American diplomacy can protect Bulgarian integrity by other means more just and honorable. It is not necessary to do injustice to Greece in order to defend Bulgaria from foreign aggression. But if it is necessary that Greece should give the first example of self-sacrifice and self-denial to the other allied Balkan States, we may respectfully indicate that Mr. Venizelos has already gone to the limit of such sacrifices. The Greek people have dreamed for centuries for the reestablishment of Hellenism in Constantinople. That portion of Thrace which is to be internationalized and is to include Constantinople as its capital is Greek in history, in population, in commerce, and in culture, and yet the Greek people resign themselves to the abandonment of their claims upon the most cherished portion of the Thracian Province in order to satisfy the rivalries of the great powers and to contribute as much as is within their power to the establishment of a permanent peace. But Greece not only has made concessions in Thrace, but also has offered willingly half a million Greeks on the Black Sea to make possible the creation of an Armenian State. In view of such sacrifices we hardly believe justifiable the insistence of our delegates to force upon Greece the necessity of greater sacrifice, which may exasperate the Grecian people and alienate their friendship for America and for the allied powers.

In concluding, we wish to repeat that Bulgaria has no need of economic access to the Aegean; that the internationalization of a strip of Thrace is not only contrary to the principle of nationality, but will also create causes for future wars in the Balkans; it fails to placate Bulgaria and is certain to alienate the friendship of Greece, it encourages Bulgaria to hope for a possibility of invading eastern Thrace and the internationalized strip, and renders Greece absolutely incapable of meeting a Bulgarian aggression. In other words, it strengthens the enemy of yesterday, and the certain enemy of to-morrow by weakening our ally of yesterday, who of necessity must be our ally of to-morrow. Justice and sane policy dictate that Greece should have those portions of Thrace which are claimed by Mr. Venizelos. With Venizelos at the head of a strong Greece, we may be certain that Bulgaria can be persuaded to throw off her imperialistic dreams and to recognize the community of interests between the Bulgarian and the Greek nations, the one being an agricultural country, the other a commercial and industrial one.

Prof. BOLLING. Mr. Cassavetes has finished his argument unless there is some question, which we will try to answer.

We feel that this is a simple matter of justice and have full confidence in the action that the Government will take.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will stand adjourned until Tuesday morning at 10 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 5.35 o'clock p. m., the committee adjourned until Tuesday, September 2, 1919, at 10 o'clock a. m.)

ARTICLE BY HON. HANNIS TAYLOR.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a brief article by Hon. Hannis Taylor on the peace conference and league of nations.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PENDING APPEAL TO THE AMERICAN PEOPLE TO SIGN THEIR OWN DEATH WARRANT.

(Why the Senate of the United States should indignantly reject the "Unholy League and Covenant," which proposes (1) to extinguish the independence of the American Commonwealth; (2) to abolish the existing system of international law; (3) to vest the overlordship of the world in a foreign conclave based on brute force to be applied to every liberty-loving nation, including the Irish, through the vast and rapidly growing sea power of the British Empire, backed by that of her allies, France, Italy, and Japan.)

[Humbly submitted to the American people by Hannis Taylor, author of International Public Law.]

"The modern international system arose out of the peace of Westphalia (1648), whose treaty settlement broke the old Germanic Empire into bits in order to secure to France autocratic domination. In 1815 a second peace was made at Vienna, whose treaty settlement was based on what is generally known as the balance of power. In 1919 a third peace was made at Versailles, whose treaty settlement has broken the German and Austrian Empires into bits in order that their vengeful commercial rival, Great Britain, supported by her allies, France, Italy, and Japan, may become the autocrat not only of Europe but of the world. As this Republic is the only great power, outside of that combination, capable of resisting its selfish and deadly designs, a European conspiracy for our enslavement has been organized, which is now being actively promoted in our midst by a plutocratic foreign propaganda, whose purpose is to threaten and cajole the American people into signing their own death warrant, now generally known as the league of nations.

THE ORIGIN AND REAL PURPOSE OF THE SO-CALLED LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

"The widely scattered and incoherent mass known as the British Empire, made up largely of oppressed peoples ripe for revolt, has for a long time been threatened with disintegration. As the very life of the fabric depends upon the control of foreign trade, the startling inroads made by German competition in that field, prior to the present war, had become more than alarming. In order to meet such conditions, as early as 1911, Dr. Timothy Ricards, a distinguished Englishman, outlined this scheme of a 'league of nations to enforce peace with arms' as follows: 'We are living in the days of anarchy. Unite the 10 leading nations, let all their armaments be united into one to enforce the decrees of a superior court of the world. And since it will then be the refusal of recalcitrant nations to accept arbitration that will make necessary the maintenance of any very large armaments by these united nations, let them protect themselves by levying discriminating tariff duties against the country that would perpetuate present conditions.' On that purely British foundation Viscount Grey, the famous English diplomatist, built the more elaborate plan published on May 11, 1918, in a pamphlet entitled 'The League of Nations,' in which the pending scheme was fully set forth in a tentative form. After that cunning device to hold together the British Empire and to promote its trade, through the agency of other nations, whose tariff systems were to be manipulated in its interest, had received its finishing touches from Lord Robert Cecil, it took its place in the pending peace treaty with a pompous preamble called a 'covenant.'

"The false and absurd declaration in that covenant that this purely British device was constructed 'in order to promote international cooperation and secure international peace and security by the acceptance of obligations not to resort to war' should deceive no one. Col. Watterson expressed the whole truth briefly when he said in substance that the so-called league of nations is simply a 'trap,' designed exclusively by British statesmen and baited with the word 'peace' in order to ensnare the American people. What makes that trap the more dangerous is the fact that some brilliant but illusive rhetorician has covered it all over with a veil into which he has 'intertwined' all kinds of false and fantastic idealisms. So completely has the unsuspecting soul of President Wilson been deceived by that veil that he has gone so far as to say that the making of the trap may be traced to a heavenly source. His recent address in the Senate concluded with this remarkable declaration: 'It has come about by no plan of our conceiving but by the hand of God who led us into this way.'

PRESIDENT WILSON INNOCENT OF ALL CONNECTION WITH THE DRAFTING OF THE LEAGUE.

"One thing we know for certain, and that is that to this British device, constructed by British statesmen exclusively in their own interest, President Wilson made no material contribution whatever. The famous newspaper correspondent, Mr. Frank H. Simons, who watched the entire proceeding at Paris, in declaring that the league is purely a British invention, has said to all the world:

"'It is essential to face the fact that, so far as President Wilson and his European expedition are concerned, the President came here with no definite or clear or coherent program for a league of nations. In a very marked degree the President came empty handed. In point of fact, he had no scheme, and a situation approaching paralysis resulted during a certain period of time.

"'Thus the President's position in course of time developed rather into an inactive attitude. So far from proposing, he remained silent. His real contributions, it would seem, was to veto at various points where suggestions conflicted overnight with his principles as proclaimed in America.

"'After a certain length of time, however, it became clear that if real progress was to be made it would be necessary to cease discussion of abstract principles and get down to actual construction of machinery, and at this point the President was helpless and his associates in the American commission were useless, and it fell to the British, logically and inevitably, to begin the task of constructing some framework, and this is what has been going on for the last three weeks.'

"The British went to Paris with everything ready made. The original draft of a 'League of Nations to Enforce Peace with Arms,' devised by Dr. Timothy Richards in 1911 and elaborated by Viscount Grey in 1918, was completed in the form in which we now have it by Lord Robert Cecil in 1919. How can any man of ordinary insight fail to perceive the real character and purpose of this British design, constructed exclusively by British statesmen to consolidate and perpetuate the world power of the British Empire at the expense of our own? How can anyone believe that such a fabric, in which international law in time of war is to be superseded by brute force, is likely to preserve the peace of the world? What has become of our national pride and patriotism? What would Lincoln, Seward, and Sumner, who braved the power of the British Empire even in the midst of civil war, have thought of such a cowardly and un-American surrender as we are now urged to make?

PRESIDENT WILSON ONLY THE PROMOTER OF THE BRITISH DEVICE KNOWN AS THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

"The able and experienced British diplomatists at Paris, who played with President Wilson and his pale associates as if they were children, showed consummate art when they resolved to put him forward as the apparent force moving everything. In that way they undertook to chloroform the American people while their vital interests were being sacrificed by their own chief; in that way they hoped to make it appear to the world that their scheme to hold together their tottering Empire is really an American invention. They did not underestimate President Wilson's inordinate vanity and self-assumption; they did not forget his intense British sympathies and close British connections; they did not forget that when his very able lieutenants, Senator HOKE SMITH, of Georgia, and Senator WALSH, of Montana, were bitterly denouncing his grossly unneutral conduct in permitting the British Navy to seize unlawfully on the high seas southern cotton and Montana copper he treated their protests with contempt. The British made no mistake in their man; President Wilson, while posing at Paris as the Deus ex machina, did just what he was told to do by Mr. Lloyd-George. He did not falter even when he was thus commanded to sacrifice the neutrality laws of the world (really an American creation) in order to make Great Britain the absolute mistress of the seas; he did not falter when he was thus commanded, as he now admits, to cut the very heart out of China and to hand it to Great Britain's indispensable ally, Japan, who will continue to hold it, just as Great Britain has continued to hold Egypt. He never acted on his own initiative but once, and that was when he undertook to insult the sovereignty of Italy, whose indignant protest was applauded by the whole world, including the American people.

WHAT A LOOK BEHIND THE "STAGE SCENERY" AT PARIS WILL SOON DISCLOSE.

"M. Lenôtre has said: 'History as it has too long been written is similar to stage scenery when seen from the body of a theater. Everything is in perfect order, everything is logical and in its place, everything appears to be solid and real, provided you do not go behind the scenes; that is to say, provided you do not study the facts in the heaps of authentic documents stored in the record office. For if you investigate you will discover that the building has only a front and that it is kept upright only by the aid of cords and pegs.' So soon as the historians have time to go behind the scenes at Paris the 'documents in the record office' will more than prove all that has been said as to President Wilson's utter lack of real influence on what actually occurred. He simply put on the 'tragic buskin' and strutted before the audience while the representatives of Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan carried out their selfish designs behind the scenery 'kept upright only by the aid of cords and pegs.' When all was completed our President was told to 'sign here.'

"So soon as the politicians have time to go behind the scenes at Paris they will find out that the real motive of President Wilson's grossly unlawful removal of the capital of this Nation to that city was purely personal and political and not diplomatic. It could not have been otherwise, because the functions he there performed were not such diplomatic functions as a President has the right to perform. The conduct of President Poincaire, much more deeply interested in the event, puts that fact beyond all question. He sent his diplomatic representatives to act for him, just as President Wilson would have done had he not been obsessed with the idea that the stage at Paris was the preordained place from which he could launch his candidacy for a third time to the greatest advantage. The brilliant and versatile Senator Lewis has let the cat out of the bag at last. During his recent visit to Washington he disclosed it all to the American people on July 13. The edict has gone forth; he says that the President's message 'creates a new alignment of politics in the United States. * * * The dividing line will be the Wilson foreign policy. * * * The people will not regard him as a third-term candidate, but a first-term candidate on the new issue for America.' If the Senator had followed the wise rule of Mr. Chucks in Peter Simple—'Spin your yarn in plain English'—he would have said, 'President Wilson has returned resolved to run for a third term on this platform—European internationalism against your old and obsolete Americanism.' As that mighty issue has been thus precipitated upon us, the American people should understand what European internationalism really means.

INTERNATIONALISM A DEADLY MENACE TO PATRIOTISM AND RELIGION.

"The revolutionists who are now striving to turn the world upside down hope to abolish all existing conceptions of patriotism and religion through the substitution of a new cult whose god is to be humanity and whose creed is to be internationalism, a vague formula that is to wipe from every heart that sacred something we have known heretofore as patriotism. As a typical exponent of the new cult stands M. Viviani, ex-premier of France, who, as minister of labor, gained great control over the laboring masses in that country. He was the leading member of the recent French mission to this country. It is quite probable that he may be the successor of Mr. Clemenceau; it is quite possible that he may be the next President of France. When he was here not long ago a fête was given at Chicago to the mission by a distinguished and very patriotic American statesman who, of course, was not responsible in any way for what his guests said on that occasion. The following account of what occurred is taken from America, one of the leading Catholic journals of the United States:

"'But there was one speech of M. Viviani which was not so blatantly reported; indeed, it was most carefully suppressed, though several thousand people were aware of it and many thousands of soldiers heard of it after they had arrived in France. Mr. MEDILL MCCORMICK, at present a member of the United States Senate and son of Robert McCormick, sometime ambassador to France, gave a fête for the French mission during the progress of which the former premier of the French Republic was asked to address the guests. M. Viviani was moved to reminiscence and his vein of satire led to the masterful way in which France had driven God from the State; how, after a tremendous struggle, she had driven God from the schools, and "Now," he concluded, impressively, "we shall drive God from the churches." To their credit, it can be recorded, many protested to Mr. MCCORMICK that they considered such expressions blasphemous, and they declined to remain and be presented to the representative of Gallic civilization and progress.'

THE GROWING SEA POWER OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE.

"Let us not deceive ourselves as to what is ahead of us. Collier's Weekly says: 'That August day in 1914, when the war broke out, the British Navy had a tonnage of 2,500,000 and a personnel of 145,000 officers and men. To-day it has a tonnage (including the auxiliary fleet) of 8,000,000, and a personnel of almost 500,000. This does not include the mercantile marine or patrol vessels, mine sweepers, etc., in the auxiliary fleet. There are 50,000 men serving in these.' In addition, the British Empire holds in its hands the surrendered German colonies, and the long-coveted Dardanelles, besides the Suez Canal, and a kind of over-lordship over our own Panama Canal, which can be defended only by sea power. When to all that is added the combined sea power of her allies, France, Italy, and Japan, she is not only the mistress of the seas but the empress of the world in a way in which no world power has ever been since the fall of the Roman Empire. The newspapers report that the building of British dreadnaughts is now progressing more rapidly than ever before. With her hated commercial rival prostrated in the dust, with its great warships at the bottom of the sea, Great Britain has now no one in her way but ourselves. Our day will surely come the moment that our growing merchant marine dares to conflict with her commercial interests on the high seas. After the first gun fires, southern cotton, Montana copper, and western food supplies will appeal in vain to neutrality laws which President Wilson has agreed to abolish absolutely. With starvation blockades in full force Britannia will rule the waves, if the league of nations is adopted, entirely unmolested for the first time by neutrality laws. Cicero made no mistake when he said 'that he who gains the command of the sea must obtain supreme power.'

THREE REASONS WHY THE GREAT BRITISH WAR TRUST SHOULD BE REJECTED AS A WHOLE.

"1. Because our sense of 'constitutional morality' demands that we should entirely ignore an unprecedented proceeding carried on by the President of the United States, through the unconstitutional removal of the Capital of this Nation for a long period of time, and without the authority of Congress, to a foreign country to which the great seal could not be removed. If the Senate should suddenly resolve to hold its sessions in Peking during the great debate, only the implied prohibitions of the Constitution would forbid such a course. It is beyond all cavil or question that the same implied prohibitions deprived Mr. Wilson of his constitutional status as President the moment he passed beyond the territorial limits of the United States. The admirable Campbell bill is simply declaratory of existing law. If President Wilson is not to be otherwise punished for his grave breach of the Constitution in removing the Capital of this Nation to Paris, the Senate should administer such a rebuke as will deter his successors from imitating his lawless example.

"2. Because, apart from the foregoing, the Senate should rebuke President Wilson's violation of all the rules of diplomatic propriety by taking his place as a mere delegate in a congress in which every other chief of state, including the President of France, appeared by representatives. No American President should be permitted, through motives of abnormal personal ambition, so to degrade the dignity of the great office confided to him by the American people. The recent announcement by his inspired spokesman that he is to seek a third term in order to ingraft upon American politics schemes and policies formulated in that way only adds to the gravity of his offense. Before he begins a campaign for a third term he should remember that during his absolute sway the annual expenses of this Government have been increased from $1,000,000,000 to $6,000,000,000; that a clean Treasury has been clouded by a debt of approximately $30,000,000,000, a crushing burden 'whose elongated fingers will reach down into the pockets of posterity and rob the babe unborn of his birthright.'

"3. Because the acceptance of the so-called league in any form, no matter how attenuated, will involve the making of such an 'entangling European alliance' as will ipso facto abrogate the Monroe doctrine, whose life depends upon the existence of a single fact—an absolute abstinence from the making of all such alliances. No American statesman should be so stupid as to believe that the unique creation called the Monroe doctrine, which rests upon a single fact, can be perpetuated by contract after the fact has ceased to exist. If we fall into the trap European diplomatists have set for us in this regard, we will lose our primacy in this hemisphere and at the same time become the laughingstock of all the world.

PRESIDENTIAL GIFT-TAKING STERNLY FORBIDDEN BY CONSTITUTION AND STATUTE—FIRST FRUITS OF LEAGUE.

"In the Federal convention of 1787 Mr. Madison said: 'Limited as the powers of the Executive are, it will be an object of great moment with the rival powers of Europe who have American possessions to have at the head of our Government a man attached to their respective politics and interests.' At a later day, 'Mr. Pinckney urged the necessity of preserving foreign ministers and other officers of the United States independent of external influence and moved to insert—after Article VII, section 7, the clause following: "No person holding any office of profit or trust under the United States shall, without the consent of the Legislature, accept of any present, emolument, office or title of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign State," which passed nem. con.' Such is the genesis of Article II, section 9 of the Constitution. In order to make that prohibition more severe, it was expressly provided by statute (August 18, 1856) that 'No diplomatic or consular officer shall * * * ask or accept, for himself or any other person, any present, emolument, pecuniary favor, office, or title of any kind, from any such [foreign] government.' If President Wilson sat as a "diplomatic" representative of the United States at Paris, as he said he did, he is amenable of course not only to the Constitution, but also to section 1751 of the Revised Statutes, which does not permit Congress to dispense with any of its provisions. The following appeared as a news item in the Washington Times of April 18, 1919:

"'PRESIDENT'S GIFTS HERE FROM EUROPE.

"'A carload of European gifts to President and Mrs. Wilson has been received at the White House. The shipment is in about 40 large boxes, and will not be unpacked until the Wilsons return.'

"What a princely fortune must be represented by that mountain of gifts, if their value is equal to their bulk. That phase of this astounding and lamentable transaction will be disclosed by the appraisements at the custom house in which the duties were paid. The curtain must be lifted; the people must be fully informed because their dignity and honor are deeply involved. The President can not lift himself above all the laws.

"Certainly the President is entitled to no kind of rewards from the American people. (1) Because he subscribed at Paris to a British device constructing a superstate to which the American Commonwealth is to surrender its sovereignty and independence; (2) because, in order to make the sea power of the British Empire absolute, he agreed to eliminate the neutrality laws of the world largely of our making; (3) because he there subscribed to the mutilation of our friend, helpless China, to the greed of Japan. Senator NORRIS has well said: 'In all the annals of history I do not believe there is recorded an instance of a more disgraceful and dishonorable agreement to carve up the territory, not of an enemy, but of an allied friend'; (4) because his removal of the capital of this Nation to Paris for nearly seven months, in violation of the Constitution and of all diplomatic propriety and usage, in order to promote his personal ambitions, reduced this Government almost to chaos, to the serious detriment and loss of the American people; (5) because his aggressive intermeddling at Paris with certain European affairs has made for us bitter enemies where we had friends before. Who can doubt that this pitiful episode will prove to be the most disastrous and humiliating in our history."

In an article which appeared on the editorial page of the New York American of August 25, 1919, Mr. Taylor restated his views upon the subject of presidential gift taking as follows:

[By Hannis Taylor.]

THOSE GIFTS TO MR. WILSON.

WASHINGTON, August 23.

"In the hope of breaking down and discrediting that band of patriots in the United States Senate, composed in the main of Republicans, who are striving to safeguard the American people against the most deadly menace that has ever threatened them the political managers of the Wilson administration have inaugurated a campaign of personal vilification almost unparalleled in our history. As the most potent and aggressive of the administration organs, the New York Times began the attack with great bitterness in its leader of August 22, entitled 'Unyielding Obstruction,' in which it went so far as to say:

"'The conclusion is irresistible that they are no longer concerned about the treaty; they are apprehensive only about the chances of their party in the next presidential election. They feel that they must defeat the President now, or he may defeat them next year, and to accomplish that purpose they are willing to kill the treaty.'

"On the same day, evidently through a concert of action, Homer S. Cummings, chairman of the Democratic National Committee, delivered himself in this wise at Rye, N. Y.:

"'Referring to the opposition Senators as "Senatorial imbeciles" and "wretched creatures of the Senate," Mr. Cummings declared that some of these men were "so low they would need a stepladder, to climb to the top of it, and then perhaps they could look into the subcellar of President Wilson's mind."'

"Instead of speculating as to what may possibly be found in 'the subcellar of President Wilson's mind,' his campaign manager had better come to Washington at once in order to ascertain what may certainly be found in the subcellar of the White House.

"The following appeared as a news item in the Washington Times of April 18, 1919:

"'PRESIDENT'S GIFTS HERE FROM EUROPE.

"'A carload of European gifts to President and Mrs. Wilson has been received at the White House. The shipment is in about 40 large boxes.'

"The impression here is that this mountain of gifts from kings, princes, potentates, paladins, foreign States, and municipalities must represent hundreds of thousands of dollars in value. The details, however, are shrouded in silence and mystery, as nobody here seems to know through what customhouse these priceless gifts were brought in; whether they have ever been inventoried or appraised anywhere; or what duties, if any, have ever been paid on the same.

"In the Federal convention of 1787 Mr. Madison said:

"'Limited as the powers of the Executive are, it will be an object of great moment with the rival powers of Europe who have American possessions to have at the head of our Government a man attached to their respective politics and interests.'

"At a later day Mr. Pinckney, after urging 'the necessity of preserving foreign ministers and other officers of the United States independent of external influence,' proposed that clause of the Constitution which provides that 'no person, holding any office of profit or trust under them, shall, without the consent of Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign State.'

"In order to make the taking of presents by Federal officials impossible, even with the consent of Congress, it was provided by statute in 1856 (1751 Revised Statutes) that 'No diplomatic or consular officer shall ask or accept for himself or any other person any present, emolument, pecuniary favor, office, or title of any kind from any such (foreign) Government.'

"If President Wilson sat as a 'diplomatic' representative of the United States at Paris, as he said he did, he is subject to the penalties imposed both by the Constitution and statute, in the event he has received the presents attributed to him without denial by the public press.

"The question of questions which must be answered before the present treaty is ratified is this: Must the President of the United States always receive a carload of European gifts, representing a princely fortune and passed through the customshouse without duty, every time he is called upon to function under the terms of the league of nations? That grave matter must be explained to the entire satisfaction of the American people before they take the final step.

"Mr. Cummings, who knows even what is in the subcellar of President Wilson's mind, should come at once to Washington and inform the 'Senatorial imbeciles,' who are now obstructing the treaty, on this point. If he does not, I can inform him that such a proceeding is soon to be begun in the House of Representatives as will clear up the whole matter in the manner the Constitution provides."

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a communication from the Retail Grocers' Association of San Francisco, Calif., upon the subject of the high cost of living, and also one from the University Branch of the National Association of Letter Carriers of Berkeley, Calif., on the same subject—the high cost of living compared with the low compensation of their services. They request this.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., August 28, 1919.

Hon. JAS. D. PHELAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Four hundred retail grocers in mass meeting here, Native Sons Hall, Monday night, strongly protested against President Wilson's charge that retailers are largely responsible for exorbitant prices; also statement Attorney General Palmer to Agriculture Committee that retailers are the worst profiteers. United States Food Administration's records prove these statements not justified by facts. Our margins on 40 per cent of sales, the staples, are made at less than our operating expense. We strongly protest against exemption of farmers from new amendment to food-control act, because while retailers are blamed producers are getting the money. We demand full investigation from producers to consumer. California Raisin Growers' Association, controlling 90 per cent of crop, last week fixed this year's price 100 per cent over last year. They exact this extra $20,000,000 from the consumers. California Prune Growers' Association named opening prices three weeks ago 80 per cent higher than last year. Consumers must pay this extra $25,000,000. The Rice Growers' Association here will announce opening prices soon 40 per cent higher than last year. All three crops are greatest in history. Retailers' margins remain the same as the past five years in spite of increased expense. These concrete instances demonstrate the producer is responsible, not the retailer. Request you kindly ask this be printed in the RECORD.

RETAIL GROCERS' ASSOCIATION OF SAN FRANCISCO,
E. BRODERICK, President.
FRANK B. CONNELLY, Secretary.

UNIVERSITY BRANCH, No. 863,
NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF LETTER CARRIERS,
Berkeley, Calif., August 23, 1919.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On behalf of the postal employees of this office I am asking that you use your efforts to secure for us an adequate salary increase at an early date. A joint resolution, Senate joint resolution 84, intended to grant temporary relief until such time as the Joint Postal Commission completes its investigation and submits its report and recommendations to Congress, has been referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

This resolution, if adopted, will grant immediate necessary relief, and living conditions for the families of our men will be made bearable. It is impossible to live decently on the present salary of $125 per month when there are five or six mouths to feed.

It is generally conceded living costs have advanced over 80 per cent in the past four years, but we have been allowed only 25 per cent since 1907, and that is only temporary.

In other lines present costs are recognized and salaries fixed accordingly; we can not keep pace with the progressive prices on our backward salaries.

Hoping you will give to our case favorable consideration. I am,

Respectfully, yours,

E. J. CURRAN,
Recording Secretary.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the act (S. 2236) relating to the affidavits required by the act entitled "An act to extend protection to the civil rights of members of the Military and Naval Establishments of the United States engaged in the present war."

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were each read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Finance:

H. R. 6238. An act to provide revenue for the Government and to establish and maintain the production of zinc ores and manufactures thereof in the United States; and

H. R. 7705. An act to amend section 339 of the tariff act of October 3, 1913, in respect to the tariff on buttons of shell and pearl.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the action of the Committee on Foreign Relations upon the pending peace treaty has been foreshadowed by the progress of that treaty through the committee, so that we may now clearly see what issue it is which is to be presented by that committee to the Senate of the United States. By a vote of 9 to 8 the committee has formally decided to adopt amendments to the treaty which are absolutely destructive of America's participation in it. By this vote the committee has raised the issue squarely if indirectly whether this Nation is to participate in the treaty which has been negotiated after such a long struggle at Paris and Versailles, or whether it is to discard all the provisions in that treaty that are for the benefit of the United States, whether this Government is to desert at this juncture the nations with which we have been associated during the war and stand before the world unwilling to carry to their whole limit the steps necessary to perpetuate the victory which our arms in connection with those of the other nations achieved. The committee does not do this by a direct and specific proposal to reject the treaty. Although a majority of the committee is in favor of that action, they seem to hesitate at taking it. They prefer by indirection to accomplish the same thing; that is, by adopting amendments which make the treaty impossible.

Mr. President, I shall not discuss the merit of any of the amendments. It is utterly unimportant to consider whether they are good, bad, or indifferent. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has discussed the Shantung amendment, which is said to have the strongest sentiment back of it. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has made an absolutely unanswerable argument to demonstrate that the adoption of the so-called amendment relating to Shantung can not by any possibility benefit China, in whose interest it is assumed to be proposed.

I repeat that I am not going to discuss the nature of the amendments; but I lay down this proposition, and I challenge anybody to meet it, that the adoption of any amendment to this treaty—and the committee proposes many—means its defeat so far as we are concerned.

Fortunately neither this committee nor the Senate possesses the power to defeat the treaty. It will go on; it will go into effect; it will be in effect in a few weeks; for its provisions are that when three of the great powers in addition to Germany have ratified it, it goes into operation. Great Britain as well as Belgium has done so; France will do so within a very short time; Italy and Japan will undoubtedly follow in rapid succession; and the treaty, so far as those nations are concerned, will be in effect.

How about the United States? We shall be in the attitude, if we follow the policy of folly which the committee is pursuing, of proposing amendments which are certain to be rejected. Does anybody suppose that if the Senate adopts the so-called Shantung amendment, and if the President, in the exercise of his power, sends it to Great Britain, France, Italy, and Japan for concurrence, that any one of them will concur in it? Such action is impossible and unthinkable. Great Britain has ratified the treaty, and she will stand by that ratification; France will ratify it, and so will Japan and Italy. Japan certainly would never consent to have herself humiliated in the eyes of the world and be compelled to have the provisions changed as the committee proposes. Great Britain, France, and Italy are under a treaty obligation with Japan to stand by her in the disposition of the German interests in the Shantung. How absurd, then, to suppose that those nations will violate their contract, will repudiate their obligation to Japan, even if Japan's consent could be secured.

But, moreover, be it remembered that France, Great Britain, and Italy have enormous benefits in this treaty. They can not afford to endanger it, even if they would be willing to affront Japan. They know, if the members of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations do not know, that these nations possess no further power to compel Germany to make any concessions. Gathered in council at Versailles, they said to Germany, "Sign; sign within so many days; sign here; and ratify within such a time." Germany did it. When Germany did that thing she ended compulsion. Any change in the treaty, any new treaty made with Germany, can not be made under compulsion; it can only be made by negotiation. Does anybody suppose that Germany is in any frame of mind at the present time to negotiate?

So I say, Mr. President, that any proposed amendment to this treaty, whether it is the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," whether it is good, bad, or indifferent, means that the United States retires from the treaty. We might as well meet that issue here and now. It would be a great deal better faith if the Senators who propose to advocate these amendments did so frankly and declared that they were in favor of rejecting the treaty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] has done.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes, Mr. President, as the Senator from Mississippi says, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] has done so. Much as I condemn the attitude that the Senator from Pennsylvania took here a few days ago, it must be admitted that he is at least entitled to the credit of candor and courage in taking it. He seems to have wearied of voting for amendments to kill the treaty; he seems to have realized that he would ultimately be forced into the open; that he would have to admit that the amendments would kill it, and that a virtue might as well be made of necessity at once.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will yield for a question, but not for delay.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is only a question which I desire to ask.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Make it very short, if the Senator please.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand the Senator's attitude to be that——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will permit me, I will state my attitude, but if he will ask any question, I shall be very glad to answer it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator advocate the ratification of this treaty by the United States without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i," regardless of the character of the treaty or the effect it will have upon the vital interests of the United States?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I favor the unqualified ratification of this treaty at the earliest possible date, regardless of any arguments that Senators may make as to the interests of the United States. My investigation shows me that if we do not ratify it our material interests will suffer tremendously; and I shall undertake to show that before I get through.

Senators here have denounced and condemned the league of nations as altruistic, as an attempt upon the part of the United States to benefit the whole world, sacrificing somewhat, as they claim, the material interests of the United States. Those same Senators come here now and defend a destruction of the very important material interests and national interests which this treaty, secured from Germany at the point of the cannon, provides for the United States.

Suppose we fail to ratify this treaty. Suppose we adopt an amendment which defeats the treaty. Where will the United States stand? It will stand as a deserter, in the first place, in the great cause in which we enlisted when we entered this war; it will stand as a deserter, leaving the nations associated with us to enforce, as they must, the terms of this treaty against Germany; it will stand as a poltroon amongst the nations of the world, begging Germany for terms of peace.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Very briefly, if it is a question simply, but not for delay.

Mr. FRANCE. Is the Senator aware of the fact that the British Labor Party, representing 20,000,000 of the British workingmen, have condemned this treaty in unequivocal terms?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No, I am not; and I do not care what they have done.

Mr. President, if the United States takes the position to which I have referred it is then reduced to one of two alternatives: Either it must go hat in hand to Germany and ask Germany to enter into negotiations for a peace settlement, or it must, as some Senators have recommended, pass a resolution in Congress declaring that we have reached an unconditional peace with Germany.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield further to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Under the same conditions, I yield.

Mr. FRANCE. I did not understand the Senator's reply. Does he deny that the great British Labor Party, which will undoubtedly control the destiny of Great Britain after the next election, is unequivocally opposed to the league of nations?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I deny it because I do not know it, and I do not care if it is so.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask the Senator not to interrupt me further; it does not comport with what I am saying, and I do not want to have the continuity of my remarks destroyed.

Unquestionably, Mr. President, the treaty is going to be in operation very soon and the United States will be out in the cold.

I have said that we will be confronted with two alternatives: Either we will have to go to Germany and ask Germany to negotiate a treaty of peace settlement with us, or we will have to adopt a resolution—a concurrent resolution, as the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from New Mexico have advocated—declaring a state of unconditional peace with Germany.

Where, then, are the issues of the war with Germany? We leave Germany angry and resentful toward the United States because we, the great democracy on the Western Hemisphere, threw our weight into the conflict and defeated her. We lose all the benefits and provisions of this treaty, and Germany will be free to assert against the United States enormous claims, which she undoubtedly will make, for indemnity. Germany declared no war against us; she will be in a position to say to us, "You declared war against Germany; we did not want war with the United States. You seized the property of thousands of German nationals in the United States contrary to the treaties of 1799 and 1828; you liquidated that property in violation of international law; your Congress has taken possession of it; we want an indemnity." We would have with Germany on that account alone, for years to come, a controversy which would inevitably in time run into the dangers of war.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator is referring to the contention that Germany would undoubtedly make. He does not, of course, adopt that contention himself.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; I am adopting the contention which Germany would make and which Germany has made since this treaty was signed. Since Germany has realized what we have done in this country—and rightfully done, as I believe—her papers have been aflame with indignation that we have done it. Under the treaty Germany validates the acts of Congress, she validates the acts of the Alien Property Custodian under which we have seized from $750,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 worth of property belonging to German nationals and hold it. Under this treaty we can hold the proceeds of the sale of that property not only to indemnify ourselves for prewar losses, not only to indemnify ourselves for losses similar to those occasioned by the sinking of the Lusitania, but also to indemnify and pay the claims of Americans against Germany and against German nationals. What becomes of that? Who is to look out for the payment of claims which German nationals owe to American nationals, if we lose this protection? What is going to become of this $700,000,000 or $800,000,000 of property in the United States which, in the eyes of Germany, if this treaty is not signed, still belong to German nationals? Senators who are so fond of measuring the material interests of the United States and the nationalism of our country against great world benefit had better think before they reject this treaty and throw the United States into a controversy with Germany which may last for years and may lead to war.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Under the same conditions, yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator mean to say that he would sacrifice the national interests of the United States of America, one of the Commonwealths of which he, in part, represents here in the Senate, for the sake of what he calls world benefits?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I mean to say that the Senators who undertake to advise the United States to play the part of a poltroon and deserter and get out of this treaty would not only put themselves in a bad moral attitude but they would sacrifice these enormous material interests as well.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator agree with the President of the United States, who denominates this treaty as a supreme sacrifice by the people of the United States?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it is a great act, an altruistic act, for the United States to throw its strength into the society of nations and propose to steady the world in this hour of danger. Undoubtedly the United States is able to confer upon the world at this time a benefit greater than any other country can confer. The United States is young; the United States is strong; the United States is rich. It alone of all the nations of the world is able at the present moment to confer upon the world, the distressed and despairing world, benefits such as no other nation can confer. It is an act of altruism; but I am pointing out to Senators that what they propose is going to sacrifice some of the precious material interests about which they are talking all the time.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I assume from what the Senator says that he cares nothing whatever, since he speaks of them rather contemptuously, for the material interests of the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am attempting to show the Senator that he and his associates are attempting to sacrifice, and propose to sacrifice, the very material interests for which they assume to stand.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I say to the Senator that he is here as a Senator sworn to protect and guard the material interests of the people of the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have submitted to all the interruptions I propose to; but I will say to the Senator also that I propose to stand by that oath; and I am standing by it when I insist upon the ratification of this treaty.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator one other question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can not submit to any further questions. I decline to yield further at the present time.

Mr. President, one of the declarations made in this treaty by Germany is that she assumes full responsibility for this war. If we retire from the treaty she will not assume toward us full responsibility for this war. She will seek to hold us to that responsibility, and in German eyes and in German minds she will have considerable warrant for that claim.

In this treaty Germany agrees to pay damages. Now, it is up to Congress when the time comes to decide whether or not we will insist upon what we are entitled to under this treaty; but certainly we should not release Germany from that promise.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] comes boldly before the Senate and before the country and pleads the German cause. He makes very much the same arguments that the German peace commission made in its communications to the peace conference representing the nations of the world. He makes practically the same arguments against indemnities, the same arguments against excesses, which they made and which the peace conference representing the other nations answered. It is only necessary to read those communications to see where the Senator from Pennsylvania derived his thoughts.

Mr. President, there are many other benefits which the United States derives under this treaty, and which the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations proposes to sacrifice.

The treaty provides that for six months after its ratification Germany will impose no higher customs duties upon imports, as against the nations which sign this treaty, than the customs duties which prevailed for the first six months of 1914. As against the United States, if we failed to join in executing the treaty, she could put in any tariff she pleased.

She promises that she will not prohibit or restrict the importation of goods from any of the countries signing this treaty, but there will be no such promises in regard to the United States.

She promises that there will be no discrimination, direct or indirect, against any of the nations signing this treaty, but she would not make that promise to us if we did not enter into the treaty.

She promises that there shall be no discrimination in shipping, based on the flag of any country signing this treaty, in any of the German ports. There are no such promises to us if we fail to sign the treaty.

In this treaty Germany agrees that the nations which sign it can revive, in their own discretion, such former treaties as existed with Germany, but that promise will not exist, so far as we are concerned, if we fail to enter this treaty.

In this treaty Germany promises to restore the property of our citizens seized in Germany or to compensate the owners. No such promise would exist if we failed to ratify the treaty. All American property in Germany would be subject to confiscation.

Many other promises of that sort are made. I shall not here catalogue them all. Some of them are less important than those I have cited and some of them are fully as important.

I desire, however, to mention another thing of tremendous value in the United States which is provided for in this treaty, and which we will lose if we amend it, because if we amend it we kill it as far as we are concerned. We lose our membership on the great commission of reparation. Do Senators realize what that commission is to be? Each of the nations—the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, the Jugo-Slovene State—is to have membership on that commission. Only five nations, however, are to participate in any of its decisions. The United States will always participate. Sometimes Japan will, sometimes the Jugo-Slovene State will, sometimes Belgium will, but always the United States will participate in every one of its decisions. Do Senators realize the tremendous power of this commission? Do they know that it holds the power over Germany to compel her to use all her economic resources to the very limit for carrying out the promises of this treaty? Do they realize that that commission receives from Germany all of the reparation which Germany pays, and distributes it to the various countries? Do they realize that that commission has the power to say to Germany how much she shall pay out in gold, what she shall pay out in other forms of property, and how the bonds that she is compelled to execute shall be deposited and distributed? Do they realize, moreover, that this commission has the power to say to Germany: "You are importing too much. You have got to economize. You can not pay your debts, you can not comply with the terms of this treaty, unless you cut down your imports"? Do Senators realize what that means? It means that the reparation commission can say to Germany: "Cut down your imports of cotton, cut down your imports of wheat, cut down your imports of copper and other mining products, cut down your imports of agricultural and manufactured goods." Do Senators think that the United States can afford not to have representation on that powerful commission? How else are you going to protect the exports of the United States in cotton, copper, wheat, cattle, and all the other products which we hope to sell to Germany, in common with the rest of the world? How are we to protect ourselves against discrimination, as against the rest of the world, if we have no membership upon that commission?

Mr. President, to my mind it is unthinkable for the United States not to be represented on this great, powerful, international body, holding the control of the economic resources of Germany and having the power, until she makes a final settlement, to dictate to her what shall be done with her products, where they shall be sent, and what she shall import. We can not afford not to be represented on that commission, and we can not be represented on it if we retire from this treaty.

I am talking material things; I am talking national interests now, that Senators have been disposed to bring into the foreground as the only things to be considered. What do they propose? How do they propose to protect American exports—wheat, cotton, cattle, mining products? How do they propose to see that America gets her share?

The commission is going to be in operation, and it is going to be in operation very soon, and it is going to use its powers, and the United States is going to be in competition with Great Britain and France and Japan and other countries; and we can not afford not to be represented on that powerful committee, possessing these enormous powers. The disasters to be contemplated by our retirement from this commission are, to my mind, appalling disasters to our commerce, disasters to our banking interests, disasters to us politically in the larger sense, because it means the isolation of the United States in the world. It means that we affront Japan; it means that we lose our control over the benefits that Germany must pay out in settlement of this war; it means that we leave Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, and the other twenty-odd nations that sign this treaty in a combination, and we, having secured the hatred of Germany and of Japan, will also earn and merit the contempt of the nations that we desert at this time. Political isolation for the United States—that is what retirement from this treaty means, and it means nothing less.

Mr. President, that is the program of the majority of the Foreign Relations Committee. The majority of the Foreign Relations Committee does not represent the dominant majority of this Chamber. It is a committee organized for the very purpose of seizing this treaty and impounding it, holding it there in cold storage, as it has done now for weeks, since the 10th of July, as I recall, because it went to the Foreign Relations Committee within two weeks after it was signed, and there it remains practically in cold storage. That committee does not represent the dominant element of the Senate. The majority of the Senate wants that treaty ratified. The overwhelming majority of the American people want it ratified. I have shown here by incontrovertible evidence from time to time that almost invariably, when a test of public opinion has been made in Republican or Democratic communities, the overwhelming sentiment has been shown to be in favor of the ratification of this treaty. Yet that committee, formed and stacked for the purpose, has locked up this great treaty while the whole world is on fire. While our industrial and commercial and financial conditions are imperiled, that committee holds the treaty locked up there, conducting useless hearings about impossible features of the treaty.

But finally the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] comes frankly into the open and, in his speech of Friday last, takes a position which, as I have said, at least possesses the merit of candor. Some time last October the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], in a speech in this Chamber, stated that the war could only be brought to a conclusion by a treaty, and that the Senate had to participate in the making of the treaty. Now he takes a different position. Now he comes before the Senate and states:

> On the other hand, Congress, while it can not negotiate a peace with the enemy, can nevertheless end hostilities with him by declaring as no longer existant the status of war with him, which the Congress created by its own act.
> Thus so soon as the first procès-verbal is drawn under this treaty, Congress may with all propriety, and should to insure full legality to the act of the Executive in negotiating this particular treaty provision, pass a resolution—concurrent, because the Executive having already committed himself to the substance thereof, his approval would be superfluous—which shall declare that the status of war created by its resolution of April 6, 1917, no longer exists, and that a status of peace from that moment obtains. Thus we shall put the country immediately upon a complete peace basis and may at once resume all our normal commercial and other relations with Germany, unhampered by any restrictions. So much for that part of the treaty which ends the war.

The Senator from Pennsylvania takes the preposterous position that because France, Great Britain, Japan, Italy, and the other belligerents in the war have made a peace settlement with Germany therefore we are at peace with Germany. It is an absolutely unthinkable condition. What are the terms of the peace? What have become of our former treaties with Germany? Who is to pay the damages of the war with Germany? What are our rights in German ports? Can our shipping be discriminated against? Can Germany make tariffs adverse to us? All those questions remain unsettled, and they were considered important enough in the peace conference in Paris to take up the time of the negotiators for months. And yet the Senator from Pennsylvania blandly says we can now have an unconditional peace with Germany.

There has been a most tremendous change since October, 1918. What was then the position of the Senator from Pennsylvania? What was then the position of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], and all these other Senators who are now so anxious to make an unconditional peace with Germany? Mr. President, even when the President of the United States had simply answered a diplomatic note from Germany asking for terms of armistice, this Chamber rang with denunciations by Republican Senators, who said nothing but an unconditional surrender of Germany. They shouted until the rafters rang with the statement that we could not possibly have a negotiated peace with Germany. "Unconditional surrender!" And now they come here and blandly propose an unconditional peace. Then they protested that it would be an outrage for the United States to act independently of the nations associated with us in the war, and now they come and denounce the President because in association with those nations he has made a peace with Germany and imposed the terms of unconditional surrender on Germany.

Mr. President, why this change? What has happened? Has the President done anything more or different from what he had been required to do? Did any Senator rise here in his place before the pace conference met in Paris and insist that the United States should make a separate peace with Germany? I do not remember any. There were none until the present time, when there is a fond hope to discredit the President of the United States now just as they attempted to discredit him then because they thought he might make a separate peace with Germany.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Under the same condition as before.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator mentioned my name. I do not care to ask a question. I was just going to make a brief statement.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will ask the Senator to postpone that brief statement.

I will read first from some things said by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. This was October 28, 1918. He said:

It was always true and was early recognized by all that the object of this war was and is the permanent removal of the German menace.

Not the temporary, but "the permanent."

In the formula "restitution, reparation, and guaranties," the word guaranty is not to mean written guaranties, such as we have seen treated as scraps of paper in the cases of Belgium's neutrality, of accepted international law, of Hague conventions, of the rules of civilized warfare on land and seas. We shall have the guaranties we seek only when we know as a fact, irrespective of the solemnities of diplomatic promises, that the German menace is at an end once for all.

How can it be at an end once for all if a treaty does not go into effect? Can it be put into effect by an unconditional deed, by a concurrent resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives that peace has arrived because we have quit fighting?

Even "restitution and reparation"; even the return of Alsace-Lorraine to France; even just frontiers for Italy and Roumania and the rescue and restoration of Russia and independence for Jugo-Slavs, Czecho-Slovaks, and Poles, and for the nationalities oppressed by Turkey; even the liberation of Africans and others from German colonial oppression—all these matters—however absolute their intrinsic importance—for the prime purpose of the war, which is, I say again, for our guaranty against the German menace—are of chief interest because they subserve that guaranty.

Yet now the Senator from Pennsylvania proposes to scuttle and run and leave the other nations that were associated with us in the war to make good those guarantees.

We shall require also evidence that the German grip upon Russia, the Balkans, and Turkey has been loosed. We must never allow to be obscured the prime purpose of the war. From that purpose flows as a corollary the purpose to strive to make the menace of unjust war from any quarter as improbable as we can.

What are we going to do with Russia? What is to achieve this purpose if we make an unconditional peace with Germany by a joint or concurrent resolution?

From that, again, and from the chivalrous spirit of the entente allies flows the demands for restitution and reparation and for all the complicated territorial and racial readjustments, to some of which I have referred.

And now the Senator from Pennsylvania stands upon the floor and denounces the treaty because it gives to the nations of the world reparation and restitution and he proposes that the United States shall waive any claim that it has against Germany, the thing which is provided for in the treaty, and he says with a most naive humor that when the United States waives its claim against Germany it should see to it that the other nations give Germany credit for what we release. How are we going to do that if we are not a party to the treaty? What right have we to say to Great Britain and France and the other nations that get restitution, "You ought not to press Germany so far if we are not a party to the treaty"? Does the Senator from Pennsylvania think that we can desert our associates and leave them to enforce the terms of this treaty alone and then see that they give Germany credit for what we have sacrified?

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Such a policy of folly and poltroonery was never proposed on the floor of the Senate before.

I yield to the Senator from Illinois for a brief question.

Mr. McCORMICK. I only wish to ask if in that connection it would be consistent for us to interfere with Greece obtaining Thrace or Italy obtaining Fiume?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is very desirous on all occasions of bringing in some other subject. I am confining myself to this treaty and the effect which will be produced if we adopt amendments and therefore destroy our participation in the treaty. I do not propose on this occasion to discuss either the labor situation in Great Britain or any of the remote diplomatic questions of the East.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator was speaking a moment ago, as I understood him, about claims of the United States exercised under this treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator recite what claims the United States is pressing under the treaty? I thought the United States was not to get anything.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The United States can hardly be said to be in the attitude of pressing claims, but under the terms of the treaty it is entitled to all the claims that any other participant in the treaty is entitled to, equally situated. I do not suppose that the Congress of the United States would care to compel Germany to pay the cost of American intervention. Other nations may do so; I do not know whether they will or not; but whatever the United States shall do is at least reserved for the Government of the United States to decide after the treaty is ratified. Then will be the time if Senators are anxious to sacrifice American claims for the benefit of Germany to do so, but we can not do that unless we are a party to this treaty.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I understand that the President has already stated officially, or in such way as to have it understood, that the United States does not intend to collect anything from Germany.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There has been no statement of that sort made to Germany.

Mr. WADSWORTH. He made it to the people of the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The President has perhaps made it in his discussions, and possibly in association with the representatives of other nations in Europe echoed the sentiment, which I believe is general in this country, that this country does not propose to exact a pound of flesh from Germany, that this country is going to hold to a high altrustic position, but that is no reason why we should not sign the treaty. If we want to collect an indemnity from Germany in any form under the terms of the treaty, we can if desired be generous and give it back to her, provided we sign the treaty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As we did in the Boxer case.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; as the Senator from Mississippi suggests, as we did in the Boxer case.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. As a matter of fact, whatever right we obtain under the treaty is a right obtained in favor of the United States, and neither the President nor anyone else but Congress can renounce those rights. Is not that correct?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is correct; Congress, with the approval of the President. It requires the whole Government of the United States, as I understand it.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is the Government which must renounce and not the President.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In his speech the other day the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] made this declaration:

And this thought brings me to speak again of what I have said heretofore, that this treaty, stripped of its meaningless beatific provisions—provides merely and simply for an alliance between the five great powers in a coalition against the balance of the world. And again I ask, has history ever answered this save in one way—by destroying the coalition and at times all or some of its constituent members?

Whatever they are—

Aside from the inaccuracies of this statement, which implies that only five great powers are in the treaty, whereas there are 27 signers, as I recall it, embracing a very wide scope of nations all over the world—aside from the inaccuracies of the statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania last Friday, contrast it with the statements he made a year ago upon the floor of the Senate on the 28th day of October, when he said:

The league of nations that now challenges our solicitude is the league of nations of which we are now a member—the glorious present alliance of the many powers with whom we are now fighting as a league to enforce and to maintain peace from disturbance by the German menace.

Not merely to fight the war, but to establish and maintain peace. The Senator from Pennsylvania last October denominated as a glorious league of nations that which he now condemns as an alliance inimical to the world. He called it a "glorious alliance."

He continues:

If we should allow that league to fall apart or to be pried apart by German machinations, who can say when this world will ever again be so near to having a general league to enforce peace as it is to-day?

And yet the Senator from Pennsylvania and his associates upon the Committee on Foreign Relations now deliberately propose to pry apart this glorious alliance of which he sounded the praises only last October when he thought he could bring by his declaration condemnation upon the President of the United States. I do not assert that it is being pried apart by German machinations, but I heard in the Senator's speech a very distinct appeal to German sentiment, and I would suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania, if he really desires to plead German sentiment to the logical conclusion, German sentiment in Europe or in America, that he suggest that the United States make reparation to Germany for the damage she suffered by our entry into the war. That would be logical.

The Senator from Pennsylvania then proceeded last October:

> Out of the present alliance to-day, and quite irrespective of any discussions with the enemy, it would seem possible to perpetuate the league we have, already embracing the majority of the population of the globe, as a league for one single purpose of enforcing peace.

Perpetuate, he said, the league we have. Now he proposes to disrupt it and break it up when the President of the United States has done the very thing the Senator then declared should be done.

> The function of such a league, I take it, would be to examine any controversy that threatened war and then to throw its weight to the side of such controversy where justice and equity lay, and also to suppress with its overwhelming power any war that might break out and to indicate the just solution of the contention. Such a league, like any league, will demand some encroachment upon the conception of complete and independent sovereignty.

But the Senator from Pennsylvania advocated it only last October and now he denounces it and attempts to do the very thing that he then condemned, namely, to pry apart what he then denominated as a "glorious league" or a "glorious alliance."

But enough of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and yet not enough. I forgot one thing concerning the Senator from Pennsylvania which I want to include.

On the 17th of July the Senate had under consideration a resolution presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania, which had for its purpose to tear out of this treaty the league of nations. I am not going to discuss the league of nations. The Senator from Pennsylvania is on both sides of the fence, just as is the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and many other Senators who now oppose it, but I want to read what the Senator from Pennsylvania said on July 17 of this year. He said:

> The resolution before us does not call for a vote for or against the league of nations; it does not call for even an expression of an opinion either for or against the league. On these points this resolution is wholly colorless. This resolution asks merely and solely that the treaty embodying the league shall be in words so framed that the Senate may advise and consent to that part of it—> which shall bring us peace, and that it may reserve for further consideration that part of it by which it is proposed to make us a part of a projected league of nations.

What has come over the spirit of the dreams of the Senator from Pennsylvania that has brought about this change since July 17? Then he wanted to tear the league of nations out of the treaty and ratify the rest of it. Now he proposes that we withdraw from the treaty absolutely. I suspect this has come to his attention, that he could not eliminate the league of nations from the treaty. A majority of the Senate is determined to see the league of nations remain in the treaty. Having reached that conclusion he now takes the position that the only hope is to defeat the whole treaty. I suppose that is the explanation of the otherwise inexplicable change made by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

I said that this Chamber rang last October with declarations of Senators that the United States must be a party to a treaty, that this treaty must be imposed on Germany by force, and that the United States must unite with the allied nations in imposing the treaty, and they must not on any account negotiate a treaty separately with Germany. I will just state haphazard a few statements made by Senators on that subject.

On October 14, 1918, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] said:

> I am against a negotiated peace now, as I have been from the moment the United States entered the war. Nothing short of absolute, complete, and unconditional surrender, carrying with it full reparation for the damage wrought, will be accepted or tolerated, and it is my belief that anything that has even the appearance of willingness to accept anything less will be taken as a failure to carry out the purposes for which we entered this war and will be resented with a unanimity and an emphasis that will permit of no misunderstanding.
> We have neither hope or desire to regain the fabulous sums of money we have spent and may yet spend before the end is reached. But, sir, while all this is true, I do not believe that the American people will wittingly or complacently submit to seeing themselves placed at a permanent and irremediable commercial disadvantage through the medium of the terms of peace, whenever or wherever they may be submitted.

And yet the Senator from Indiana now proposes by the action he takes in the Committee on Foreign Relations to commit the United States to a separate peace with Germany, unconditional if need be. He undertakes by his vote to deprive the United States of the great benefits which that treaty secured at the cannon's mouth and leave the United States helpless, burdened with a controversy with Germany, which may last for years and may lead to war. There is a wonderful change there in attitude.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I desire to know if the position of the Senator, as to any treaty that shall be hereafter made with Germany, if this is rejected, is that it must be a negotiated and not a dictated treaty? Why could we not dictate another treaty with Germany as this has been dictated? Does the military situation render that impracticable?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I, perhaps, have not been specific enough on that point, and I thank the Senator from Montana for calling it to my attention.

I have stated that compulsion was exhausted when we laid down in the treaty which our representatives signed the terms with Germany. When Germany signed, and certainly when the German assembly ratified it, Germany accepted the stipulations, and it is too late for us to go to Germany, it is too late to reassemble the council in Paris and have the council undertake to say to Germany, "You must accept this change." Our allies' armies have been demobilized, our Army has been brought home, and, even if that were not the case, diplomatic usage and international law will excuse Germany from further concessions.

Germany would have a right to say if we asked new conditions, "We accepted this treaty; we have signed this treaty; we have ratified the treaty; and any further changes you want in the treaty you have got to secure from us, and we will impose the terms." Germany can take that position; and because Germany can take that position, none of the other nations—Great Britain, France, or Japan—will take any chances in encouraging us to make impossible amendments; they will not risk their hold on Germany by any such act; and I can not think that the Senate of the United States will be guilty of that ridiculous folly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me one question, even if we could resummon the council that made this treaty, and even if we could make Germany by compulsion accept a virtually new treaty or amended treaty, what reason could there be why the council could not meet once a month or once a week and still compel Germany once a month or once a week to accept a new treaty?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Would there ever be any finality about it at all?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There never would be any finality. That shows the preposterous nature of the suggestion, if there be such a suggestion; and I have not heard any deliberate suggestion from Senators who advocate an unconditional peace. They have simply come down from unconditional surrender to unconditional peace, and they give no reasons.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], on October 10 of last year, used this language:

> Mr. President, in the principles, with many of which I find no fault—in the principles laid down of the 14 points or 4 points I find nothing that is satisfactory to me at least about reparation.

The Senato. from Massachusetts was then criticizing and condemning the President of the United States because he did not demand reparation, but now he is supporting and backing up the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] who denounces reparation. Later in the same speech the Senator from Massachusetts said:

> Though I think we ought to have a large reparation for some of our merchant ships and for our passengers who went down on the Lusitania, the world ought to have, must have, large reparation. There is such a thing as retributive justice; there is such a thing as punitive justice.

Now, the Senator from Massachusetts, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, is cooperating with Senators constituting a majority of that committee who propose that the United States shall back out of and run away from the only possible means by which we can enforce reparation and justice, and he is willing absolutely to deprive us of membership upon the commission which is to make permanent the achievements of this war.

Later on, the Senator from Massachusetts said:

> Mr. President, the best diplomatists in Europe at this moment are the armies of France and Italy, of England, and of the United States. The best men to carry on discussion with Germany are Haig and Pershing and Diaz and, over all, the great commander, Marshal Foch. Those are the negotiators with whom I would leave the question of peace. They will win it. They will win it on German soil. They will bring back the peace which the whole American people desire, for they desire, I believe, unconditional surrender; and unconditional surrenders are not obtained by clever discussion and exchange of notes. They are won by armies in the field.

Now the Senator from Massachusetts and his associates upon the committee propose to repudiate those negotiators, those military forces that negotiated this peace and secured these concessions; they propose to repudiate those negotiators they then glorified and come down to an exchange of notes with Germany. Later on in the same speech the Senator from Massachusetts said:

The way to compel the peace of the world is to break Germany down and make her accept our terms.

He did not want the President of the United States to do anything which would impair that great purpose. He continues:

The Republican—

Here we get a little partisanship—

The Republican—

That is, as distinguished from the Democratic President—

The Republican stands for unconditional surrender and complete victory, just as Grant stood. My own belief is that the American people mean to have an unconditional surrender. They mean to have a dictated peace and not a negotiated peace. That is my own belief here deeper in my heart than any belief I have ever had.

What is the reason for the change? Now that we have secured a dictated peace, do we propose to abandon it at the suggestion of the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations and enter upon negotiations to secure a peace? It is because the President of the United States has secured the benefits of a dictated peace and they want to discredit him.

Again, on another day in the Senate, October 7, 1918, the Senator from Massachusetts used this language:

Mr. President, the mischief is in any discussion of the principles upon which peace should be debated. When Germany has surrendered, when she holds up her hands and says, "We are beaten; what terms will you impose?" then the Allies and the United States can tell her what terms they will impose. There is, there must be, no other end, no other solution.

And yet the Senator from Massachusetts at the present time is cooperating with the Senators who are attempting to bring about directly the opposite solution of that question.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] on October 10 of last year said:

The German chancellor can well answer each one of the inquiries of the President in such way as will be most calculated to accomplish his object. He can say that he represents both the Government and the people of Germany, and who can dispute his statement? In this he undoubtedly would be correct, as, for the purposes of this war, there is no difference between the German people and the German Government.

I read that, Mr. President, lest some one may arise here and say that the attitude of the majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations is based upon the fact that we are now dealing with representatives of the German people instead of representatives of the German Empire.

Again, on the 10th of October, 1918, the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] used this language:

We have just heard the views of the Senator from Massachusetts as to the way the war with Germany should end. He is in favor of an unqualified victory; he is in favor of subduing the military power of Germany and of imposing upon her a peace and a restablishment of conditions after the war to be dictated by the allies.

That is what the Senator from Washington wanted last October. Yet now the Senator is cooperating with those who seek to destroy the dictated peace and relegate the United States to the uncertainties of a negotiated peace.

I could cite the statements of other Senators and will cite something by one of the Senators now determined on destroying this treaty. On October 14 last the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] used this language:

An unfortunate impression is, I fear, being made upon the country. Nothing in the Senate does ought to add thereto. It seems to me that the country is getting the notion that the President of the United States intends to enter upon a system of parleying and negotiations with Germany, and that at the end of the negotiations Germany is to come off unscathed.

I tell you, sirs, when the conditions of peace are written the name of Woodrow Wilson will not be, it can not be, subscribed to any treaty that does not compel Germany to tread the wine press of repentance—to pay back, to pay back to the world, as far as she can, in her own suffering for the agonies that she has wrought, for the desolation she has brought upon the earth.

Yet it is now proposed to destroy this treaty—the only one that can be exacted from Germany by force, the only one that can be imposed upon her—and relegate the United States to a negotiated treaty.

I shall close my references to the speeches of Senators by reading some remarks by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who, I have no doubt, stands by those remarks to-day. I read them merely because they express what I believe represents the overwhelming sentiment of the majority of the Senate, including Senators on both sides of the Chamber. The Senator from Iowa, on October 14, 1918, said:

My concern relates mainly to our attitude toward Germany after the victory has been won and after her surrender is complete, for it will be just as fatal to impose inadequate terms through negotiation.

There is but one answer that will meet the demands of justice and satisfy the claims of an outraged world. There must be reparation for the past and security for the future.

First, Germany must pay, pay to the last farthing of her capacity to pay, pay until the generations yet to come will remember and curse the insane ambition which well nigh destroyed civilization itself, and so she will repair in some small measure the destruction she has wrought.

Second, Germany is a menace to mankind, because she has a cruel, wicked, malicious intent toward the remainder of the world, and because she has a powerful Army and Navy to execute her murderous designs. We can not change her intent, for it is the result of years and years of training and teaching in a false and selfish philosophy, but we can disarm her and leave her helpless and harmless.

Viewed from the ordinary standpoint, these terms are severe beyond precedent, but the situation itself has no parallel in history. I understand perfectly that these conditions mean the degradation, possibly the disintegration, of a once mighty nation; but if we are to be safe, if the world is to be secure, they must be imposed.

It will be gratifying to see Germany supplant her existing Government with a better and freer one; but that will not suffice, for republics are as strong in their purposes as autocracies. Oftentimes they are as ambitious as the most absolute of monarchies, and we are now witnessing the ease with which they mobilize and the success with which they fight.

Mr. President, that was the situation a year ago; it was the situation last October. The statements made by those Senators represent not only the overwhelming public opinion of the United States, but they represent practically the unanimous opinion of the Senate of the United States. Many of those remarks were made in criticism of the President because it was thought or assumed that he was going to enter into negotiations with Germany and permit her to escape from the decision of a great military victory; but they were statements just the same, and they are binding upon the Senators who made them. I should like to have those Senators rise upon the floor of the Senate and explain what has caused their change of front and why when they condemned the President of the United States because they thought he proposed to make a separate peace with Germany then, they now condemn him because he has united with the Allies in making peace. I should like to have them rise in their places and explain why they have come down from the heights of unconditional surrender to the depths of unconditional peace. I should like to have them explain why they called loudly for reparation to the uttermost farthing last October and now boldly come here and advocate abandoning all American claims for restitution. I should like to have them explain to the people of the United States how they are going to protect the material interests of the United States if they abdicate and give away the protection of the provisions of this treaty to which I have specifically referred. It can not be done.

The Senators who are taking the course of destroying this treaty by amendments are in a position absolutely inconsistent with that which they held a year ago. They dare not go before the American people and advocate a negotiated peace with Germany. They dare not go before the American people and say: "We are going to waive all the benefits the United States secures from Germany under this treaty—the reparations, the repayment of the loss of the Lusitania and other horrors, the payment of American nationals who have claims against German nationals, the disposition of the German property in this country which the Congress of the United States declared shall be liquidated and wiped out." They dare not go before the people of the United States and say: "We are not going to provide for the protection of American exports, which are going to be largely under the control of the reparations commission of Europe."

Mr. President, I had expected to say something on the league of nations, but I have talked too long already, and I shall postpone that for a future time. I have sought in this address to meet upon their own ground Senators who glorify nationalism and constantly shout for material interests, when other Senators stand here advocating that the United States shall take its great part in reorganizing the world for peace. I have met them upon their own ground to-day, and I should like to have them answer how they can excuse the poltroonery of the United States if it deserts its associates in this war at the very hour when it is necessary to make permanent the achievements of the war.

On some future occasion I shall hope to discuss the league of nations.

LEASING OF OIL LANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have sent a page for the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and told him that the Senator from Nebraska was about to conclude his speech. I expect him here in a moment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 25, after the word "cents," strike out "nor more than," and on page 5, line 1, strike out the words "20 cents," so that it will read:

That for the privilege of mining or extracting the coal in the lands covered by the lease the lessee shall pay to the United States such royalties as may be specified in the lease, which shall be fixed in advance of offering the same, and which shall be not less than 5 cents per ton of 2,000 pounds.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I understand that an amendment similar to that, and perhaps almost identical with it in terms, was offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and voted upon. I recall now that he had such an amendment, and that he sought to get a roll call upon it, and that he failed. I should like to have a roll call upon that amendment, but I am perfectly willing to wait for that until the bill gets into the Senate. We could, of course, at this time move to reconsider; but if the Senator in charge of the bill prefers that we should wait until it gets into the Senate, I shall ask to have that amendment returned to me. I give notice now that I reserve the right to offer this amendment in the Senate, as I understand that an amendment practically the same and perhaps identical in terms with it has been voted upon in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin withdraws the amendment which he proposed. The Chair suggests that in his opinion the Senator from Wisconsin would have the right to offer the amendment in the Senate without reserving it at this time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That may be so, but I will make doubly sure by reserving that right.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do; yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should like to call attention to an error made in an amendment offered by me, and ask that it be corrected. It was the amendment which went in at the close of section 19; and I ask a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was adopted, for the purpose of proposing the amendment in corrected form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana moves a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment which will be stated by the Secretary was adopted.

The SECRETARY. In section 19, page 18, line 22, after the word "section," the remainder of the section was stricken out, and a new section was added, to be known as section 20, and to read as follows:

SEC. 20. In the case of lands bona fide entered as agricultural, but not including lands claimed under any railroad grant, and not withdrawn or classified as mineral at the time of entry, the entryman shall be entitled to a preference right to a permit and to a lease as herein provided in case of discovery; and within an area not greater than a township, entrymen may combine their holdings not to exceed 2,560 acres for the purpose of making joint application. Leases executed under this section and embracing only lands so entered shall provide for the payment of a royalty of not less than 7½ per cent as to such areas within the permit as may not be included within the discovery lease to which the permittee is entitled under section 14 hereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The language in the amendment "and not withdrawn or classified as mineral at the time of entry" was inserted, after the amendment was drawn, after the word "grant." Grammatically and structurally, it should go in after the word "agricultural." I move to strike out that language where it occurs in the amendment, and to insert it after the word "agricultural."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the words "and not withdrawn or classified as mineral at the time of entry" after the word "agricultural" and the comma.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And to strike it out where it occurs at present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In the same connection, the same conditions which exist with reference to entrymen exist in the case of patentees with restricted patents; and I offer the following amendment, to be inserted after the word "entryman":

Or patentee, if the entry has been patented with the mineral right reserved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator state where he desires to insert it?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. After the word "entryman."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Where?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Where it first occurs in the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It reads "the entryman shall be entitled to a preference right."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. After the word "entryman" insert "or patentee, if the entry has been patented with the mineral right reserved."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I understand, that proposed amendment means that if an entryman has entered upon agricultural lands with a reservation of minerals to the Government of the United States, and he receives a patent for the land with that reservation in it, then, in case of exploration for oil or coal or these other minerals, he shall have the preference right to a permit or a lease.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes, sir.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I had no understanding that it was to be that broad. In my conversation with the Senator, I understood that he only asked that it be applied where it had been withdrawn subsequent to the entry, and before patent.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the case.

Mr. LENROOT. But, as I read it, this would give the preference right to any patentee upon withdrawn lands where he took a surface entry.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I misunderstood the amendment, and I will ask the Senator to read it again.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will attend, the patented lands are qualified in exactly the same way as the lands entered but not passed to patent. In each case and in both cases it must be of lands which had not been classified or withdrawn at the time the entry was made. The amendment as thus amended, if it is amended, would read then as follows:

In the case of lands bona fide entered as agricultural, and not withdrawn or classified as mineral at the time of entry, but not including lands claimed under any railroad grant, the entryman or patentee, if the entry has been patented with the mineral right reserved, shall be entitled to a preference right—

And so forth.

Mr. LENROOT. That is all right.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "entryman," where it first appears, insert the words "or patentee, if the entry has been patented with the mineral right reserved."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then, in order to complete it, after the word "entrymen" where it next occurs, "and within an area not greater than a township, entrymen may combine their holdings," I ask to amend by inserting "and patentees holding restricted patents," so that it will read:

And within an area not greater than a township, entrymen and patentees holding restricted patents may combine.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? To limit it to that class of entrymen, should not the word "such" be inserted before "entrymen"?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. "Such patentees"?

Mr. LENROOT. And "such entrymen."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask, then, to insert, after the word "township" and before the word "entrymen" referred to, the word "such," so that it will read:

And within an area not greater than a township, such entrymen.

And then I move to insert after "entrymen" the words "and patentees holding restricted patents," so that the amendment will read:

And within an area not greater than a township, such entrymen and patentees holding restricted rights may combine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, there is one other amendment that I should like to tender at this time, and invite to it the attention of the Senators who have followed the bill. It seems to have been mislaid, however, and I will ask the attention of the Senate to it later on.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 7, after the word "thereof," insert the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That the Government hereby reserves the right at all times, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the President, to determine, fix, and control the selling price of all products derived from lands leased hereunder, whether in the crude or natural condition, or in other merchantable form, which shall be a reasonable price both as to the producer and the consumer, and the reservation of such right shall be expressly stated in each lease.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I think what I have had to say generally upon the bill presents perhaps the argument that I would make for this amendment if I were taking up the subject originally at this time. Therefore I do not now propose to say anything further than I have already said as to the importance of regulating prices under the provisions of the bill as provided in this amendment, but I do ask for a roll call upon the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate, and of the Senator from Wisconsin particularly, to the condition that would arise if this proposed amendment were adopted. The Senator must know that the Standard Oil Co. would not to any extent be affected by this provision. It would leave the production of oil of the great combinations, particularly the Standard Oil Co., unhampered in any way as to price fixing, either in the crude oil or oil in merchantable form, whereas anyone who took a lease on Government land under the provisions of the bill would be under control by the provisions of the proposed amendment. I think it would be very unfair indeed.

I am also of the opinion that if the prices at which the products under this bill are to be sold are to be regulated and prescribed by the President, not only in their natural condition and in their crude form but in their merchantable form, it would be almost impossible of accomplishment, particularly as to the latter. When we take into consideration the coal, oil, phosphate, and sodium that may be mined and produced under the provisions of the bill, and allowing the President to prescribe the rules and prices at which it shall be sold in any merchantable form to be followed through every conceivable step of manufacture from the crude material taken from the earth to the most finished product that could be made, we must see its impracticability. It seems to me if there were some way of regulating the price of the product itself there would be some wisdom in such a movement, but I say to the Senator from Wisconsin, not in a spirit of captious criticism, that to me it seems that it would be impossible to administer it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin has asked for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment. Is the request seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word upon the amendment before the vote is taken.

This question of regulating the price or reserving the right to regulate the price is a question that has been considered a great many times, and a great many attempts were made by the House Committee on the Public Lands when I was a member of it to provide some measure that would look toward the regulation of the prices of oil by the Government; but every time we have attempted to make such a provision the result has always been and the result in this case would be, if the amendment should be adopted, however good the intention would be, to further perpetuate the control of the Standard Oil Co. That would be true, in my judgment, in this case, because to regulate the price of the crude oil would be merely to say that the Standard Oil Co. can receive the crude oil at a less price than it would otherwise pay, but no regulation shall apply to the consumer of the refined product, because it will be impossible, so far as the Standard Oil Co. is concerned, to follow the refined product into the markets of distribution made by the Standard Oil Co. It would be impossible for the Government to follow that product into the Standard Oil Co., because in not one case in a thousand would it be able to prove that the particular product that it attempted to control came from one of these leased wells.

Provision is made in the bill, and it runs all through the bill, for competition with the Standard Oil Co. One provision in the bill permits combination of producers solely for the purpose of erecting refineries, so that they may market the oil they produce from these leased lands, and as to such a refinery we could regulate the price to the consumer, because as to such a refinery their oil would come from Government land. It is not so with the Standard Oil Co. So the result would be that we would reserve the right, in effect, to fix the price of oil refined by the little fellow attempting to build up competition against the Standard, but we would let the Standard go free, because we could not follow it. That, in my judgment, would be the inevitable result, and no refinery in competition with the Standard Oil Co. is going to be erected if the product of that refinery is to be controlled by the President, or the right reserved to control, while the product of the Standard Oil Co. goes free.

For this reason I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, we are now about to turn over by this so-called leasing bill large areas of oil lands to be taken up and operated. I do not know just how largely the Standard Oil will be benefited by the passage of this bill, but I do know, from such examination as I have been able to make, that Standard Oil will get large areas of these very oil lands which are to be disposed of under this leasing bill.

One of the greatest oil fields in this country, as I understand it, is the Salt Creek oil field in Wyoming. It contains the largest producing wells known in the history of oil production. I am informed that the whole area has recently been gathered under the control of two great oil organizations. One of them is the Wyoming Oil Fields Co. Under the terms of the amendment proposed here last evening by the chairman of the committee, that oil company, which is largely owned in France, will secure control of 3,200 acres of that rich field. The other is the Salt Creek Producing Co., which controls practically all the remaining rich oil-producing territory in this field aside from that which is controlled by the French company. They will take another 3,200 acres of the richest oil-producing land. That company is controlled in part, if not wholly, by companies controlled by the Standard Oil Co. The same is true, or would be true, of the rich oil fields elsewhere.

If the amendment which I have offered is adopted, it would apply to oil leases that will be made under the bill that are already in the control of the Standard Oil. Therefore, to a certain extent, the Government regulation of prices would extend to oil derived from lands controlled and operated by the Standard Oil Co.

Now, Mr. President, my colleague, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] oppose this amendment because, they say, it would regulate the prices of oil of other producing companies and would leave Standard Oil unregulated, as I understand them.

Mr. LENROOT. All of its production, so far as refined oil is concerned, would be unregulated.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not see how the Senator can say that, because by the terms of the proposed amendment the Government reserves the right to regulate the price of oil in any form which comes from these leased lands. The Senator will not deny, I take it, that some of this oil, and I say a large proportion of it, is already under the control of the Standard Oil Co. My colleague may say that the Government can not control the market price because it will pass into and mingle with other oils which are not regulated. Mr. President, that is begging the whole question. The terms of my amendment provide that, under such rules and regulations as the President shall prescribe, the price of oil in any form extracted from Government land so leased shall be regulated through its various processes until it passes into the hands of the consumer. I undertake to say that it is feasible, through the Internal-Revenue Department, to follow this oil from the well to the consumer or by requiring the oil to be refined separately from other oil of the Standard Oil Co. that would not be subject to regulation under my amendment; it could be regulated through its various processes of refinement and its price to the consumer controlled.

Mr. President, I am sorry to see Senators interpose an objection to the regulation of the price of this product as it goes into the market. There is much talk over the country about regulating the prices of the necessaries of life. The President is offering suggestions, and congressional committees are investigating almost every line of production with a view of endeavoring to protect the consumer against extortionate prices. Here is an opportunity for an entering wedge, but because it does not cover the entire field Senators raise a technical objection to it which, in my opinion, does not represent the public interest.

Mr. President, if we can make this beginning toward effective regulation, it will lead the producers who are regulated to come to Congress and demand that their competitors of like products be brought under Government control. Then, Mr. President, I venture to predict there will be more than one Senator standing on the floor arguing for protection to the public.

I appeal here—it may be to indifferent ears—but I make my appeal here, and, if I fail, to the country, for support for this contention which I am making for the protection of the public interest.

Why, sir, even if this amendment should fail utterly, when any President seeks to apply its provisions to existing conditions would we not have better served the public in having made an attempt to meet this problem?

Mr. President, in the Salt Creek oil field these big companies have frozen out every single independent operator but one. Standard Oil will have the control in that section ultimately. You talk about competitors, when you know perfectly well that the producer that controls a large share of the total production is able to control the price.

Mr. President, let me suggest that my statement that the Internal Revenue Department would be able to enforce price regulation is just as good as is my colleague's statement that it would not. If you are simply waiting here as servants of the people for an opportunity to find an open door to protect them, then adopt this amendment, hand it on to the President, and let us see if something can not be worked out, instead of standing up here and protesting against an attempt to relieve the public.

Come back a moment now. Assume that I am right about it; assume that it will be possible for the President, through rules and regulations, to control and fix a reasonable price upon the oil produced from the leased lands, a part of which goes, as surely as God is over us, to Standard Oil. Standard Oil has large interests in these fields; it is struggling to secure title, and if this bill passes will secure a priority of right and get title to 1,600 acres of land, entered by dummy entrymen, who thought they were signing some paper with regard to elections. Standard Oil will have large holdings under this bill. I say to you, if it is possible, that you ought in the discharge of a duty to the public to give this proposition a trial. It can do no harm if it fails, and if it succeeds what will be accomplished? We will have under the rules and regulations prescribed by the President a certain quantity of the product of oil going on the market at a reasonable price. I submit, Mr. President, that that would tend to bring down the prices of the balance of Standard Oil products which are not regulated.

There have been two or three experiments made in other countries to protect the public against extortionate prices occasioned by cornered production. There have been Government operations to test the cost of production in order to fix standards of fair prices. Students of economic advancement have looked hopefully upon these experiments trusting that they might serve in time as a means of checking exorbitant and extortionate prices. War interrupted these experiments. Here is an opportunity for a Government experiment in regulating the price of products—not Government operation; not Government production.

Mark that my amendment simply provides that under rules and regulations prescribed by the President the products derived from these leased lands shall be sold at prices that are reasonable to the producer and reasonable to the consumers. It robs nobody; it does justice, or attempts to do justice, to everyone. I say, Mr. President, that the amendment offers an opportunity at least to try the experiment. It is not a radical proposition; it is not a proposition such as has been worked out successfully in some foreign countries in testing the cost of production by Government operation, for I know that many Senators here are sensitive as to Government ownership and operation along any line; they think that it is the wrong road to travel. Let me say to you, fellow Senators, you may go so far in the other direction that you will produce conditions in this country that will force, all unprepared, upon us the consideration of these problems. This is a reasonable, conservative proposition to regulate prices of products which the public owns, and which are to be passed over to private interests to make money out of—"private interests," I repeat, because some Senators have come in here since I said it. These lands have already been gathered into the hands of the great monopolies; and if you pass this bill as it is brought in here by the committee you will open the way to fix the title to all of those lands in just two or three great monster monopolies.

It will not make any difference—and I am going to argue that question a little later—whether there is the taint of fraud on the original entries or not, although there is a provision in section 18 that nobody shall be able to take any benefit under that section who is guilty of any fraud. I propose to show to the Senate, however, and to the country, why the provision, as is shown by what has already transpired, will not be any protection.

So, Mr. President, I say that the amendment which I have offered here should, in my opinion, be accepted. It is a beginning; it is an attempt to solve this problem. If it is found that it is not feasible, as suggested by Senators who opposed it, then, of course, the effort will have been in vain, but if it is effective it will tend to bring prices to a reasonable level.

The argument which has been made against the amendment on the ground that it would regulate the companies which get their product from leased lands and would not regulate other producers or manufacturers who get their product from other lands indicates, I think, a keen interest in the protection of a small number of people who will be producing under regulated prices and not a very great consideration for the public who would get a benefit from the reduction in price. Enter this wedge, Mr. President, and any man who has not become blind must see the possibility. If we make a beginning somewhere there is a possibility that we may save this country from the thing that is threatening all Europe.

Mr. President, I ask for a roll call upon this amendment. I only regret, sir, that I could not have said what I have said here in the presence of a larger body of the Senate. I may be constrained if there is further debate upon this question to repeat and to go more fully into the question, because I believe that here, right now, at this moment we are standing at the parting of the ways, that we are either going to begin to try to do something to relieve the public or that we are going to settle back and let things drift and drift until we find ourselves in the whirlpool and the rapids out of which it may be impossible for any statesmanship to pilot us to safety.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, as I stated before, I do not for a moment question the good faith or the intentions of my colleague in offering this amendment, and I do not doubt that he believes that it would, if adopted, accomplish something for the public good; but I do not think he can understand the situation that does exist with reference to the Standard Oil Co. and independent producers. I do not believe that many Senators, perhaps, are aware that in the case of the California field, for instance, there is not a single refinery, Standard or otherwise, within 200 miles of that field, and the oil is gathered from all of the wells in the case of the Standard pipe line which it owns upon private lands and upon public lands which it purchases from others and goes in a great big pipe line, and there it is mingled together and then it is transported more than 200 miles to a refinery. To attempt to regulate the price of the Standard oil coming from these wells is absolutely humanly impossible, because the Government can not follow that oil, and, when it gets to a tank wagon or a gasoline station, be able to prove that that oil came from one of these leased properties.

But how would it be in the case of a struggling independent refinery? This bill provides that these independent producers may combine for the purpose of erecting refineries themselves to compete with Standard Oil, because Standard Oil is always interested in giving these producers the very lowest sum, and then charging to the public the very highest sum for its refined product. The Senator says, "Well, we can regulate the product of these independent refineries, and that will help so much." But my objection is that there will not be any independent refineries. If the Government is to undertake to reserve to itself the power to regulate the price of the struggling independent refinery, and let the Standard Oil Co. go, there will not be any independent refineries. That is my objection to it.

I want to say that if any Senator upon the floor here will offer an amendment to this bill giving to the President the right to fix the price of all oil, whether produced from public lands or otherwise, I will vote for it, and let the courts settle our constitutional power to do so. This bill, however, is built upon the theory of competition from beginning to end, in the area that it permits, in providing for independent refineries, in providing that if the Government itself does not use the royalty oil it must be sold to the highest bidder. It is built upon the theory of competition; and yet this amendment would strangle the competition that is provided for in the bill. That is the trouble with the amendment. Instead of accomplishing what the Senator hopes to accomplish, it would have directly the opposite effect; and if there is one provision in this bill that, in my judgment, the Standard Oil Co. would welcome, it is this provision.

There is only one way in which we can reach the Standard Oil Co., and that is to put our hands upon it, either in attempting to remedy the crime that was perpetrated—and I call it such—in the reorganization of the Standard Oil Co. after the decision of the United States Supreme Court, or in fixing the prices directly. I have no brief for the Standard Oil Co. I will go as far as any Senator upon this floor in depriving it of its monopoly and bringing down the price of its products; but I am not willing to help build it up by an amendment of this kind.

My colleague and I disagree as to the result of it. He has his opinion. He is entitled to it. I have mine. I am just as conscientious in believing that the result of the adoption of this amendment would be in the interest of the Standard Oil Co. as he is in believing that it would be in the interest of the public.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just a word, Mr. President.

If the Government puts into every lease granted under the provisions of this bill, oil and coal, the conditions which are provided in my amendment, worked out, it can compel those companies, under the leases they take, to segregate the oil. It can impose any conditions it pleases. If need be, it could require the Standard Oil Co. to set up refineries right on the ground and refine this oil. Whoever takes from this Government the rich lands that are proposed to be leased here takes under any conditions which the Government sees fit to put into the law and to write into the leases; and when any Senator on this floor raises the question of the impossibility of making this amendment effective against Standard Oil, it seems to me he is pretty short in his vision.

Why, sir, this oil belongs to whom? It belongs to the public, not to the States, not to some administration, not to some committee of Congress. It belongs to the people. You have here, and have had around the doors of Congress, and thronging the rooms of the committees that deal with these subjects, the representatives of the greatest monopolies in the world, seeking to get this legislation through according to terms agreeable to them; but, sir, when they take under legislation which we pass, we can impose any conditions we please. We can require that the oil taken from these wells, or the coal mined on the Government land leased under the terms of this legislation, shall be prepared for the market on the ground, if need be; and my amendment gives the President the widest authority, and says that he is empowered, under rules and regulations, to determine how the products derived from these leased lands shall be handled, to the end that the price of them, reasonable to the producer and reasonable to the consumer, shall be determined by the Government. I say that there rest within the terms of that amendment the full power and authority of this Government, up to its constitutional limits, to control this product. It can say to Standard Oil, "If you take a barrel of oil out of this land, you shall keep it separated from the oil taken from other lands or assembled by you from other sources," and it can compel that to be done. It can make rules and regulations that will follow this oil out of the natural reservoirs where it rests, the property of the United States, the property of the people of this country, on until it reaches the consumers in every conceivable form at a reasonable price.

I say again that you will then have a standard, a fair price on a portion of Standard Oil production, and that will tend to compel Standard Oil, by the force of public opinion to begin with, and ultimately by legislation, because these regulated producers will demand it, to sell at a fair price.

My colleague urges that my amendment would be very fatal to the independents. Mr. President, the independents are only a vanishing, a rapidly vanishing, name in this business. As I said a moment ago, the richest field in all this country has been gathered together so that just two companies control it. That is affected by this legislation; and an amendment introduced last evening by the chairman of the committee permits holdings by each of these companies that aggregate 3,200 acres. That is something like 5 miles square, I think.

Now, Mr. President, I renew my demand for a roll call on this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEWBERRY in the chair). The yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will first ask for a quorum, because when the roll call starts I want to have this amendment read to the Senators who are going to vote upon it, instead of having them come in here as the vote is being taken and be told by Senators how they ought to vote, without knowing anything about the question that is pending. It is not fair to those Senators who are to be called in here to vote; and so, for the first time, I ask for a quorum. The roll call has not started. No one has responded to his name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Elkins	Harrison	King
Borah	Fall	Henderson	La Follette
Brandegee	France	Jones, N. Mex.	Lenroot
Chamberlain	Gay	Jones, Wash.	Lodge
Colt	Gronna	Kendrick	McCumber
Cummins	Hale	Kenyon	McKellar
Edge	Harris	Keyes	McNary
Moses	Phelan	Smoot	Warren
Myers	Poindexter	Sterling	Watson
Nelson	Sheppard	Sutherland	Williams
New	Shields	Swanson	Wolcott
Newberry	Smith, Ga.	Thomas
Norris	Smith, Md.	Wadsworth
Nugent	Smith, S. C.	Walsh, Mass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 7, after the word "thereof," insert the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That the Government hereby reserves the right at all times, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the President, to determine, fix, and control the selling price of all products derived from lands leased hereunder, whether in the crude or natural condition, or in other merchantable form, which shall be a reasonable price both as to the producer and the consumer, and the reservation of such right shall be expressly stated in each lease.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On that, Mr. President, I have asked for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, while I should be very glad to see the President given power to fix the price through proper means on all oil production in the country, I can not vote for an amendment that would grant a bureau power to fix the price of possibly one-tenth of the oil of the country and allow the price of the other nine-tenths to be ungoverned. In other words, in my opinion, if the Government is to fix the price of oil under these leases that must come in competition with the tremendous production of the Standard Oil Co. and other companies which have patents to their lands, there will be no leases taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. If I were not paired, I would vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut has not voted.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], and being unable to obtain a transfer at present I will withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH of Montana (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] which I transfer to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my standing pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. THOMAS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] are necessarily detained on official business.

Mr. SMOOT. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER];

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS];

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY];

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY]; and

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably detained on important public business, and if present would vote "nay."

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] on official business.

Mr. HARRIS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 48, as follows:

YEAS—10.

Cummins	Kenyon	Nugent	Walsh, Mass.
Gronna	La Follette	Sheppard
Harris	Norris	Trammell

NAYS—48.

Ashurst	Jones, N. Mex.	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Jones, Wash.	New	Smoot
Brandegee	Kendrick	Newberry	Sterling
Chamberlain	Keyes	Overman	Sutherland
Colt	King	Page	Swanson
Elkins	Lenroot	Phelan	Thomas
Fall	Lodge	Pittman	Underwood
France	McCormick	Poindexter	Walsh, Mont.
Gay	McKellar	Pomerene	Warren
Hale	McNary	Ransdell	Watson
Harding	Moses	Shields	Williams
Henderson	Myers	Smith, Ga.	Wolcott

NOT VOTING—38.

Ball	Fernald	Kirby	Sherman
Bankhead	Fletcher	Knox	Simmons
Beckham	Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Smith, Ariz.
Calder	Gerry	McLean	Smith, Md.
Capper	Gore	Martin	Spencer
Culberson	Harrison	Owen	Stanley
Curtis	Hitchcock	Penrose	Townsend
Dial	Johnson, Calif.	Phipps	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Johnson, S. Dak.	Reed
Edge	Kellogg	Robinson

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 27, line 9, after the word "Provided," insert:

That the Government shall in express terms reserve and shall provide in every lease of oil lands hereunder that the lessee, if owner, part owner, or operator of any pipe line operating reasonably accessible to the oil derived from lands under such lease, shall, at reasonable rates and without discrimination, accept and convey the oil of the Government or of any citizen or company operating a lease hereunder and not the owner of, or interested in the operation of, any pipe line.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I merely wish to say one word. Pipe lines are common carriers, and so declared, I think, by every State in the Union. They are under the regulation of the States. This question was before the committee, and Mr. Swartz, representing the independent oil refiners of Wyoming and other sections of the country, stated that they looked up the question very carefully and that there was no necessity for putting the provision in the bill. I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that that is what was reported to our committee.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. LA FOLLETTE addressed the Chair.

Mr. BORAH. I ask the Senator to permit the amendment to be read again.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will permit me, following the statement made by the Senator from Utah, before the amendment is read again, I should like to say that the amendment which I have offered is offered because Mr. Swartz came to my committee room this morning and made the suggestion that there was one independent left in that territory, together with the Government, which needed this protection. I remember now that I received the intimation somewhat in confidence, and I am rather sorry I mentioned his name.

Mr. LENROOT. I suggest that the amendment can do no possible harm.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not see how the amendment can do any more harm than the other. As we had 10 votes for the other, I think I shall ask for a vote on this amendment, notwithstanding the statement of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I asked Mr. Swartz if in Wyoming the pipe line was not a common carrier, and whether the regulation was not in the control of the State. He told me that it was, and that is the reason why I referred as I did to Mr. Swartz.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Probably that is true. If the Senator states that that intimation was given to him, I have no doubt it is the fact, but it is true that many of the States that have commissions for the regulation of public utilities do not regulate them, that they do not protect the public in the regulation. I know in my own State a new commission has transplanted the old commission, and the public is suffering to-day because the law on the statute books of the State is not administered in the public interest. So, because there is a statute providing for regulation, and the common carriers within the State and the local pipe lines would be under the regulations of one of those commissions, it does not always follow that it would be subject to regulation. It does not always follow that that regulation would protect these interests.

Here, again, I say that we are leasing this land. The Government takes a royalty in oil. It has to get that royalty somewhere after the oil comes out of the ground. It has either got to provide its own means of transportation or be at the mercy of those who have transportation, and so will any independent that may be left in this territory. I have been informed that there is only one independent left in all the Salt Creek country, that all the balance of the oil holdings have passed into the hands of the two great corporations, and that that independent, together with the Government, in any oil that it has to transport out of that territory, will be at the mercy of the owners of private pipe lines, subject to such regulation as the States may impose; but if the State neglects to protect the Government or to protect the lone independent as long as it may survive, they will be at the mercy of the owners of private pipe lines.

I do not see that this amendment can work any very considerable harm, and I ask for a vote upon it.

Mr. SMOOT. If the wording of the amendment will conform to just what the Senator from Wisconsin really has in mind I have not any objection to putting it in. The only reason why it was not put in the bill, as I said before, was because it was thought that there was no necessity for it. It can not do any harm, as the Senator from Wisconsin says, but I should like to have it reported again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment as requested by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and passed by for the moment.

The Secretary again read Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I rise to say that I do not see how anyone can find any fault with the principle of this amendment, and I am very glad to hear the chairman of the committee say that he has no objection to it; but I submit that the language ought to be changed somewhat. A lease will be denied to one who is a part owner in the adjacent pipe line unless he will agree that the pipe line shall transfer the oil at reasonable charges. Of course, if he is a minority holder he will have no control over the matter whatever. So that the effect would be to deny a lease to one who is a part owner if that part owner is unable to induce his associates, the owners of the majority interest, to establish reasonable rates.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I should be very glad to broaden the amendment by striking out the qualification to which the Senator calls attention. My only reason for putting it in was to try to enlist votes enough to get it through. If I can get it through in stronger form I shall be very glad indeed. So I will exercise the right which I believe I have to modify the amendment as I offered it by striking out the words in the last line, "or interested in the operation of." I will also strike out—I am encouraged to do that by the attitude of Senators toward the amendment—the word "reasonably," so that the amendment as I have now changed it would read as follows:

Provided, That the Government shall in express terms reserve and shall provide in every lease of oil lands hereunder that the lessee, if owner, part owner, or operator of any pipe line operating accessible to the oil derived from lands under such lease, shall, at reasonable rates and without discrimination, accept and convey the oil of the Government or of any citizen or company operating a lease hereunder and not the owner of any pipe line operating a lease under the provisions of this act.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the amendment as now modified by the Senator from Wisconsin does not reach the point to which I had addressed my remarks. I addressed my remarks to that portion of the amendment which denies a lease to a part owner.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I neglected to make one other change in the amendment. I will strike out the words "part owner," in order to meet the suggestion of the Senator. I am very thankful to him for his liberality.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was going to offer the suggestion to the Senator that he need not strike out that language if he will put in the words "controlling interest."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will insert the words "controlling interest" or "majority interest" he need not even strike out the language and the amendment would still have my approval; that is to say, if the applicant for the lease has actual control of a pipe line——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that is covered by the phraseology as it now stands. I will send it to the desk of the Senator for any suggestion he may be pleased to make.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I offer the following amendment to the amendment tendered by the Senator from Wisconsin: After the word "operator," in the third line of the proposed amendment, I move to insert "or owner of a controlling interest in any pipe line or of any company operating the same which may be," so that the amendment, if amended, will read:

That the Government shall in express terms reserve and shall provide in every lease of oil lands hereunder that the lessee, if owner or operator or the owner of a controlling interest in any pipe line or of any company operating the same which may be operating accessible to the oil derived from lands under such lease—

And so forth.

So that the restriction will extend not only to the owner and operator of the pipe line, but to any person who owns a controlling interest in the pipe line or the operating company.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let me ask the Senator if he has made any change in the remainder of the amendment? I had marked some changes to be made.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I tender my amendment to the amendment as it has been modified by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I accept the amendment proposed by the Senator. I think it makes clearer the purpose I intended to accomplish by the amendment as drafted. I drafted it hurriedly after having my attention called to the need for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Montana offer the amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin? We must keep the record straight.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understood the Senator from Wisconsin accepted the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I accept the amendment of the Senator from Montana and modify my amendment in that respect. I offer the amendment in the form in which it now stands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin as now modified.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to have it read to be sure that it contains the other changes which I myself have made in it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment as now modified.

The SECRETARY. On page 27, line 9, after the word "Provided" it is proposed to insert:

That the Government shall in express terms reserve and shall provide in every lease of oil lands hereunder that the lessee, if owner or operator or owner of a controlling interest in any pipe line or of any company operating the same which may be operated of any pipe line operating accessible to the oil derived from the land under such lease, shall, at reasonable rates and without discrimination, accept and convey the oil of the Government or of any citizen or company not the owner of any pipe line operating a lease under the provisions of this act.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Secretary has read the amendment correctly, but it should be accompanied with a suggestion that the words in the amendment as proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin "of any pipe line operating" be stricken out, for they are incorporated in the remainder of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. One moment, Mr. President. I am endeavoring to perfect the phraseology of the amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. May I suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that perhaps it will read better with the change I have suggested?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask that the amendment may be again read.

The SECRETARY. As modified the amendment now reads:

That the Government shall in express terms reserve and shall provide in every lease of oil lands hereunder that the lessee, if owner or operator or owner of a controlling interest in any pipe line or of any company operating the same which may be operated accessible to the oil derived from lands under such lease, shall, at reasonable rates and without discrimination, accept and convey the oil of the Government or of any citizen or company not the owner of any pipe line operating a lease under the provisions of this act.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that is all right, and I offer the amendment in that form.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, as nearly as I can understand the amendment in its present form it would seem to restrict the obligations of the owner of a pipe line who is one of the lessees under this act to a lesser duty than he owes at present under the general law, making pipe lines common carriers. I do not think that is the purpose of the Senator from Wisconsin, but the amendment provides that the pipe-line company shall be required to accept reasonable rates for the transportation of oil——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And without discrimination.

Mr. POINDEXTER. And without discrimination—if oil of the Government or other producers not owning a pipe line. The law as it is at present requires pipe-line companies as common carriers to accept at reasonable rates oil from anybody who offers it in accordance with the regulations governing common carriers.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator desires to offer an amendment to strike out the words "not the owner of any pipe line," very well. I included these words because I thought they would strengthen the amendment a little. That language would not compel pipe lines to receive the products of a competing company having a pipe line, but I should be very glad to have the amendment adopted in its strongest form, and, if the Senator will suggest that amendment, I will not object to letting the vote be taken upon it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I understand the law now, no matter whether a company has a pipe line or not, if it desires its oil carried in any particular pipe line, under the law the oil is required to be carried at a reasonable price.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The law is broad and is enforced.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to let the amendment come to a vote.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, certainly it can not be necessary to adopt the amendment suggested by the Senator from Washington, because the proposed reservation can not change the obligations of a common carrier pipe line. It merely adds to it by reservation, if the obligation does not otherwise exist; that is all.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the common carrier pipe line is a lessee, it would change his obligation.

Mr. LENROOT. Not as between the carrier and the citizen.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; but it can as between the carrier and the Government of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have another amendment which I will propose.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator from Wisconsin is not ready, I will tender the amendment I referred to a while ago.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will be very glad to have the Senator do that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, it is the purpose of this act to limit the holdings of any one person to 2,560 acres; but under the provisions of section 26 no one can hold more than one lease on land containing coal, phosphate, or sodium, even though that lease be for less than 2,560 acres. Of course it may often happen that in a certain locality the land available would be much less than that, and I think it would be entirely within the spirit of the bill if one were permitted to take any number of leases, but not covering an aggregate of more than 2,560 acres.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean of the different minerals?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No.

Mr. SMOOT. As to the different minerals that is provided for by the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, yes; but take coal, for instance. A person is unable to get in a certain place more than 640 acres because the remainder is all patented. A mile away, however, there is another tract which is open to entry. I have particularly in mind the case of phosphates. Deposits of phosphates, as Senators who are familiar with certain sections of the country well know, are often cut by erosion, so that, as I recall, in one place in my State the bed crops out on one side of a gulch and then the gulch cuts it, but it is perfectly apparent on the other side of the gulch possibly a mile and a half or two miles away. I presume probably that a man may run his lines, if he applies for 2,560 acres, over patented ground that would be included within his exterior limits, of course his lease extending only to the unpatented ground within the area as is done in patenting quartz mining claims and placer mining claims; but in any case the area which will be available to him will be reduced. My idea is that he ought to be permitted to take leases of coal lands no matter how many the number up to an aggregate of 2,560 acres.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator whether he has considered, especially with reference to coal, that if we permit a number of leases up to an aggregate of 2,560 acres it might result, at the entrance of a canyon, for instance, in bottling up the entire field or deposit and prevent any real working of a very large area?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not think there is any very just ground for apprehending such a situation——

Mr. LENROOT. I think there is.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Because, let me say to the Senator, that a man would have the right if the deposit lies in an entire body even across a canyon to take it up——

Mr. LENROOT. That is true.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And thus under the bill, as it stands now, the condition to which the Senator refers may arise.

Mr. LENROOT. But 320 acres might lie across one canyon and if one person is permitted to take a number of leases up to 2,560 acres he might tie up a half dozen canyons.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That could be easily remedied by a provision similar to another one in the bill limiting the area within which the leases could be taken. I think that on reflection Senators will not find any serious objection to that arrangement. That is really the plan we have in mind—to give a man an opportunity to take up 2,560 acres of coal.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I should like to call the Senator's attention to the provisions of section 2, on page 2 of the bill, which provides that the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to classify the lands—into leasing tracts of 40 acres each, or multiples thereof, and in such form as, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, will permit the most economical mining of the coal in such tracts.

I think probably that would cover the objections raised by the Senator from Wisconsin. It would, I think, enable the Secretary of the Interior to prevent the condition referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SMOOT. Section 26 of the bill specifically states, however, that as to coal, phosphate, and sodium there shall be only one lease within the State, and that is the provision the Senator from Montana has reference to; and really, I want to say to the Senator from Montana, I think it is a very wise provision. I do not believe that any corporation or any individual ought to be allowed within a State to have leases covering four sections altogether. I think it would work a great deal more hardship than it would possibly do any good, and I hope, therefore, the Senator will not press his amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I really can not anticipate any situation in which any possible harm could result. It is not at all unlikely that it will be construed by the department that these tracts must be contiguous; and you can very readily understand that there might be a tract of coal of 160 acres only and then adjacent to that, and, indeed, surrounding it, patented lands, and then at some distance farther, a mile away, there would be other coal lands. Now, it is not impossible that they would all remain entirely idle, because they could not be included in one lease, and the company would be unable to get the two leases, and the result would be that that land which would otherwise be developed would not be developed at all.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, there are provisions in the bill that would take care of that when one became worked out.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I did not understand the Senator's statement.

Mr. SMOOT. There is a provision in the bill that wherever there is a lease, and the coal has been worked out, there can be an extension of the lease to other tracts of land.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That does not help the situation.

Mr. SMOOT. No; that does not meet the situation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That does not help the situation at all. That would result in this way: The man would be forced to take the lease on the 160 acres, if he took any lease at all, having no right whatever to the other. By the time he got his 160 acres worked out the other might be appropriated.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the theory of this bill, as of course he knows, is that it is not profitable to take a smaller tract of coal land than 2,560 acres, and certainly not with phophate and sodium. In other words, if it is a smaller tract than that, particularly with coal, the expense of maintaining and operating it, putting in the necessary tipples, and arranging for the sidetracks and everything connected with it, would hardly justify doing so unless they had that quantity of coal.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, that is just exactly the point that I am endeavoring to impress upon the Senator. Take the case of a man operating a coal property. The vein is exposed upon both sides of a wide gulf, and under this language he can get only what is on either side. We will say there is 640 acres upon either side of this gulf. He could get only the 640 acres.

Mr. LENROOT. Not if that is all public land. If there are private lands about it, has the Senator considered section 6, which expressly provides for the case the Senator now speaks of?—

That where coal lands aggregating 2,560 acres and subject to lease hereunder do not exist as contiguous areas, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, if, in his opinion, the interests of the public and of the lessee will be thereby subserved, to embrace in a single lease noncontiguous tracts which can be operated as a single mine or unit.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am very glad the Senator called my attention to that. It had escaped my notice. What is the section to which the Senator refers?

Mr. SMOOT. Section 6.

Mr. LENROOT. But it must be operated as a single mine or unit.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course. That is what I have in mind.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what the Senator desires, as I understand.

Mr. LENROOT. It is fully taken care of.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But that applies only to coal lands. The same situation, however, exists with respect to phosphate and sodium, particularly with respect to phosphate. If a provision like section 6 were put in with relation to phosphate it would meet all my desires.

Mr. SMOOT. Then why not amend section 6 by inserting, after the word "coal," on line 14, the words "and phosphate," so that it would read:

That where coal and phosphate lands, aggregating, respectively, 2,560 acres.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I offer that, Mr. President, as my amendment, leaving it to the Secretary of the Interior under the conditions I have in mind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. SMOOT. It would be better to put in, after the word "coal," the words "or phosphate," on line 14, page 4.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 14, in section 6, after the word "coal," it is proposed to insert the words "or phosphate," so that if amended it would read:

That where coal or phosphate lands aggregating 2,560 acres—

And so forth.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Utah that in the case of section 20, the vote upon which was reconsidered and an amendment adopted to it, the section has not yet been agreed to as modified. The Chair is so informed. Without objection, the section as modified or amended is agreed to.

The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I move the adoption of the amendment, which I now send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, beginning with line 11, it is proposed to strike out all of section 18, or all down to and including line 24 on page 17.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask to have the Secretary read that portion of the bill which the amendment proposes to strike out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the section proposed to be stricken out.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Wisconsin proposes to strike out all of section 18, which begins on line 11 of page 15, and reads as follows:

SEC. 18. That upon relinquishment to the United States, filed in the General Land Office within six months after the approval of this act, of all right, title, and interest claimed and possessed since prior to July 3, 1910, by the claimant or his predecessor in interest under the pre-existing placer mining law to any oil or gas bearing land upon which there has been drilled one or more oil or gas wells embraced in the Executive order of withdrawal issued September 27, 1909, and not within any naval petroleum reserve, and upon payment to the United States of an amount equal to the value at the time of production of one-eighth of all the oil or gas already produced and saved from such land, the claimant, or his successor, if in possession of such land, undisputed by any other claimant prior to July 1, 1919, shall be entitled to a lease thereon from the United States for a period of 20 years, at a royalty of not less than 12½ per cent nor more than 25 per cent of all the oil or gas produced and saved: Provided, That not more than one-half of the area, but in no case to exceed 3,200 acres, within the geologic oil or gas structure of a producing oil or gas field shall be leased to any one claimant under the provisions of this section when the area of such geologic oil structure exceeds 640 acres. Any claimant or his successor, subject to this limitation, shall, however, have the right to select and receive the lease as in this section provided for that portion of his claim or claims equal to, but not in excess of, said one-half of the area of such geologic oil structure.

All such leases shall be made and the amount of royalty to be paid for oil and gas produced and saved after the execution of such lease shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior under appropriate rules and regulations: Provided, however, That as to all like claims situate within any naval petroleum reserve the producing wells thereon only shall be leased, together with an area of land sufficient for the operation thereof, upon the terms and payment of royalties for past and future production as herein provided for in the leasing of claims. No wells shall be drilled in the land subject to this provision within 660 feet of any such leased well without the consent of the lessee: Provided, however, That the President may, in his discretion, lease the remainder of any such claim upon which such wells have been drilled, and in the event of such leasing said claimant or his successor shall have a preference right to such lease: And provided further, That he may permit the drilling of additional wells by the claimant or his successor within the limited area of 660 feet theretofore provided for upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe.

No claimant for a lease who has been guilty of any fraud or who had knowledge or reasonable grounds to know of any fraud, or who has not acted honestly and in good faith, shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this section.

Upon the delivery and acceptance of the lease, as in this section provided, all suits brought by the Government affecting such lands may be settled and adjusted in accordance herewith, and all moneys impounded in such suits or under the act of August 25, 1914 (38 S. L., p. 708), shall be paid over to the parties entitled thereto. In case of conflicting claimants for leases under this section, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to grant leases to one or more of them as shall be deemed just. All leases hereunder shall inure to the benefit of the claimant, and all persons claiming through or under him by lease, contract, or otherwise, as their interests may appear.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have had printed some amendments that I desire to offer before the bill is reported to the Senate; and before submitting the amendments to the consideration of the Senate I desire to make some general observations upon the bill as a whole and upon the entire subject with which this measure deals.

There are two interests affected by this bill in which I feel a considerable concern. One is the public, the American citizen, the consumer. The second is the interest of the Government and the effect of this legislation upon the destiny of that Government and its place as a sea power.

First, Mr. President, from the standpoint of the public interest. The bill deals with the vital question of fuel, and how vital that question is was very profoundly impressed upon us when the war came and the shortage of coal that resulted from war conditions followed. We had not in the years gone by been so greatly impressed with the advancing price of coal for general consumption over the country. It is true that within a few years we had seen the price of coal advance very rapidly. I am speaking now of the conditions that prevailed before the war came upon us. We had seen the price of coal for warming the homes of the people of the country climbing higher and higher and higher. We have only need to go back a few years in the history of the country to realize what it means to have the coal that goes in the homes of the people of the United States pass under a single control. Mr. President, there was a time when individuals owned the anthracite coal of the United States. There was a time when that coal sold under competitive conditions at $2.50 a ton at the seaboard. The fields that supplied that coal are a very limited area—three little deposits of anthracite coal which if you could bring them together into one body would make only a limited area 8 miles by 60 miles. That is the distinctly anthracite-coal supply of the United States. We will be told that there is anthracite coal in Alaska; that there is a quality of bituminous coal in Colorado and in other places that approaches somewhat the quality of anthracite. I give it to you as a result of my investigation, based upon the report of the Geological Survey, that the purely anthracite coal of the United States is in three small areas.

Now, allow me step by step and rapidly to trace the history of the consolidation of the anthracite coal supply of the United States into the hands of one monopoly. It is a matter that I think we ought specially to consider with regard to this bill—the question of monopoly control—not ownership, because it is a leasing proposition, but it approaches, as I view it, very nearly under its provisions to a monopoly control of title by the provision with respect to perpetuating leases. I will come to that a little later in my discussion.

The three coal fields of which I have been speaking were located in Pennsylvania. Eight railroads ran into those three coal fields. The railroads saw the anthracite supply of coal was limited and that there was an opportunity to secure a monopoly of a product vital to the fuel supply of the people of the United States. I am giving you a history that can not be disputed when I say those railroads entered into a conspiracy to increase the freight rates upon the individual owners of the anthracite coal lands. They carried it to such a point as to compel the owners to part with the title to those coal lands to the railroads, the same railroads that furnished the only means of shipping coal out of these three anthracite coal fields of the United States.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the Senator from Wisconsin give us the names of those roads?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am not able to do so offhand.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the Senator put them in the RECORD?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will refer the Senator to the data from which he may secure all this information. This has all been developed by congressional investigation. Everything that I say here has back of it the report of a congressional committee or of a legislative committee upon this subject.

The eight railroads advanced the freight rate upon the individual owners of the anthracite coal lands until they could not afford to ship a single pound of coal to market. Mr. President and Senators, that impressed itself as a matter of deep concern upon the people of the State in which those three coal fields were situated—the State of Pennsylvania. What did they do? They called a constitutional convention with a view of prohibiting the railroads from carrying out their plan of securing the ownership of those coal lands. That constitutional convention was held in 1874 in the State of Pennsylvania. It adopted an amendment that wrote into the constitution of the State of Pennsylvania a provision that no railroad company should own a foot of land for mining purposes.

The legislation which now engages the attention of the Senate of the United States is the culmination of a struggle of private interests to control coal and the other natural resources of the country as against the interests of the people of the United States and the United States Government. I am giving you here a little of the preliminary history that may indicate to you the size and the vital importance of the fight you have upon your hands.

Mr. President, after the constitutional provision was adopted the representatives of the people of Pennsylvania went home from the convention with the belief that having written that amendment into the fundamental law of Pennsylvania they had secured emancipation for the individual owners of coal lands from the terrorism, the conspiracy, and the tyranny of the eight railroad lines that entered those coal fields. They were certain that the railroads would thereafter be barred from engaging in coal mining, and therefore there would be taken from them the incentive to increase freight rates upon the individual owners of coal mines and coal lands in order to force them to part with their property to the railroads.

Mark the next step in the history of this business. Do you think the railroad companies that entered these coal fields had any regard for the action of the State of Pennsylvania or for its citizens in writing that provision into their constitution? No. If you entertain such a belief, you do not know the power and the audacity of the interests that set out to control the natural resources of this country. It required an enacting clause by the Pennsylvania Legislature to enforce the constitutional provision. What did these railroad companies do? They went to Harrisburg and they bribed the legislature. Everybody knows it now. They prevented the passage and the adoption of the enforcing statute, and they went on putting up the freight rates on the individual owners of anthracite coal property until one after another they were obliged to take not what the property was worth but just what the agents of the railroad companies chose to pay.

It is a story of tragedy. It would deeply interest any Senator to read the history of that transaction, but it has only been written by a few men who have had the courage to write the history of that event.

I have been a student of this question and of other questions kindred to it. I do not think that it is any wonder that there are people in this country who are disturbed about this legislation. They may not understand its provisions, but I have been in receipt of telegrams here for two or three days from the West. No; they are not from farmers. They do not become active, perhaps, until they begin to pay the advanced prices for the oil. Perhaps the telegrams are from parties interested in some way adversely to the parties who are to be benefited by this legislation. I do not vouch for these telegrams, but I will put them in the RECORD, because it is my belief that every one by petition—and these telegrams are in the nature of petitions—has a right to be heard here. It is a poor right, Mr. President; it does not result in very much to the people who petition us. We receive their petitions, we send them to a committee, and they find their way into a waste-paper basket in a little while; but the Constitution—so much of it as we have left—says that the right of petition shall not be denied. So, viewing the telegrams that have come to me in that light, I am going to put them into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and give to these people an opportunity to have their voice heard here.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., August 22, 1919.

Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senate, Washington:

The entire West is getting aflame with rage against the pending infamous land and mineral leasing bill. Protests are being signed by bankers, manufacturers, merchants, professional men, supreme court and superior court judges, ex-governors, miners, and laborers by the thousands throughout the West, to be submitted to Congress. Mass meetings are being arranged, and every western Senator and Congressman supporting the bill will face this fury. The West has been lied to and betrayed and is now being sold out to England, for whom this bill is intended, to confirm their oil and mineral world monopoly. We beg you to oppose and kill the bill. Read the Husting report to the Senate; also this telegram.

[Telegram.]

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., August 24, 1919.

Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Thanks for your distinguished courtesy. We are committee on legislation for thousands organizing in West against damnable leasing measure, making peons and tenants of westerners for English Government, now establishing commercial empire in United States soil. Senate seemingly acquiesces in having English Empire purchase all producing American oil properties in Western States. We demand that publicity be given to all public officials who held or now hold stock in properties recently bought by English Government in California and Mexico. We demand that investigation be made of the $150,000 alleged to have been paid to have Interior Department clear-list for patent millions of dollars of oil land not subject to patent which has recently become the property of the English Government. We demand to know who maintained great lobby in Washington for this leasing bill, $225,000 of which can be shown. We want to be shown why out of 13,000,000 acres of oil land withdrawn by presidential proclamation from entry, excluding American citizens, only 160 acres affected English holdings in California. We want to know why American newspapers refuse to publish any protests by American citizens against this leasing bill. We want to know what relationship this bill bears to the acknowledged world monopoly of the English Government. We want to know why Congressmen and Senators have not read telegrams and letters and memorials on the open floors of the Congress Halls, sent by reputable citizens and organizations, who want to know why congressional committees have only sounded the opinions of oil men who had properties to sell to the English Government when seeking public sentiment on this leasing measure. We want to know why Interior Department drove American locators off potash lands on technicalities and patented 40,000 acres to an English corporation. We want to know what powerful influence is behind this leasing measure, so often repudiated. Great mass meetings being arranged all over West. Gov. Meikeljohn, of Nebraska, and Hon. Ben McLendon, of California, open western campaign this week. Speakers and meetings being arranged in all States. Railway strike impedes this work. A national issue being made. We trust you as a defender of American rights. Long lists of signers to protest will be mailed you.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I understood that the telegram which the Senator has just read was signed by certain parties designated as a "committee on legislation."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I read just what is in the telegram. The Senate can judge about that itself.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to know, if the Senator has the information, as to who has appointed the committee?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. When I have read these telegrams, the Senate will have the information that I have about them. I want that understood. I do not feel at liberty to suppress them because they came to me. I want the Senate to have the same information with regard to these matters that I have, and so I present them.

[Telegram.]

DENVER, COLO., August 24, 1919.

Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.:

On behalf of claimants whose rights are attempted to be taken away in the pending oil-leasing bill, and who have not had an opportunity to urge their rights before Congress, as the large oil interests have, I desire to enlist your opposition in Senate to the pending bill. Section 18 of bill is unjust in many ways, and particularly in attempting to adjudicate rights of rival claimants as between themselves by providing that the claimant in possession (even though his possession may not be legal or right) where possession has not been disputed prior to July 1, 1919, should secure lease from Government. This provision thereby attempts to give lease to even those who have no legal or equitable rights. If rival claimants have for any reason been unable to dispute said possession prior to July 1, there should be an amendment changing the date July 1, 1919, to a reasonable time after passage of the bill, so that rival claimants could adjudicate their rights in court, and successful claimant could then, if he desired, surrender his claim to Government, and secure lease. I can not believe majority of the Senate desire to destroy the rights of poor claimants who have been unable to dispute possession of large interests prior to July 1 by court proceedings. If you can secure this amendment you will be protecting hundreds of poor claimants against an attempted destruction of even their legal remedies.

M. A. HERSHEY.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will my friend yield for one observation? It is not really a question.

In the first telegram which the Senator read, as I remember, the statement was made that it was reputed that the Interior Department had received $150,000 for clear-listing certain claims which it passed to the English Government or to Englishmen. I want to protest against any such slander as that contained in that telegram. I have not agreed with Secretary Lane and with many of the administrative acts of the Interior Department. I think the Interior Department has been arbitrary in many ways in the interpretation of the law and has not been liberal enough in behalf of the claimants for mineral as well as for agricultural lands, but I venture to state that no more honest official than Secretary Lane can be found in this or any other country, and I make the same statement with respect to all of the officials of the Interior Department. They are men of ability and of the highest integrity, and, in my opinion, all the money in the world would not swerve them a hair's breadth from their duty as they conceive it to be.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, I will proceed. The junior Senator from Utah may have occasion, before I finish, to revert to this subject again. I have in my possession the report made by my late deceased colleague, Senator Husting, of Wisconsin. I purpose to present such portions of that report as are material to the consideration of this legislation. It may raise, if not with respect to the Secretary of the Interior, with respect to some of the employees of the department the question to which the Senator from Utah addressed himself, and I might say to him that if I present all of that report it will interest him, and may call upon him for something more than a personal expression of confidence in the integrity of the whole department.

I read another telegram, Mr. President:

[Telegram.]

DENVER, COLO., August 24, 1919.

Senator LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Oil-leasing bill a Standard Oil measure, and menaces western oil interests. Standard Oil, New Jersey, owns 80 per cent stock Imperial Oil Canada, which controls Midwest Refining, and it controls Merritt Oil Corporation, Grass Creek Petroleum, Western States, Utah Oil & Refining, Mountain & Gulf, Boston, Wyoming, with long contract for entire production of Midwest Oil Co. and its subsidiaries and many others operating in all Wyoming districts. Passage means Standard Oil control of western oil production. Honest investigation under Phipps resolutions will tell story. Time permitting could furnish petition against passage with thousands of signers. Standard Oil legislation as popular in Colorado and West as smallpox.

FRED W. PARKS.

I do not know Mr. Parks.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, Mr. Parks is a member of the Colorado bar.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, is the Senator able to tell us whether Mr. Parks appeared before the Public Lands Committee to express the views shown in the telegram or to explain to the committee how it is that this is a Standard Oil bill?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Why, Mr. President, I am not a member of that committee.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Neither am I. I thought possibly the Senator might know.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not know whether or not Mr. Parks was advised that he might appear. I am just presenting to the Senate, without explanation or addition or subtraction, telegrams which have come into my hands, in order that the Senate may have as much information about those telegrams and about the senders as I have. I know none of them. They are strangers to me, as I stated a while go. I do not know whether they had an opportunity to appear before the Public Lands Committee or not. I do know that very early in this session a desire was manifested to hurry this legislation along.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator may recall that I asked several times, at least twice, when we might expect the report of the committee on it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not remember that. I may not have heard that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will advise the Senator that I did so; but I was particularly concerned to learn, if the view was not expressed by Mr. Parks, if the view was expressed before the committee by any other witness in elucidation of the charge that this is a Standard Oil bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I think the members of the committee would be more competent to answer that question than I. They conducted whatever hearings were had, if any were had. I only know this: I know that this bill came in without any report at all from the committee—quite an unusual proceeding with a measure as important as this—a bill that proposes to dispose by lease, which can be renewed every 10 years, unless legislation can be secured to stop it, for all time to come.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I did not intend to draw out any argument from the Senator upon the general merits of the bill, but I am particularly concerned, because I have been urging the legislation, to learn from some source how this comes to be a Standard Oil bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not know whether it will be within my power to contribute anything to the discussion here which will tend in the slightest degree to enlighten the Senator from Montana. I just propose, as best I can, with such facts and arguments as my humble ability and means will permit me to lay before the Senate, to discharge my duty as a Senator here upon this floor regarding this legislation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire to say in this connection that no Senator upon the floor that I know anything about is more competent to do so than the Senator from Wisconsin. I do not find any fault with him at all. I am particularly concerned with the charge made in this telegram—that is all—because it was suggested early in the debate that some people were apprehensive that that was the case; and I have waited with some degree of patience, I think, to learn just how we have been so hoodwinked.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should be glad to have any Senator here stand up on the floor and say whether any of the numerous representatives of Standard Oil who are about the Senate Chamber and in the galleries have solicited the opposition of any Senator to the passage of this bill. I think that might shed a little light on it. They are here. There is not any doubt about that.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as chairman of the Public Lands Committee, I will say that as far as I know no person interested in the Standard Oil Co. in any way has either asked for the legislation or protested against it. I will say that they have never done it, as far as I personally am concerned.

I do not understand that the Senator from Wisconsin is reading these telegrams because he approves them. I know the Senator from Wisconsin knows there are not 13,000,000 acres of oil lands withdrawn in the United States. I know the Senator from Wisconsin knows there are not more than 6,500,000 acres, and that land, it is understood by the Geological Survey, is only land that perhaps may contain oil. Yet the sender of the telegram makes it appear that there are 13,000,000 acres of oil land withdrawn in the United States.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I did not assume to correct anything in the telegrams. I presented the telegrams just as other Senators here present letters and telegrams and memorials every morning from people all over the country, which are noted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. PHELAN and Mr. WALSH of Montana addressed the Chair.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just a word more, and then I will yield. In the first place, there can not be any legislation before the Senate of the United States dealing in a broad way with oil interests without the representatives of these big oil companies being present. That I think would be accepted by everyone.

Mr. SMOOT. In all fairness, and I know the Senator from Wisconsin wants to be perfectly fair, it is true there was no report made upon this bill, but as I said in my opening statement the legislation has been before Congress for 10 years. I can take the Senator from Wisconsin or any other Senator over to the committee room of the Committee on Public Lands, where there is not, I will say to the Senator, a ton of hearings, but there are tons of hearings. We have had hearings upon this legislation year after year. The Senator knows, because I think he has read the hearings, that there is repetition after repetition, the same testimony given each time a hearing is had. The Committee on Public Lands thought that it was perfectly useless to have any more hearings upon this line of legislation.

As the Senator from Wisconsin knows, in the past I have been opposed to a leasing system; but the resources of the West have been held up. Nearly 100,000,000 acres, besides the forest withdrawals, in the West are lying undeveloped, and no power on earth can develop those lands until some legislation is passed, because that has been the policy not only of this administration but of former administrations.

So I admit to the Senator that, as far as I am concerned, I decided that I did not want a bill, as was suggested here at the last session, where there was a foot of land taken out of the ownership of the Government of the United States. It ought to be a leasing proposition entirely. I also decided, as far as I was concerned, that I wanted that leasing bill to be the very best bill that could possibly be made. I say now, without fear of contradiction, that if this bill becomes a law neither the Standard Oil Co. nor any combination of men on earth can control the development of the natural resources of the country.

I wanted to say that much to the Senator, because I know he is interested in this class of legislation and has been from the beginning as deeply interested as any man in the United States.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. May I interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin now?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to add just a few words further before I yield.

I had started to say in reply to the first interruption of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that the fact that legislation involving the disposition, even though it be by lease, of all the remaining oil lands of the United States could not well be pending before the Senate of the United States or the Congress without the representatives of Standard Oil, and other big concerns that have sought to acquire a monopoly control over that important product to the life of the American people, being present and having an eye upon it. There is not a word or syllable in the bill that they do not know just as well as any Member of the Senate, and it may be a good deal better. They know the scope and purpose and effect of it; they know the effect of the decisions which have been made in cases; they know its relation to the holdings of the Interior Department; they know its relation to the rulings of every authority in the United States that would have anything to do with its administration. In short, they know all about it. The fact that they have been on the ground and have not made any protest against this legislation leads one to wonder. I said a moment ago I would like to have any Senator rise in his place on this floor and say that he had been called upon by a representative of one of the big oil companies protesting against the passage of the bill. If they are here in opposition to the bill, I should like to know it. If it suits them so perfectly that they are not raising any question about any provision in it, I should like to know that fact also.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I should like to ask if it would not be a fairer inference for us to assume that such representatives would feel that a petition of that kind would be wholly useless, that they could not expect the Senate to enact legislation which would produce the ill effects of a monopoly such as the Senator has described as having been instituted by the Standard Oil Co., and would not those representatives feel a delicacy in coming to Senators with a proposition looking to that end? Would it not be useless for them to come to Senators with any such proposition and might not that explain their absence?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is possible, Mr. President, that the Standard Oil Co. and its lobbyists have a new view of things and that they are supersensitive about saying anything to anybody about legislation, but that hardly comports with their history down through the years. Standard Oil has been the most brazen, the boldest, the most aggressive violator of the law that legislative bodies in any country ever had to contend with. It has driven people all over this country out of business, crushed competition, and driven competitors to suicide. It has had in its employ the employees of competitors who have sold to it the secrets of those competitors. There is nothing that is reprehensible that the Standard Oil Co. has not done. There is not anything that requires boldness and craft and brazenness that they have not acquired. I do not know why they might not have called out some Senators and said, "This measure is not just fair."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have been connected for about six years with this question, of course not all that time as a Member of this body; and I think I can safely state to the Senator that the only purpose which anybody has ever had in framing this legislation is so to devise a plan that these public resources may be developed and that there shall be no monopoly. That has been the purpose of everybody connected with it, so far as I have been advised, and if we have failed in the bill to so provide it is simply because we have not the intellectual capacity so to do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am coming to that question a little later in my discussion.

I want to say, and I might as well say it right now, that I realize and sympathize with the views of western Senators who have had such large areas of land withdrawn from development in their respective States. I know it throws a very heavy burden upon the taxable lands of the States, and I know, too, that they are looking after the interests of their constituents as consumers of these products. They hope to see by the development which will take place under these measures larger production and competition, a lowering of prices, and a supply to consumers on better conditions. I can sympathize with that, because as a younger man than I am now I lived through exactly that sort of condition in the State of Wisconsin. We had vast natural resources——

Mr. WALSH of Montana rose.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the Senator pardon me if I yield a moment later? Will the Senator interrupt me again?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Very well.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Wisconsin was one of the finest timber States in the United States. We went through a similar struggle in Wisconsin in regard to our vast timber resources. We had the same argument made to us there that you hear day by day from the western Senators here. It is all an old chapter to us. We did with our timber what you propose to do here. They swept it off; they organized their lumber trust; they exploited the people of Wisconsin. We got very little benefit from their "development." They devastated the northern half of the State by leaving conditions there which produced annual fires that swept over it and made a large portion of it a charred and blackened waste year after year.

These great lumber organizations, enriched by the despoliation of our natural resources in Wisconsin, became the dictators of the public policy of the State. They took charge of legislation and exempted themselves from taxation up in their timberlands. They were not content with that. They became interested, of course, in the transportation problem. They went in with the railroads of Wisconsin, and became a great force, a great corrupting force, in that State. I undertake to say that Senators from the West fully realize how the Amalgamated Copper Co., a great mining organization, has gone into your western country and under the name of development acquired control by corporations and by syndicates of your great natural resources, amassed great wealth, dominated your politics, elected your governors, controlled your State legislatures, and entered contests for United States Senatorships.

These high-handed methods finally resulted in the education of the public until out of it there grew a widespread demand for the conservation of these natural resources. It had its beginning along about 1906.

What took place with regard to timber in Wisconsin, Michigan, and Minnesota has taken place with regard to coal and iron and copper and other mineral resources throughout the country. We have looked on quiescently while these great natural products have been absorbed and have passed under the control of the great monopolies, and then we marvel, Mr. President, at the cost of living climbing higher and higher year by year. What idiocy that is! What stupidity! What can be expected if the iron, coal, copper, and timber, which control the cost of everything else, are in the hands of monopolies, with the result that they fix the price?

Mr. President, this bill comes before the Senate as a leasing bill, and, therefore, disarms much criticism that was leveled at the conference report of last session.

Mr. WALSH of Montana rose.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I beg pardon; I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I thank the Senator very much, but the matter to which I desired to direct attention was discussed by the Senator some time ago. I was simply concerned in the statement of the telegram that this was a Standard Oil bill, and I felt that the Senator would probably indulge me at this time to say just a word about the genesis of this bill. It is easily traceable, because in every essential respect——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would not like to yield for any lengthy statement by the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, no; I shall not take 60 seconds.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Very well. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The genesis of this bill goes back to a bill which was introduced in 1913 or 1914, it being in all essential particulars like this, although, of course, differing somewhat in details. That bill was introduced by myself, having been prepared by a committee called together by Secretary Lane, consisting of the chairmen of the Committees on Public Lands, the chairmen of the Committees on Mines and Mining, and the chairmen of the Committees on Agriculture, if my recollection is correct, of the Senate and House of Representatives. They, in conjunction with Secretary Lane and his assistants, prepared the bill. That is all I care to say about this being a Standard Oil bill.

As the Senator from Wisconsin has very justly and very fairly stated, it would be impossible to frame a bill dealing with the great subject of oil that would not invoke the interest of the Standard Oil Co., and I dare say, in the absence of any further information about the matter, that that is the entire foundation of the statement in the telegram that this is a Standard Oil bill.

I shall gladly join with the Senator from Wisconsin in any amendment that he may have to proffer to insure, what was the purpose of the framers of the bill originally, that no advantage could be taken of it by the Standard Oil Co. to increase its monopoly upon the American people.

I want to take this occasion to say also, as the Senator said something about the matter, that this bill affects 10,000,000 acres of land in my State, most of it being coal land; some 8,000,000 acres, as my recollection is, being coal lands, the remainder being oil and phosphate lands. I will put into the RECORD the correct amount. That comprises nearly one-eighth of the great State that I have the honor in part to represent here. That land, as the Senator has indicated, has been tied up for years. Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin to imagine that one-eighth of the total area of the land in his State were held in one ownership and that the owner of that land declined to convey it at all to anybody or to lease it to anybody for development or use or operation. I undertake to say that it would raise a revolution in the State of Wisconsin. If, in addition to that, that owner, who would be regarded as a public enemy by reason of the holding of the land of that area, had in some way or other secured exemptions from taxation for State, county, or local purposes, it would raise a protest.

I feel like expressing to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] the appreciation of the people of my State of his interest in this measure and of the help he has afforded toward bringing it to a culmination. I am very glad that the Senator from Wisconsin has tendered a number of amendments, to which my attention has been called and to some of which I can give my hearty concurrence. I trust, however, that he will appreciate that it is easy to stimulate undeserved opposition to this bill by merely characterizing it, even by indirection, as a Standard Oil bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, as I suggested a moment ago, I can understand the attitude of western Senators toward this legislation. I know, in a way, what it means to have large areas of a State segregated and placed apart so that they can not be settled and disposed of. The northern area of Wisconsin, embracing what are known as cut-over lands, which have been subject to annual fires, could not by reservation by public authority have been taken much more effectually out of sale or occupation. That area has been an eyesore in the State for a good many years. Now, we have overcome the prejudice that resulted from that sort of thing. We have at State expense patrolled that area and reduced the damage by fire, so that those lands are now coming into cultivation and are coming to be regarded as a very productive accession to our agricultural lands. That section in time will be one of the best parts of the State. We have, however, suffered in a way in the State, not in all respects as the Senator's State has suffered, but in a way we have had an opportunity to know something of the feeling. For that reason I have had a great deal of sympathy with the western view upon this question. It must be recognized, Mr. President, that the exploitation of the natural resources of our country has made this question a vital matter, a burning question in every home not only to the people of the State who would like to see development, but to the people in every section of the country who have an interest in the coal and the oil and the other natural resources that are in the Government holdings in the respective States. So we have come, Mr. President, to have some estimate of the national value of these products and of the national interest in them.

Our coal supply will last for a long period of time; but the monopoly of that coal supply amounts to almost a denial of its use to the poor people of this country. As to our oil, so far as we know the quantity is limited, and with the present consumption of oil in a few years the known supply will be exhausted. As to phosphates, the situation is somewhat problematical. We are hopeful that we are going to develop large resources in that direction, but we do know that a very large area of our country has become almost totally unproductive for the lack of phosphates and other fertilizer. We know that even in the fertile Middle West the yield of the wheat fields, which have been harvested again and again for the last 20 years, is falling off every year, which makes proper solution of this problem a vital thing to the life of the Nation and the position it will hold among the nations of the world. So, while granting your deep interest in it, your home interest, your local interest, we can not altogether forget that the question of the control of these great national resources affects most intimately every home, the feeding of every family, and everything that goes to take care of life and makes it possible.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am indebted to the Senator for his courtesy in the matter; but, speaking of phosphates, I am reminded that the matter is by no means one of local concern. The Senator is quite right that the productiveness of our wheat fields, as shown by the records, is diminishing; and it is a part of the plan of the utilization of these phosphate deposits in the West, which are of great extent and area, to inaugurate a campaign to educate the people of the Central West and Northwest, who have never been accustomed to use commercial fertilizers at all, to the benefits that would accrue to them by the use of phosphates and nitrogenous fertilizer. Even now our agricultural resources could be vastly increased by the application of such fertilizers. That is a part of the plan that is in mind, but, of course, so long as the insoluble rock lies out there in my State and in the States of Idaho and Wyoming it is not doing anybody any good.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, all of this general discussion, of cource, bears upon the bill that is before us. It seems to me that any such bill, in view of the experience that we have had in this country, ought to be carefully considered and analyzed. The most important question, from my point of view, is whether this bill makes for the emancipation of the people of this country from monopoly control of these products or whether it will result in a still further extension of the monopoly control of these products.

I think there is a wide difference between the bill that is pending here and the bill that was presented in the conference report at the close of the last session of Congress. I have noted some of the differences, thinking that I would call the attention of the Senate to them.

It will be remembered that the coal and oil bill presented in the form of a conference report failed of passage in the closing hours of the last Congress.

The passage of that bill was urged as the best thought of the committees of both Houses upon the subject with which it dealt.

Its passage in this body was opposed, and it was defeated.

Contrast the conference bill of last session with this bill, which deals with the same subjects.

1. The conference bill, masquerading as a leasing bill, was in fact a patenting measure, and except for its defeat the remaining resources of coal, oil, phosphate, and sodium would have passed from public ownership to private control.

2. The conference bill would have wiped out the Alaska coal-leasing act and would have thrown open to private exploitation the great coal fields of Alaska, over which the Ballinger controversy raged.

3. The conference bill would have allowed collusion in the bidding of any coal or oil lessees who availed themselves of its provisions. Manifestly this would have defeated leasing, and in any event would have given a preference to monopoly interests.

4. The conference bill would have allowed the transcontinental railroads to secure 2,560 acres of coal land for any use under lease for every 200 miles in actual operation.

5. The conference bill would have allowed the Grand Canyon National Park to be despoiled by private interests.

6. The conference bill "hamstrung" municipal operation of coal mines by allowing only 160 acres to be secured.

7. The conference bill allowed through its "competitive-bidding features" small opportunity for an executive official of the Government to protect the public interest.

8. The conference bill allowed claimants upon the naval oil reserves whether cases were pending in courts or were before the department to be compromised by Executive action.

9. The conference bill allowed claimants within the naval oil reserves to secure rights which the courts denied and gave them generous settlement both as to receipts empounded in escrow and a royalty of not less than one-eighth.

10. The conference bill allowed the validation of claims of those who had purchased the same from another who had fraudulently entered the land if such purchaser was without notice of fraud.

11. The conference bill contained all through liberal clauses in favor of "relief claimants" and at the same time allowed them to secure rights which the courts and present law denied to them.

12. The conference bill gave no authority to the Secretary of Agriculture to contest the lands under his jurisdiction which would come within that measure.

I do not like the provisions of this bill as to the railroads, and for that reason I have drawn amendments to it; but I dislike it very much less than the provisions of the bill that was presented in the conference report.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in that connection I wish to say to the Senator that this bill—not the conference-report bill, for that was defeated—affects only one railroad in the United States, and that is the Milwaukee Railroad. I want to say to the Senator also, and I do not think it is out of place to say, that in this bill as I first reported it the provision as to the railroads was exactly the same as it was in the conference report; but Hon. Gifford Pinchot not only called my attention in person to that provision but I now have his letter in which he asks that that original proposition be amended and that the provision we have in this bill be incorporated. I do not want to take the time of the Senator now to tell Mr. Gifford Pinchot's reasons for it, but I have it right before me; and I thought, and so did your committee think, that the reasons were of a protective nature rather than anything else. There is not any other railroad affected by this provision than the Milwaukee Railroad, and I believe that the Senator really understands the situation of the Milwaukee Railroad as to why this legislation would seem to be absolutely fair and just to that corporation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Under the bill as presented in the conference report in March a very large area of the coal lands of the country would have passed into the control of the railroads and would have been tied up by the provisions of that bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Not only the railroads, but any common carrier.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, that is true; it was broader than the railroads.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But as I remember it, as it applied to the railroads, something over 125,000 acres would have been controlled in that way by the St. Paul road, and I think nearly a million acres by less than a dozen railroads running west from the Mississippi River. That is a very liberal policy in these times, when anthracite coal is selling at $12 a ton here in Washington, to pass into the control of railroad companies in this country west of the Mississippi River upward of a million acres of coal lands belonging to the people.

Let me refer to another thing that that bill did that was presented here last March; I feel a bit justified in referring to that bill, and referring to it in a spirit of criticism and condemnation. I think it warrants us in scanning this bill with great care.

Mr. SMOOT. I would not even sign the report.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I remember that the Senator from Utah refused to sign the conference report; but that bill, I think, was—I am just trying to keep within parliamentary phraseology—I think it was a very bad bill, and a bill that is repudiated by the bill which is presented here by this committee. Yet, Mr. President, as I remember it, all but four members of the Senate Committee on Public Lands who approved this bill were on the committee, except, as I remember, the Senator from Utah, who was on the conference committee and refused to sign the report. I do not remember that the conference-report bill was opposed by the Senate Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SMOOT. In justice to the members of the committee I wish to say to the Senator that there were other members of the committee who were opposed to it. They were not members of the conference committee, however.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, I combed this floor for support in opposing that bill, and I had to take the onus and the criticism of beating that conference report by a four or five hour filibuster on this floor; and I am gratified that that legislation stands condemned by the committee in bringing in this bill, which is very different from it and is an improvement upon it.

Mr. President, after all, there is just one big issue involved, and that is to release the people of this country from the monopoly control of their natural resources. I think the experience of this country with regard to its natural resources admonishes us that our first duty is to the American people, and in the light of that experience I believe we ought to scan this bill from its first to its last line. It should contain every safeguard that can be written into law to assure to the people of this country these important essentials of life at a reasonable price. If it does not contain these safeguards, we are remiss in our duty as representatives of the people if we do not amend it so as to insure them that result.

I do not think you can escape from the charge that you are aiding a monopoly control of these natural resources by converting it from a patenting bill into a leasing bill. I have heard Senators on the floor while this bill has been pending say, "Well, I suppose this bill is all right. It does not give title to the land. It is a leasing bill." But I believe this leasing bill is so framed that the renewal of the leases which it provides will result in substantially the same monopoly control that we would have under a patenting measure. And so I say, Mr. President, that the past experiences of the public with the monopoly control of its natural resources should admonish us to consider this bill line by line, since it involves practically all that remains of our great natural resources.

Mr. President, I believe we should also consider the effect of this legislation upon the position of the Government, and that brings me to say a word about the effect of certain sections of this bill upon the controverted question of naval reserves.

This morning I came across a very interesting dispatch from London, dated August 24, a United News dispatch. It is a quotation from an article that appeared in the Weekly Observer, of London, by Sir Lee Chiozza Money, a prominent financier and economist:

LONDON, August 24.

America's lead in world trade has become so great that it will take Great Britain a "long, long" time to overtake the United States, Sir Lee Chiozza Money, prominent financier, economist, and member of Parliament, wrote to-day in the Weekly Observer.

According to Money, who has made a close analysis and comparison of the position occupied by the two countries, it is almost impossible for Great Britain to regain her world supremacy, owing to the vast American natural resources, the unprecedented growth of the American mercantile marine, and the expansion of American industry before her entrance into the war, when Europe was dissipating her strength and vitality in battle.

He calls attention, however, to the possibility of American natural resources being exhausted during the next generation because of unregulated exploitation and tremendous waste. I quote further from Sir Lee:

"Before the war it was German competition that was feared by the British exporters," Money writes. "To-day the talk is all about the American competition. We hear of contracts being lost to America at home and abroad. Pictures are drawn of America becoming the workshop of the entire world. The industrial leadership which she held before the war has become more pronounced. We need not be surprised if these facts fill many observers with alarm. Certainly it is not within the power of Britain to win back the industrial supremacy which departed before the war so long as America's natural resources remain incomparably greater than ours."

Money produces figures to show that in 1912 the United States produced nearly twice as much coal and six times as much iron as Great Britain did.

"But in America the greatest producer is also the greatest waster," he continues. "The virgin fertility of the soil, the timber, coal, iron, and other wealth is wasted with such prodigality that if stern measures are not taken to check this irresponsible exploitation the United States will quickly level herself with many less favored countries."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Do I infer from this article that the writer of it intends to suggest that the resources of this country should not be used—that we are wasting them because we are using these natural resources—or does he suggest that we are using them in a way which does not derive the greatest benefit from them? I assume that the Senator from Wisconsin knows that these resources are absolutely worthless if they remain unused.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If they remain unused, they are not wasted, and they may be exploited in a very wasteful way. I suppose the Senator knows that we are wasting, beyond hope of recovery, fully 40 per cent of the coal that is being mined under existing conditions. That is the report of the geological department of this Government.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I realize that we are improving the methods for the use of these commodities right along. Our scientists are doing the best they can to minimize the waste. There is a vast waste in the use of coal by any process which is known at the present time. That is, we do not get out of it the heat units which are in the coal, or, rather, we do not utilize the heat units which are in the coal; but we can not stop the development of the country.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator quite misunderstood my statement. I thought I made it plain that I referred to the mining of the coal. We are leaving in the ground under conditions that do not permit of recovery by any possibility, according to the views of the experts of the geological department of the Government, 40 per cent of the coal in the fields that are being operated and mined at the present time, a policy of wastefulness that is little less than criminal. I care not whether the coal lands belong to private individuals. The question of the supply of material to turn the wheels of industry and to warm the homes of the American people is a question that goes beyond the consideration of private ownership and the rights of private owners.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Senator pardon an interruption in this connection?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think the estimate the Senator has given of the waste in the ordinary way of mining coal is easily within the facts and the reports. There is an enormous waste. The matter was called very forcibly to my attention some time ago. Both the Geological Survey and the Bureau of Mines have been calling persistently the attention of the country to that fact. It appears, however, that the only remedy for the situation is to drive the workings clear through to the remote end of the bed and commence to mine at the extremity and then allow it to cave as you come forward. If you begin to mine at the face of the tunnel and go in, you are obliged to leave a support of some kind. So it becomes a matter of the very highest economy. One of the largest coal operators in the country, if not the largest, is personally very strongly in favor of legislation which would compel a system of mining that would thus conserve the coal. But I am told that that would be a burden which the small operator could not possibly sustain, and that the result would be to give to the great monopolies of the country a still more certain monopoly over the production. That is an aspect of it which I thought the Senator ought to have in mind.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator has simply confirmed my own recollection upon the subject. Some 12 years ago, I think, I made as thorough an investigation as I was able of mining operations in various countries of the world under the most enlightened and advanced regulation that had been applied. I know at that time Great Britain, France, and Germany, by laws and supervision, had the right to enter even mines privately owned and to impose upon the owners certain conditions with a view of preventing waste in mining.

Every bill that I have offered—and I have offered a number of bills on this subject since I have been a Member of the Senate—has provided for Government control of all mining operations, with a view to preventing waste, including a provision in the bill, incorporated in the lease, to terminate the lease whenever it is ascertained that wasteful mining is being prosecuted.

In answer to the suggestion made by the Senator from Montana that the enforcement of a rule which would prevent waste would tend to put some of the small operators out of business, and therefore result in a still larger control of the coal market and the coal production by the large operators, I think, if the Senator will pardon me, that his suggestion overlooked an important consideration in the whole matter, not only with regard to coal but everything else. The price of all the great products that control the cost of maintaining existence in this country to-day lies in the hands of comparatively few. The big operators control the price. The fact that you have a few small operators here and there over the country does not affect the price at all. The production of coal in a large way and the control of the price of coal are in the hands of the great companies, just as the control of the prices of iron is in the hands of the United States Steel Co. I think any concern that can control 40 or 45 per cent at most of a given product can fix the market price of that commodity. I think if the promoters of legislation upon this subject expect by bringing more territory into production to affect the price they are doomed to disappointment. You simply pass more of the oil lands and the coal lands into the hands of the operators, who in turn will either be forced to trail along behind the big companies, who fix the prices, or will by tacit arrangements with them agree upon prices. The price of oil, coal, iron, steel, and copper will continue to be excessive until the Government lays its hands upon the monopolies that control those basic factors in production and destroys them. Committees may be organized to conduct investigations and fill the columns of the newspapers with talk about lowering the cost of living, a few retail dealers may be arrested and punished, but these devious methods will not affect by a sou marquee the burdens imposed upon the people by abnormally high prices of products until the Government brings the great monopolies to the bar of justice.

I will have amendments to present from time to time as we take up the different provisions of the bill, but I want to spend a little time this afternoon on the phase of this question that affects the standing of our Government among the nations of the world.

Mr. KING. Before the Senator leaves the other question may I make one suggestion?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I have been very much interested in the observations made by the Senator and concur in some of the positions which he has taken. I venture to suggest, however, that, generally speaking, I have not discovered that there has been a monopoly in the bituminous coal of our country. I am not sufficiently familiar with anthracite to hazard an opinion, but I have made some investigation in regard to the output of bituminous coal in the United States. I have instituted comparisons between the price of coal at various points in the United States before the war and the price of coal in New Foundland, Canada, Australia, New Zealand, England, and in many other countries of the world. Broadly speaking, I think it may be said that the coal was sold at the mouth of the tunnels or at the mouth of the pits in the bituminous fields of the United States cheaper than in almost any other place in the world. Coal has been sold as low as 80 cents per ton at the mouth of the tunnel, and the corresponding quality of coal at that time in the English Provinces to which I have alluded, and, as I recall, in England, was considerably higher than that—as much as $2 or 8 shillings and sixpence per ton. From 80 cents to $1.10 or $1.125 were prices frequently charged, and perhaps almost universally obtained for a considerable period of time, at the mouth of the pits in the United States.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I inquire of the Senator if he prosecuted his investigation to the point of a comparison of the prices at which the coal reached the consumer in those several countries?

Mr. KING. I did not make as full an investigation as I should have liked, and I would not undertake now, because my memory fails me, to state the relative prices to the ultimate consumer in the countries to which I have referred.

I crave the Senator's pardon—may I allude to the question of copper? Those of us who have come from the West and have frequently taken fliers, as we say in the West, in mining operations, with a view to discovering mines, are of the opinion—at least, I speak for myself, and I think I express the opinion of others—that the price generally obtained by the miner for his copper has not been too high. By that I mean that he has made very little, and in many instances has lost money. Some of the great copper properties that have been fortunately situated, and by the development of metallurgical processes or new mechanical processes, or after great expenditure in the building of railroads, and so on, have been enabled to cheapen the production and have made considerable money; but I venture the assertion that, high as copper is, two-thirds or three-fourths of the copper properties in my State are closed down and can not make money. Many of them are in the hands of men of comparative means, others are in the hands of corporations that have considerable property, but, high as copper is now, there are many of the copper properties of the United States that can not be worked.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think it is true in almost every industry that unfavorable conditions may make it impossible to operate successfully certain properties. I accumulated data with respect to the profits of the great copper companies and their control of that product and their excessive dividends, which the Senate escaped from having presented to it because the bill was quite summarily passed one evening when I expected it to go over until the next day. I shall be interested in resuming my study of that question and bringing it down to date and, on a proper occasion, presenting them here.

Mr. President, I wish now to invite the attention of the Senate to the provisions of the bill, particularly sections 18 and 19, which have to do with the naval reserves, and the "relief" that those who went upon the naval reserves in violation of the President's order are to have extended to them under the bill.

I knew that there had been a long controversy between the Interior Department and the Department of Justice and also the Navy Department, and therefore, when my attention was first directed to the bill, I called up the Department of Justice and the Navy Department to ascertain if they approved of the bill in its present form in so far as it dealt with the naval reserves. I have a letter from Mr. Roosevelt, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, upon that subject. I will have an opportunity to present it to the Senate.

I think that this phase of the question is of such magnitude and is so vital to the position that the Government will occupy as a sea power of the world that we ought to give special attention to those sections. I am going to ask the Senators present to follow me as I take up the subject.

The bill, as drawn, will, I believe, destroy the naval reserves set aside for the Navy. This is done by provisions contained in the second paragraph of section 18, aided by succeeding paragraphs of that section. Out of the lands originally withdrawn on or before September 27, 1909, certain areas were set apart to furnish a future supply of oil for the Navy. The reports of the naval experts of the highest authority, as well as the experience of our own Navy and of the navies of the foreign powers, had established the fact beyond question that naval efficiency and, therefore, national safety were dependent upon the increasing use of oil-burning ships. It is therefore evident that, after a brief moment of time, as the lives of nations are counted, there will not be a sufficient supply of oil in the ground necessary to insure our safety from attack, if the existing deposits are to be thrown open to private exploitation without maintaining any reserves for our future naval use. This was the purpose for which the naval oil reserves were set aside. The needs of the Navy require that the oil should be kept in reserve in the ground until future naval necessities require its extraction and use.

What are the needs of the Navy? Upon this question there is a difference of opinion between the Department of the Interior and the Navy Department. I submit that the statement of the Navy Department must be accepted as our guide in this matter.

The opinion of the Secretary of the Interior as to the efficiency of the naval reserves for supplying the needs of the Navy is expressed in a letter to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Public Lands dated April 18, 1916, and published at page 498 of the hearings before that committee on House bill 406, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session. I quote from page 498 of those hearings:

> The outstanding petroleum reserves in the public-land States contain those lands which the survey believes, from a careful consideration of all factors involved, are valuable for deposits of oil and gas. These areas may be divided into two classes, according as they embrace (1) territory already proved by the drill or territory including geologic formations that elsewhere carry oil or possessing known or inferred geologic structures favorable for the accumulation of oil and gas and (2) unproved territory which because of favorable geologic conditions observed at the surface is prospectively valuable for petroleum deposits. Within the first class fall certain lands in California, Louisiana, Wyoming; within the second class fall the remaining lands in these States and all the reserved lands in other States. It is believed that only gas will be produced from the withdrawn land in North Dakota, while both oil and gas will be produced from reserves in other States.
> Of the lands which may be considered proved, though undrilled, two areas deserve especial mention. These areas are (1) the Elk Hills, of California, included in naval petroleum reserve No. 1, embracing approximately 38,000 acres, and the Teapot Dome, Wyo., included in naval petroleum reserve No. 3, covering 9,481 acres. The Elk Hills, in the west-side fields of California, are structurally favorable for the accumulation of oil and gas, and they were considered as prospective oil lands by the survey when it first examined them. Since that time a few wells have been drilled here and have proved that oil is present in considerable quantity. The amount of oil available has been estimated roughly by comparing the area with other productive areas that have similar geologic features, and is placed at approximately 100,000,000 barrels. In Wyoming the Teapot Dome adjoins the productive Salt Creek dome on the south, and is shown, together with this dome, on one of the accompanying maps. On the basis of production obtained in the Salt Creek dome it is possible to estimate with some confidence the prospective production of the Teapot Dome, and this estimated production is placed at about 30,000,000 barrels.
> An estimate of the possible production from public lands included in outstanding petroleum reserves involves the use of a number of doubtful factors, and the result obtained must therefore not be regarded as in any wise exact, but merely as representing the best approximation that can now be made.

The opinion of the Secretary of the Navy is expressed in a letter to the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, dated February 17, 1916. (Senate Public Lands Committee hearings, supplement, on H. R. 406, 64th Cong., 1st sess., pp. 454–458.) That letter reads as follows:

> NAVY DEPARTMENT,
> Washington, February 17, 1916.
> Hon. B. R. TILLMAN,
> United States Senate, Washington, D. C.
> MY DEAR SENATOR: I desire to bring to your attention House of Representatives bill 406, which passed the House on January 15, 1916, and which is now being considered by the Senate Committee on Public Lands.
> This bill provides for the disposition of deposits of nonmetallic minerals in the public lands of the United States and, if this were its sole purpose, I would not address you on this subject, but as this bill passed the House it contained on page 1, lines 7 to 9, a provision excluding those deposits "in lands withdrawn or reserved for military or naval uses or purposes," and this provision would probably protect the naval petroleum reserves were it not for the provision of section 12, beginning on line 24, page 12, with the words "Provided further," and for the provision of section 30, beginning on line 15, page 24, with the word "Provided."
> I fear that the provision in section 12, pages 12 and 13, will take from the Navy whatever right it possesses to certain lands within the naval petroleum reserves and lease these lands to claimants whose rights thereto are not established by law, but whose sole claim to the land is based on asserted equities arising from the claim that they have, by the expenditure of much labor and money, increased the value of these lands and rendered a public service by discovering oil on the public domain.
> If the amendment submitted by Senator PHELAN on February 3, 1916, is adopted, all the productive land in naval petroleum reserve No. 2 will certainly, and all the proven land in naval petroleum reserve No. 1 will probably, pass into private ownership by patents or leases.
> Prior to September 27, 1909, any citizen of the United States might enter upon public lands and prospect for oil under the placer-mining laws. He might claim 20 acres, or an association of eight individuals might claim 160 acres, and as long as he prosecuted work looking to a discovery of oil his claim was valid against any other subsequent claimant, but he secured no title as against the United States until he had made a discovery of oil or gas.
> The placer-mining laws were a misfit, because they were drawn to cover the exploration, discovery, and production of precious metals which were discovered practically on the surface without the expenditure of much money, whereas to discover oil it was necessary to drill a well which would take many months and probably cost many thousand dollars.
> The inapplicability of the placer-mining laws, the fact that much oil land was being claimed illegally by homesteaders, scrippers, and others, and the fact that the needs of the Navy for fuel oil were realized, caused the President, through the Interior Department (acting on the recommendation of the Geological Survey and the Interior Department), to withdraw from entry, on September 27, 1909, large areas of public land classified as oil land.

This order of withdrawal stated that "all locations or claims existing and valid on this date may proceed to entry in the usual manner after field investigation and examination," but did not specifically mention the needs of the Navy, although the correspondence leading up to the withdrawal and the President's statement clearly show that the need of the Navy for oil was considered. The Director of the Geological Survey, in the hearings on the Pickett Act before the House Committee on the Public Lands in May, 1910, stated: "The question has been raised by the chairman and others as to what was the purpose of withdrawing these lands from disposal under the existing law. The first point which is raised is that of the present and future requirements of the American Navy."

On December 6, 1910, the President, in his annual message, made the following statements:

"In September, 1909, I directed that all public oil lands, whether then withdrawn or not, should be withheld from disposition pending congressional action, for the reason that the existing placer-mining law, although made applicable to deposits of this character, is not suitable to such lands, and for the further reason that it seemed desirable to reserve certain fuel-oil deposits for the use of the American Navy. * * * As not only the largest owner of oil lands, but as a prospective large consumer of oil by reason of the increasing use of fuel oil by the Navy, the Federal Government is directly concerned both in encouraging rational development and at the same time insuring the longest possible life to the oil supply."

When this withdrawal order was issued there were many claimants to oil-bearing public lands in all stages of initiating and perfecting their claims, and many others who were planning to occupy the public domain and prospect for oil under the placer mining laws, and nearly all of the withdrawn land was covered by numerous paper locations of no value. The Government did not at that time have notice of all the claims that were in existence and valid, because the placer mining law did not require the claimant to give such notice to the Federal Government until he applied for a patent, which could not be done until a discovery was made.

There was a difference of opinion among lawyers as to whether the President had a right to make this withdrawal. It is asserted by the claimants that the lawyers consulted by them advised that, in their opinion, the President had not the authority to issue the order, and therefore they continued their work, and others who had not actually started drilling occupied the land and began drilling. Some actually ejected the bona fide claimant and began drilling, while some prudent prospectors, believing the order valid, refrained from carrying out their plans to occupy the land.

On June 25, 1910, a law (the Pickett Act) was enacted authorizing the President to make withdrawals of public lands and reserve them for certain specified purposes "or other public purposes." This act did not specifically mention the needs of the Navy, but it did provide that it should affect in no way any asserted right or claim initiated upon oil land after any withdrawal heretofore made, and that the right of any person who was a bona fide occupant or claimant of any oil or gas bearing land in diligent prosecution of work leading to discovery at the date of any withdrawal heretofore or hereafter made should not be affected or impaired by the withdrawal so long as such occupant or claimant continued in diligent prosecution of such work.

On July 2, 1910, the President, by Executive order, under the authority of this act (36 Stat., 847), rewithdrew the lands withdrawn on September 27, 1909.

The Navy Department repeatedly requested the cooperation of the Interior Department in the effort to secure a definite reservation by Executive order of oil-bearing public lands in California, but the Interior Department replied that, "pending other and adverse action by the Executive or legislation by Congress, the existing withdrawals are as effective in preventing the initiation of private claims as any more specific reservation."

Finally, in 1912, the Interior Department did cooperate with the Navy Department, and two naval petroleum reserves were created, by Excutive order, from a portion of the original withdrawal, No. 1 on September 2, 1912, and No. 2 on December 13, 1912.

There are now on the withdrawn oil lands in California, including the naval petroleum reserves, many claimants that may be generally divided into the following classes:

1. The man who went upon the lands prior to September 27, 1909, fully complied with the law, and was in diligent prosecution of work leading to discovery at that date, but who at some time since that date has failed to diligently prosecute work leading to discovery, although he may now have producing wells.

2. The man who went upon the lands prior to September 27, 1909, fully complied with the law, but had not been, and was not at that date, in diligent prosecution of work leading to discovery, but after that date started drilling for oil and effected a discovery either as a result of continuous or intermittent prosecution of work.

3. The man who went upon the land subsequent to September 27, 1909, but prior to July 2, 1910, and complied with the placer-mining laws, and has effected discovery as a result of continuous or intermittent prosecution of work or is still drilling.

In addition to those three classes there are claimants who come under all the above classes except that they or their predecessors in interest did not comply with the placer mining law in that the original location was made by the use of dummies.

The claimants under class 1 who were at work upon the land at the date of the withdrawal and have complied with the law except as to continuous prosecution of work may deserve some consideration, but the men who started work after the withdrawal or went upon the land in defiance of the withdrawal do not deserve any consideration.

But if the Phelan amendment is adopted and the bill enacted the claimants under classes 1 and 2 will secure a patent and those in class 3 will receive a lease to the land claimed.

When this bill, known then as H. R. 16136, was being considered by the last Congress, those same claimants were asking for relief by congressional action and they claimed that their case was strengthened by the fact that the lower courts had decided that the presidential order of withdrawal of September 27, 1909, was "invalid and without effect," but on February 23, 1915, the Supreme Court handed down a decision reversing the decision of the district court.

Last year Congress appropriated $50,000 "to enable the Attorney General to represent and protect the interests of the United States in matters and suits affecting withdrawn oil lands," and many suits affecting these lands are now in progress. If this bill (H. R. 406) is enacted, the defendants in these suits will secure by legislation the lands in suit and it is believed by the Navy Department that Congress, in its efforts to preserve the real equities of claimants who have been unable to secure patents due to some technicality of the law, will have rewarded men who have little or no equities and who have violated a valid order of the President and, by careless operations, done immense damage to the oil-bearing strata; furthermore, practically all of naval petroleum reserve No. 2 will pass into private ownership or be leased to claimants, and the Navy will lose this valuable reserve of oil.

The following table shows the status of the withdrawn oil land and the naval petroleum reserves in California, the reserves being only a part of all the withdrawn lands and the unpatented land being the only land subject to the provisions of House bill 406.

	California.	Naval petroleum reserves.
Total acreage withdrawn	1,507,878	68,242
Patented to railroads	308,075	26,153
Patented on mineral application	38,668	1,601
Patented on agricultural application	708,441	3,252
Total patented	1,055,184	31,006
Total unpatented	452,694	37,236
Unpatented within proven fields	[1] 37,452	7,476
Unpatented outside proven fields	415,242	29,760

The unpatented proven land is subject to disposition under the provisions of section 12 of this bill, and of this land there are 37,452 acres in California, only 7,476 of which is in naval petroleum reserve No. 2, so that if the naval petroleum reserves were excluded from the operations of all the provisions of this act there would remain 29,976 acres in California alone that might be disposed of under the provisions of section 12, and 385,482 acres of withdrawn oil land in California outside of these reserves which might be disposed of under the general provisions of the act.

The plea has been made that the provisions of section 12, page 13, are for the relief of the small operators who have spent millions of dollars upon this land and will be ruined if some relief is not granted, yet these operators have produced from the unpatented land in the naval petroleum reserves 19,646,000 barrels of oil and over 12,000,000,000 cubic feet of gas, and now have 85 producing oil wells and 17 producing gas wells. No statement is available as to the production from the unpatented lands in California outside of the naval petroleum reserves, but attached hereto are certain statements from reliable sources regarding the equities of the claimants.

The following are the companies operating in the naval petroleum reserves who will be benefited by this act:

	Capital stock.
Associated Oil Co	$40,000,000
Boston Pacific Oil Co	1,000,000
California Amalgamated Oil Co	5,000,000
Caribou Oil Co	1,000,000
General Petroleum Co	50,000,000
Honolulu Consolidated Oil Co	5,000,000
North American Consolidated Oil Co	5,000,000
Northern Exploration Co	----------
Record Oil Co	----------
St. Helens Oil Co. (pounds sterling)	597,192
Standard Oil Co	100,000,000
Union Oil Co	50,000,000
United Oil Co	2,800,000

Of this number, only one, the Boston Pacific, is a member of the Independent Oil Producers' Agency, which is supposed to be an association of small companies, and one is an English company, whose capital stock is quoted in pounds sterling.

The Navy Department is vitally interested in protecting these reserves, because they were relied upon when the policy of building oil-burning ships was adopted, and now that we have a large and increasing number of ships that depend solely upon oil for fuel, it is of the utmost importance that the rights and the needs of the Navy be not overlooked in the effort to relieve claimants to oil lands.

It is probable that the cost of fuel oil will steadily increase, for that is the opinion of many men who are intimately acquainted with the petroleum industry in the United States, and that is the opinion of the Department of the Interior, as expressed in the following excerpt of a letter from that department:

"No relief can be expected in the price of fuel oil at Atlantic ports for commercial uses. These prices will probably tend upward hereafter, although, of course, there may be brief periods during which lower prices will rule, as a result of the development of new fields. For example, those of eastern Mexico. Relief to the Navy from increasing commercial prices can probably be secured only by the development of its own reserves, where it should be possible to produce oils at approximately the present cost of production—50 cents or less per barrel, plus transportation to the point of use."

In addition to the certainty of high prices there is the graver danger of an uncertain supply if the Navy is forced to depend entirely upon a commercial supply of fuel oil. This condition was approached in 1913 when the Texas company, the only company making a satisfactory bid on the Navy's fuel-oil requirements for the year 1914, declined to guarantee more than 500,000 barrels.

The consumption of fuel oil by the Navy has been as follows:

Year.	Barrels.
1911	137,587
1912	336,826
1913	361,783
1914	488,539
1915	521,382
1916 (estimated)	600,000

This amount has been used when not one oil-burning battleship was in commission, yet during the present year three oil-burning battleships will be commissioned and six others will be building, in addition to any increase that may be provided for by this Congress.

Every battleship added to the fleet will increase the yearly peace consumption by about 90,000 barrels, and every destroyer will increase the peace consumption by about 20,000 barrels, so that when the 9 battleships and 17 destroyers now authorized are added to the fleet, the annual peace consumption of fuel will be about 1,750,000 barrels, without counting the oil used by the 37 submarines and 6 auxiliaries authorized.

It is estimated that the consumption in the event of war would be three times this amount, or 5,250,000 barrels.

In order to fully profit by the use of oil for fuel, ships are so constructed that the space which would be utilized for coal in coal burners is used for other purposes, so that when a ship is once built to use oil she can not be converted to use coal, without practically rebuilding her, which would result in a reduction in the speed and the distance she could steam on her full supply of fuel.

The Navy Department does not desire to produce oil from the naval petroleum reserves at the present time and does not want the oil converted into money at any time, but does want the oil conserved underground where it may be stored without cost and free from loss by fire or evaporation until the decreased production and increased market price render its production and use desirable. This was the purpose in creating this reserve and it is still the desire of the department to utilize these deposits as a reserve to be depended upon when an adequate supply of fuel oil is not available at a reasonable cost.

In my hearings before the Senate Committee on Public Lands I requested that the naval petroleum reserves be excepted from the operations of all of the provisions of this bill, and to effect this suggested the following amendments:

1. Page 13, line 20, after the word "Interior," insert "Provided further, That the lands and the deposits of oil or gas within the naval petroleum reserves shall be excepted from the operation of all of the provisions of this act."

2. Page 24, lines 7 to 11, strike out all after "direct," line 7.

The Navy Department desires that the naval petroleum reserves be excepted from the provisions of this act because—

1. No part of the program of preparedness is of more importance than the providing of an adequate reserve supply of fuel oil for the Navy.

2. A naval vessel built to burn oil can not be converted to a coal burner without practically rebuilding her.

3. The Navy relied upon this reserve of oil when the policy of oil-burning battleships was adopted.

4. If the Navy is forced to depend entirely upon a commercial supply of oil, the fuel cost of the fleet is certain to be very great, and it is possible that in time of great danger the efficiency of the Navy may be impaired by an inadequate supply of fuel oil.

5. The suits now in progress and contemplated will decide the equities of the claimants and it would appear that where the Navy's interests are concerned it would be better for Congress to base the relief granted upon the result of a judicial investigation of the claimants.

While the pending legislation is not before the Naval Affairs Committee, I deem it my duty to acquaint the Naval Affairs Committee with the consequences to the naval petroleum reserves if it should be enacted into law. This is made the more necessary because the last Congress embodied in the naval appropriation act a provision making an appropriation for "the custody and care of naval petroleum reserves." In accordance with that direction, the Secretary of the Navy has acted in cooperation with the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Interior, and suits are pending which, if won by the Government, will insure a large reserve of fuel oil for the ships that are being constructed and which will be authorized. The passage of the bill and the amendment now before the Public Lands Committee would deprive the Navy of a supply of oil upon which it had depended when the plan of constructing oil-burning ships was adopted.

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

Mr. President, I am going into the history of this matter because I think the sections of this bill to which I have referred, known as the relief sections, ought not to be in the bill at all. I do not believe that the great interests that are afforded relief are entitled to so much special consideration at the hands of this Government. I do not see how the Senate is to pass upon the question of bestowing favors upon these trespassers without having a pretty definite and clear recollection of the facts which led up to the controversy which now is summed up in sections 18 and 19 of this bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. KING. As I understand the Senator, he would, of course, recognize, confirm, and legalize any entries that were made upon the public domain, subsequently withdrawn, before the President's proclamation of withdrawal, if the locators complied with the terms of the statute; but, as I understand the Senator, he would not give those who made locations upon lands after the Executive proclamation of withdrawal any preferential right, nor recognize, indeed, any rights which they may assert to the claims.

I wish to invite the Senator's attention to this proposition to see whether or not it has sufficient moral strength to modify the views expressed by the Senator. When President Taft issued his proclamation, he said, either then or subsequently, that he doubted whether or not it was constitutional. Many of the leading lawyers of the United States strongly contended that there was no authority in the executive department to withdraw public lands from entry. I know that the leading lawyers not only of the West but of the East took the view that the power to dispose of the public lands rested in Congress and not in the President, and that it was a quasi disposition at least of the public lands when the Executive attempted to withdraw them from entry, though the laws of the United States opened them to entry; and, therefore, there was a practical unanimity of opinion that the Executive proclamation was a nullity.

In know of individuals—I do not know that there were in California—who went upon lands which were withdrawn, acting upon advice of lawyers of recognized standing and ability, and sincerely believing that the Executive proclamation was a nullity. They expended their money in good faith, discovered oil or other minerals, and made the properties of some value. In view of that fact, assuming what I have stated to be the fact, does not the Senator think that some provision ought to be made giving them some special preferential right?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, if one were to assume the statement of the Senator to be in accordance with the facts, there might be predicated upon it possibly such a position as the Senator indicates. I do not understand those to be the facts at all in this matter, and I believe——

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator have reference to President Taft's statement?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, I do not care anything about his statement. Taft's opinion upon constitutional matters does not appeal to me and would not have any weight with me and ought not to have any weight with anybody else. I know that under the Roosevelt administration in 1907—not later than 1908, at any rate—Attorney General Moody, as I remember, who afterwards went on the Supreme Bench, advised President Roosevelt that such an order could be issued and would be valid.

I brought the matter, I think, to the attention of President Roosevelt, as I remember now, in 1907 and suggested the issuing of such an order with regard to coal lands particularly. He referred the matter to the Attorney General, and within two or three weeks after that—I think I referred to this once before on the floor of the Senate—I picked up a morning paper on one of the western trains and found that the President had withdrawn a considerable acreage of coal lands in one of the Western States. It was followed by many other withdrawals within the next few months, and I never had any doubt as to the validity of that action. I know that there was precedent for it, which I called to President Roosevelt's attention when I took up the matter with him in 1907, and the decision of the Supreme Court following in the suits that were brought did not surprise me at all. I did not expect any other decision.

I do not want to take time unnecessarily here, but I do want to impress upon the Senate and at least put upon the record here the vital importance of an adequate oil supply to the standing of this Government as a sea power and to the position that our Navy must take among the navies of the world. We are dealing in certain sections of this bill with reservations which have been made, upon the opinion of those who have thoroughly investigated this subject, of the only areas that remain, so far as is known, to supply our Navy. They have estimated that at the present rate of consumption the oil supply can last but a comparatively short time. We surely ought to protect to the very last technical limit the legal rights of this Government to the possession and continued control of these naval reserves. This question involves the source of our power among the great nations of the world, and as trustees of this great interest of our Government we should not be velvet-handed with the great oil companies that went on these reserves in defiance of Executive order, upon the mere assurance of lawyers that they could fight it through and win. They were badly advised, I do not care who the lawyers were. They were trespassers. They knew it. They were taking their chances. They knew that. If they had been small stealers, nobody would have apologized for them or offered any legislation to "relieve" them. It would seem that all that is necessary is that an organization or a group of corporations shall steal extensively enough from the United States that a great power can be brought to bear to obtain for them immunity.

Mr. President, I have here a report, prepared in connection with legislation upon this subject by my deceased colleague, Senator Husting, who was a member of the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate, and who spent much time in investigating this matter. Shortly before a bill was reported which dealt with this question—not in exactly the same way; I do not contend that—he prepared the report which I hold in my hand here. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to put it all into the RECORD, but I am going to quote from it pretty liberally.

This report was prepared, ready for presentation to the Senate, just a few days before Senator Husting left the city of Washington at the close of the session, and probably not more than a week or 10 days before his death this report was finished, and I know that it was in the hands of members of the Cabinet, and I am informed that it was presented to the President. I am advised that it made a very strong impression upon him, and that for the time being, at least, as to the particular matter upon which I wish to quote it, it was controlling with the President, because he had such confidence in the investigative work and the judgment and the opinion of Senator Husting.

Senator Husting says, with reference to the naval reserves, or the provisions of the bill that he was considering which dealt especially with naval reserves, the following, which is pertinent to the consideration of the bill before us, as I shall show:

> The matter of greatest consequence involved in this bill is the sacrifice of naval petroleum reserve No. 2 in California, proposed by section 16.
> It should be remembered that these lands were withdrawn from private appropriation by order of the President, dated September 27, 1909, upon recommendation of the Geological Survey, which was moved thereto by the necessity of securing oil supplies for the Navy. * * *
> Further and more detailed information as to the needs of the Navy and the oil contents of the withdrawn lands resulted in the setting aside out of this large area, of three small areas for the specific use of the Navy. * * * Nos. 1 and 2 are in California, and No. 3 in Wyoming. No. 2 is the only one of proved, substantial, and present value for a naval oil supply. * * *
> Lieut. Commander Landis stated to the committee: "This reserve (No. 2) is the only one on which the Navy must depend for its oil reserve." (Hearings on H. R. 406, 64th Cong., 1st sess., p. 227.) On the same occasion, he further said:
> "This land constitutes an ideal naval reserve and is the only one known oil field in the United States to-day that does. It is sufficiently far from the coast to be free from the danger of attack. It is a proven field and that is essential, for in time of emergency the Navy would not have time to develop the field and find out whether it had a field or not. Wells can be quickly drilled and in six weeks it is possible to get a well down to the oil sand."

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the Senator know that the Government has lost a very considerable portion of reserve No. 2?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator refers to some of the decisions, I presume?

Mr. THOMAS. My information is that many of the locations to which former Senator Husting probably referred have been sustained by the courts, and that as to the disputed titles and a part of the remainder being within the Southern Pacific land grant it has also been decided adverse to the Government. I speak of this because there was a time when earnest proposals were made to the Government, but turned down by the Navy Department, whereby exchanges of these lands could have been effected and the right of the Government in the reserve thus secured; but they were disdained largely because the applicants were assumed to have been fraudulent locators and their locations invalid. As a consequence the reserve has been very greatly depleted by this disposition of the title asserted by the Government. That is my information.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I believe it is the fact, is it not, that the decision of the Supreme Court which validated the withdrawal order of the Executive was a reversal of the lower court on that subject, and the decisions to which the Senator from Colorado alludes are not the decisions of the Supreme Court, as I understand it?

Mr. THOMAS. No; I think not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. They will meet a like fate when they reach the Supreme Court.

Mr. THOMAS. That is possible, and it is equally possible that they will be sustained.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Granting all that the Senator suggests as being disastrous to the Government in this matter, it simply makes more and more for our holding onto everything that we have a technical right to hold onto in naval reserve No. 2, according to my view of it.

Mr. THOMAS. I interrupted the Senator because I assumed that he was reading this report chiefly in connection with his amendment to strike out section 18, thus denying to certain locators or alleged locators any power under this bill to secure leases. If the Government desires, of course, it could withhold all the lands which have not been properly located under the laws and subject to the reservations, but if the Government proposes to pursue the same course which it unfortunately followed in regard to naval reserve No. 2, I am afraid that instead of conserving oil it will at the end of the controversy find itself less protected by its oil reserves than it is at present.

I do not know much about the character of these oil reserves beyond the testimony that was offered before the Committee on Public Lands when I was a member of it. I do recall that the estimate of the probable contents of that reserve was somewhere about 30,000,000 or 40,000,000 barrels. It turns out according to later reports and due to more recent developments that the amount will exceed 100,000,000 barrels.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator is now referring to reserve No. 1 and not No. 2?

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Wisconsin was reading of reserve No. 2, and hence my interruption. I do not question the power of the Government to reserve all these lands it pleases, but I differ from the Senator as to the expediency of that policy. My own judgment is that we will have very much more oil as these lands are opened for development and discovery. Such has been the history of the oil industry. Since the lamented Senator's report was made, the Senator knows that bodies of oil have been discovered in other parts of the country, and most notably in northwestern Texas. My own belief is that other bodies of oil will be discovered, notwithstanding the learned theses and opinions of the Geological Survey, because generally speaking the old Cornwall miner's remark about gold is true of other mineral deposits. He said gold is where you find it; I think oil is where you find it; and we shall in the future find it in larger quantities, provided the enterprise of individuals, backed as it always is by the desire of gain, is given fair opportunity on the public domain as in the past it has been in the field of metalliferous mines.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am trying to get before the Senate from various sources everything that I can that would impress the thought upon the Senate, as I believe it ought to be impressed and emphasized, that the Government should protect itself and insure to itself future ample reserves of oil for its Navy. That is the point I am making just at this moment. I am aware of the fact that new oil fields have been discovered. We hear of that from time to time, but we know, too, that the consumption of oil is rapidly increasing. I was startled to pick up a paper from home the other day and note in a table printed on the front page the number of automobiles that were registered for use in the State of Wisconsin—1 automobile for every 11, as I remember the figures, of our total population—and in the State of Nebraska, as I happen to recall the figures for that State, though a number of States were given, the number of automobiles was increasing so rapidly that they have an automobile for every seven people in the State of Nebraska.

Mr. THOMAS. Notwithstanding the high cost of living, people seem to have plenty of money to invest in automobiles.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; and it is true that the automobile is rapidly becoming not a luxury but a necessity and an adjunct to every sort of business.

The consumption of oil is rapidly increasing. All through the Middle West and the far West, as the Senators from that section know better than I do, the great draft horses that were employed to plow and move the big, heavy machinery and to do the heavy work upon the farm are displaced by tractors, which can be operated day and night.

There are sections of the country that, according to geological opinion, offer no promise or hope of containing oil, and there must be a limit to the supply.

Mr. THOMAS. I think there is.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Does it not behoove us now to mark out here an area, in so far as we can judge, that will protect the Government in its oil supply for oil burners, for they are to take the place of coal burners in all the improved and advanced navies of the world? We know, if we can believe what we see from day to day in the news dispatches and what we gathered from such information as leaked out from the conference at Versailles, that Great Britain is particularly active in reaching out here and there over the world to secure a large supply of oil for her navy.

Mr. THOMAS. I certainly believe in conserving certain areas for naval reserves, but I do not believe in taking them at the expense of good citizens who have acquired rights under the law to certain parts of them. With reference to the continuing increase of the demand and the consequent increase in consumption I am confident that Yankee genius will sooner or later supply any threatened deficiency by the discovery or the synthetic constitution of some other fuel which may and in all probability will supplant the present use of oil.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator would not consider it prudent, however, for the Government to rest for its motive power in naval operations upon the possibilities of such a discovery?

Mr. THOMAS. Not at all. I have never objected to reserves. My criticism of the reserves has been the ruthless manner in which they have been made, with a sheer disregard of rights that have been acquired, not by great corporations but by citizens of the United States, a policy which the courts have not always approved. I would cheerfully cooperate with the Senator in carving out such reserves as men whose judgment is entitled to respect will designate, and to which the titles can be properly safeguarded, as is the case always when individual rights are invaded for governmental purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it is only fair to say in this connection that section 18 of the bill only applies to oil-producing land and nothing else.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand that. I will deal with that in the course of my discussion.

Mr. SMOOT. I merely wish to call the attention of the Senator at this point to a statement sent to me this morning by

Mr. J. A. Stephens, oil examiner of the United States Shipping Board, Emergency Fleet Corporation. It contains a statement that really I never heard before. It is this:

Not a single oil structure or oil well has been developed on information furnished by the United States Geological Survey.

I was surprised when I received that letter from Mr. Stephens.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will discuss that subject further before the bill is finally disposed of.

Thursday, August 28, (legislative day of Saturday, August 23), 1919.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am quite aware that the Senator's interest in this legislation has assured his attendance most of the time during which the bill has been before the Senate. I think I have also been reasonably attentive to the proceedings of the Senate while this bill has been pending and have absented myself from it not for a single moment except to do work upon the measure itself.

I am not a member of the committee. I saw this bill for the first time when it was presented here. It was not presented as bills of such importance usually are, with a printed report informing Senators of the changes it proposes to make in existing law, and stating the reasons why the various provisions of the bill should be enacted. During its consideration before the committee, as we have heard stated here upon the floor, the bill was not proceeded with in the usual way great measures are in Congress, by giving notice to the public and to interested parties to be present and to be heard upon the measure.

No hearings were had upon it, because, as we have been informed during the discussion, the subject has been before Congress for a good many years; but, Mr. President, this is the first time that a bill has been reported from any committee, so far as I know, which was purely a leasing bill. This bill is not a second cousin to the bill that was reported by the conference committee and attempted to be passed in the closing hours of the last session. That was a bill which would have conferred title by patent to every foot of the public domain covering coal and oil, taking it ultimately out of the control of the Government and depriving the people through their Government of any possible exercise of authority over the products taken out of those lands. This bill is radically different upon its face. It is a leasing bill, and one would think naturally that that raised some question, being a new form of legislation never before reported, according to my recollection, by a committee of either branch of Congress.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to be corrected if I am in error.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator is, of course, familiar with the provisions of the other bill and of this bill. He knows, therefore, that the leasing provisions of the previous bill are largely duplicated in the provisions of this bill, based upon hearings that were almost interminable in their character, running over a very great portion of the Sixty-fourth and Sixty-fifth Congresses. Of course, the provision of the previous bill permitting patent has been eliminated, I regret to say, from the provisions of this bill; but so far as its leasing features are concerned they are much more than first cousins to the same provisions of the other bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, just in the proportion in which they are more nearly related to the other bill it is more objectionable, for there was never before the Senate a bill that was justly subject to severer condemnation than the bill that was attempted to be passed in the closing hours of the life of the Sixty-fifth Congress.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, it may be that in proportion as it resembles the other bill it is subject to greater criticism, but certainly the hearings upon which the bill was founded have been as exhaustive as the hearings on any bill that has been introduced since I have been a member of this body. Of course the Senator and I radically differ with regard to the policy of the Government.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. We do, indeed.

Mr. THOMAS. The necessity, however, for further hearings seems to me to be on the face of things nonexistent, because if there is any viewpoint which can be presented for the consideration of the committee about which they have not already been given enormous and copious information I am at a loss to know what it is.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the leasing features of this bill are not the same as the leasing features of the bill which was presented in the conference report.

Mr. THOMAS. Not identical; no.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Furthermore, a very vital feature of this bill that certain Members of this body from the West have persistently shut their eyes and their minds to is the rights of the Government in the naval reserves. This bill is not identical with the bill that was before the Senate in the conference report in that particular. For that reason it seems to me the Navy Department and the Department of Justice might well have been heard by the committee upon those provisions of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. My understanding of this bill is that the naval reserves are exempted from its operations. If that is not so, no one will be more greatly surprised than myself. The other bill also exempted the naval reserves from its operations by clauses that were inserted at the request of the then chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. SWANSON], and which were prepared in the interest of the Navy Department. Now, if it be true that this bill is so drawn that it affects the naval reserves, then, of course, under the understanding that existed with regard to the old bill, they should be eliminated from this one. The Senator having charge of the bill is not at this moment present, but the colleague of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is upon the floor and is very familiar with the subject and will correct me if I am mistaken.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will correct the Senator. With the Senator's permission——

Mr. THOMAS. My permission has nothing to do with it; the Senator has the floor. I referred to his colleague because he is very familiar with the subject.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator is replying to my observation which instituted a comparison between the conference-report measure, which was attempted to be passed in the closing hours of last session, and the pending bill.

Mr. THOMAS. So far as its leasing features are concerned.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. So far as it affects naval reserves.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; and that also.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And the Senator, as I understand him, thinks that the bills are practically alike in that respect.

Mr. THOMAS. In the sense that neither of them affected the naval reserves.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And that therefore there was no reason for giving the Navy Department or the Department of Justice, which has charge of numerous cases it has brought against trespassers upon those reserves, an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. That is substantially my position. The Department of Justice and the Department of the Navy have been heard upon this question ad nauseam. They have been given every consideration, and the naval features of the bill have been eliminated as they appeared in the original draft because those departments insisted upon it, one of them going so far as to authorize the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, or the acting chairman at that time, to say that if the amendments which he then offered were accepted they would be satisfactory to that department; but instead of being satisfactory the department became more perniciously active than ever, and had much to do with the defeat of that bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, from the statement of the Senator from Colorado itself it becomes perfectly apparent that the Navy Department is not in accord with this proposed legislation. My statement was that the bill which we were considering in the closing days of the last session did not have the approval of the Navy Department; that it was opposed to it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I beg the Senator's pardon; permit me. And, Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Colorado to say—and I think the RECORD will show that he did say—that the department was satisfied with the provisions of the conference bill as it affected naval reserves, and therefore there was no occasion to give them a hearing on this bill, because this bill in its provisions as it relates to that subject is substantially in accord with the bill which may be described as the conference report.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No, no; just one at a time. I am stating not what the fact is but what the Senator from Colorado stated.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just permit me. I am prepared to show that the Navy Department was not satisfied with the bill as it was presented in the conference report. I hold in my hand, and I took it out of my papers because of the statement of the Senator from Colorado, a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, showing plainly he did not approve of that bill. I do not say that the present bill is identical in all of its terms, in section 18, with the provisions which affected naval reserves in the conference report of last session, but I do say that it goes a long way in that direction, and it goes away beyond what would meet with the approval of those who are safeguarding the supplies of oil for the Navy of the United States for the future.

Mr. President, I now read the letter of Secretary Daniels.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to read the letter in this connection, if the Senator will pardon me for a moment.

I want to show in connection with the statements that have been made in this colloquy that the Navy Department disapproved emphatically the conference report, which would have passed the Senate excepting for a filibuster that drew upon the Senator who conducted it, the Senator who has the floor now, the criticism of many of the Senators upon this floor, not only then but subsequently, when the temper that is elicited by clashes in debate had an opportunity to cool; not only that, but denunciation that was nation wide, Mr. President. That bill, with features that no man can defend, would have passed the Senate excepting for a filibuster conducted to a large extent by me. I had to take the criticism and the punishment of conducting that filibuster. I say that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the record and history of this legislation will forever justify the course that I pursued at that time. Otherwise you would have had legislation which no committee now dares report favorably. You would have had it enacted into law.

Mr. President, I do not say that section 18 of this bill agrees in toto with the provisions of that bill that affected naval reserves, but I do say, and I think I shall be able to show before the debate concludes, that it is an encroachment upon the only reserves that are left which will safeguard the power of the American Navy in fuel oil for all time to come.

Mr. President, it was stated on this floor in the debate in the closing hours of the last session that the Navy Department and the Department of Justice were satisfied with the bill embodied in the conference report, and that statement was repeated here many times by those who were in charge of that conference report, not only here but like statements were made on the floor of the House of Representatives to advance to successful consideration the conference report in that body. Those statements were repeated so many times that finally they drew from the Department of Justice and the Navy Department denials from the heads of those departments that they approved any such legislation.

Attorney General Gregory said what I am about to read in a telegram which he sent, during the consideration of the conference report late in February of this year, to Mr. Gifford Pinchot. He, I presume, had seen the repeated statements in the reports of congressional debates that the Department of Justice was satisfied with the bill embodied in the conference report, that the Government was properly safeguarded in the oil reserves, and that there was nothing to complain of on the part of the Department of Justice or the Navy Department.

I now read what Attorney General Gregory thought about it, and to give to such Senators as would consider his views of the legislation then in the pending conference report, many features of which are repeated essentially in sections 18 and 19 of this bill:

Mr. GIFFORD PINCHOT,
1218 Real Estate Trust Building, Philadelphia, Pa.:

In reply to your Western Union wire of the 26th of February, 1919, no one can truthfully say that I have favored the conference report on the so-called coal and oil leasing bill. Members of both Houses of Congress are aware of the fact that I have declined to advocate its passage.

THOMAS W. GREGORY.

The controversy raised by the statement upon the floor of the Senate and the statement upon the floor of the House while that conference report was pending, that it was satisfactory to the Department of Justice and satisfactory to the Navy Department, elicited not only that statement from the Department of Justice but elicited a statement from Secretary Daniels, which I will also read:

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, February 27, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I understand that a statement has been made by some Member of Congress that the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Navy favor the land legislation reported by the conference committee on public lands of the two Houses. You know my position all the time has been that while not opposing the leasing bill, which I favor, I have opposed incorporating any provision with reference to the naval reserves in such legislation. I do not favor the bill that has been agreed upon; I do not think it is just to the Government; and while it is better, so far as the naval reserves are concerned, than the original bill, my attitude is that the naval reserves ought not to be touched by legislation, but ought to be settled by the courts.

I did agree with the Attorney General and the Secretary of the Interior upon a provision some time ago that would protect the naval reserves and would confer upon the President power to operate the going wells. I did this because I did not wish to assume to be standing in the way of the passage of legislation of importance which I favored, and I write you because I hope you will correct the impression that I have changed in my attitude. I believe that the naval interests require that whatever in the naval reserves belongs to the Navy by law should go to the Navy, though the final matter should be settled by the courts, unless the provision referred to, which the Attorney General and myself agreed to some time ago, is incorporated. I think it would be a great mistake to go further than that. I will be glad if you will make my position known.

Sincerely, yours, JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

Hon. CLAUDE SWANSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. President, I digress to speak of the record made by Secretary Daniels, because it is one of the important considerations in connection with the recommendations of a Cabinet officer, one that Senators, I think, ought to weigh with some care. The Secretary of the Navy, in so far as I have been able to study his career, has devoted himself fearlessly to the public interest.

Mr. President, let it be said to the credit of this man that he has driven straight ahead regardless of the storm of criticism, for when early in his official career he made recommendations to protect the Navy against pillage the interest-controlled press of the country assailed him. Have you forgotten it? Have you forgotten the organized abuse that was levelled against that man? Few men in public life have ever endured the brutal assaults that he suffered at the hands of the great newspapers of the country published in the interest of private greed and at the hands of leading magazines of the country that were equally subservient. Secretary Daniels was under fire. Review the literature of that time, and it will be difficult for you to find nationally anything like it. Yet there was not anything in that man's record to justify it.

I do not hold any brief for Josephus Daniels. I have met him only a few times, but I have followed his public career as an official. He came out of private life; he did not have much training that would have fitted him for this position, and he was charged with the conduct of the Navy Department under the greatest strain and ordeal that it was ever subjected to. Is it not fair to say that?

I undertake to say that when your Democratic administration comes to pass in review in history Secretary Daniels will stand out for ability and integrity.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. During the period of the Secretary's career to which the Senator is referring I think I was the only man in this body who took up the cudgels for him and defended him upon this floor in a speech, perhaps too long for the comfort of the Senate, but one which reviewed as well as I could Mr. Daniels's services to the country and the motives which were behind the cruel attacks upon him both as a man and as an official.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator interrupted me to make that statement; and perhaps it makes it rather incumbent upon me to explain why I am so late in speaking about the good record of Secretary Daniels.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, Mr. President, I meant no reflection in making that statement. I did not mean in the slightest degree to charge the Senator with being somewhat tardy in his appreciation—not by any means.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No, no; I did not so understand it.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wanted to call attention to the fact that at that time I was defending him because I had made some criticisms of the Secretary of other matters. It was entirely in explanation of my own attitude and not that of the Senator having the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I knew perfectly well that my friend from Colorado did not intend to reflect upon me.

Mr. THOMAS. Not in the slightest.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But I thought perhaps anybody reading the RECORD might wonder that it was 1919. But, Mr. President, I have dwelt a little bit upon Secretary Daniels, because, in this connection, I do hope that Senators here will give due weight to his recommendations; that they will give to them that weight which, I think, ought to be given to his recommendations in view of the record that he has made in the public interest; and I repeat this phrase from his letter, because I see a Senator or two in the Chamber who were not here when I read it before:

My attitude is that the naval reserves ought not to be touched by legislation, but ought to be settled by the courts.

So, Mr. President, I come back to put into the possession of the Senate and place upon the RECORD some of the views of my deceased colleague, the late Senator Husting. I had read briefly from a report which he prepared to submit to the Senate at the close of the session of 1917, the extra session, all of which had been put into typewriting and left ready to be presented at the opening of the regular session in December. It will be remembered that we adjourned in October, and this document which I hold in my hand was prepared just before he left the city of Washington for the brief vacation between October and December. He went to his home, and it was his tragic misfortune to lose his life by accident only a few days after this document was prepared.

I ought to say, I think, that Senator Husting had always taken an exceptional interest in legislation of this character. It was a field in which he especially excelled. It was a subject upon which he had spent a great deal of time, and so I feel a sort of responsibility to let his opinion be known to Senators here who were acquainted with him, but who might not be aware of the fact that he had given practically all of his public life to the question of the preservation of the national resources for the public.

In Wisconsin, as a member of the State senate, he earned a State-wide reputation because of his devotion to the conservation of our State's water powers, especially; and during the time that he was a senator in that State's service, and while the committee of which he was a member was working upon the legislation under the instruction of the legislature, that committee, with Senator Husting at its head, came to Washington to advise with experts here upon that subject of legislation. I mention it to show the ardor and the interest and the faithfulness with which he prosecuted any investigation of any subject of legislation, and especially when it pertained to saving these great elemental and fundamental and natural resources for the public.

I quote further from this report:

We have entered upon the policy of substituting oil-burning for coal-burning ships—

Inevitably there will be some little repetition in what I have tried to put before the Senate, because the views of Senator Husting are so much in accord with the views of Secretary Daniels and of other advocates of that policy; so I do it for emphasis, and to give to the subject that importance which I think it merits—

We have entered upon the policy of substituting oil-burning for coal-burning ships, believing it to be essential for the national safety. Other great naval powers have adopted the same policy. It is probable that it will take about 15 years to work out this policy fully, at which time the Navy's need for oil will reach its maximum. But if we abandon the reserve policy we have only 15 years' supply in sight. The most recent estimates put the total oil reserves of the United States in known fields at 7,629,000,000 barrels, and forecast an increase in consumption of 5 per cent per year. At this rate our total oil resources would be exhausted in 16 years but for importations from abroad.

Of course the situation, since that was written, has undergone modifications. New fields have been discovered, but likewise new uses for oil are devised almost daily, and the demands of consumption keep close step with the increasing supply.

What could be more absurd than to be building oil-burning ships for 15 years with one hand, while with the other we are using up our oil deposits so that at the end of that time there will be no oil for the ships to burn but for importations from foreign countries? Yet that is the precise effect of section 16. Either that section should not be enacted or we should stop building ships to burn oil and go back to the inferior coal-burning type, for a coal-burning ship with full bunkers is better than an oil-burning ship with empty tanks.

That reasoning, while it was applied to section 16 of the bill that was then about to be reported from the Senate committee, applies to any provision in any bill that makes any encroachment upon the naval reserves.

How much oil does the Navy need?

A memorandum prepared in the Navy Department and printed in the hearings of the committee on Senate bill 45, this section stated, at page 229 of the hearings:

"Due to the war, the increase in the number of oil-burning destroyers and the acceleration of the building program, previously made, estimates of the Navy's oil needs must be revised. It is now estimated that the fuel and oil requirements of the Navy will be as follows:

"Fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, 5,000,000 barrels, if at war.
"Fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, 8,635,000 barrels, if at war.
"Fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, 16,635,000 barrels, if at war.
"Fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, 5,854,000 barrels, if at peace.
"Fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, 6,574,000 barrels, if at peace."

In view of the imminent exhaustion of all oil fields in the United States open to commercial exploitation, and in view of the rapid increase in the amount of oil necessary to supply the Navy, it is clear that the public safety requires that naval petroleum reserve No. 2 should not be given over to commercial exploitation but should be devoted to the national defense. It should be noted that in urging this conclusion no account has been taken of the needs of the Army and other auxiliaries in the present war, though a statement of them would greatly strengthen the conclusion that I have reached.

It should also be noted that it is essential that the Navy should have at all times a two-years' supply in the ground and readily accessible. (Proceedings of joint conference, p. 8.)

This alone amounts to 32,000,000 barrels.

The original oil content of reserve No. 2 is estimated by the Interior Department at 330,000,000 barrels, of which 80,000,000 barrels have already been taken out. (Proceedings of the joint conference, p. 69.) What now remains in the ground there is less by 50,000,000 barrels than the estimated total consumption of oil in the United States during this year. (Hearings of S. 45, this session, pp. 32, 75.) The total estimated deposits in known fields in the United States above given are twenty-five times the present contents of this reserve. To open it will not greatly affect the general supply.

Such is the necessity of maintaining this reserve as an essential means of national defense. Who, then, are the claimants that demand its abandonment in their interests?

Mr. E. J. Justice, special assistant to the Attorney General, whose inflexible devotion to the public interests up to the moment of his sudden and lamented death, did so much to protect the rights of the people in the oil lands, said in a memorandum dated April 18, 1916, and addressed to the Attorney General (Senate hearings on H. R. 406, 64th Cong., 1st sess, p. 457):

"The following are the companies operating in the naval petroleum reserves who will be benefited by this act:

And I think it is fair to say that they are the companies who will be benefited by the passage of this bill if it is passed just as it stands before the Senate.

	Capital stock.
Associated Oil Co	$40,000,000
Boston Pacific Oil Co	1,000,000
California Amalgamated Oil Co	5,000,000
Caribou Oil Co	1,000,000
General Petroleum Co	50,000,000
Honolulu Consolidated Oil Co	5,000,000
North American Consolidated Oil Co	5,000,000

Northern Exploration Co., the amount for which it is capitalized is not stated in this quotation.

Record Oil Co., amount of capitalization not stated.

St. Helena Oil Co	£597,192
Standard Oil Co	100,000,000
Union Oil Co	50,000,000
United Oil Co	2,800,000

Senator Husting now proceeds to comment upon that statement quoted from Mr. Justice's report.

The claimants, then, are not poor, weak, or ignorant men. They are entitled to justice from us and nothing more. That they have received under the orders of the President and the legislation heretofore enacted. Their rights before the original withdrawal order have been well stated by the Attorney General in his letter to the Secretary of the Interior, dated April 16, 1916 (hearings before Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate, 64th Cong., 2d sess., on so-called relief provision of the oil-leasing bill, p. 39):

I quote from the Attorney General's letter the following sentence, which is emphasized in Senator Husting's report:

These persons, under the existing law, were entitled to enter upon public lands, to survey and mark the portions desired, to explore for oil and gas, and, upon discovery, to take title, ultimately by patent. So long as they were diligently and in good faith engaged in prosecuting the work of discovery they were entitled by possession and to protection against clandestine and hostile entrance by others.

Senator Husting proceeds to say:

The original withdrawal order of September 27, 1909, excepted then existing valid claims by the following language.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the Senator permit a question right there?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Were the companies the Senator mentioned awhile ago among those who entered land after this order?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no; that is, not by name. Just the chronology of the appearance of these different companies in the RECORD is not in my mind. Before I get through it will appear from the records of investigators that large numbers of locations were made there upon dummy entries by one individual, and that there have been transfers of lands covered by entries clearly fraudulent to some of the great corporations whose titles I have read here.

I continue the quotation from former Senator Husting's report:

The original withdrawal order of September 27, 1909, excepted then existing valid claims by the following language: "All locations on claims existing and valid on this date may proceed to entry in the usual manner after field investigation and examination." Now no claim against the United States can exist or be valid under the mining law before discovery; and those claimants who have been caught by the withdrawal order after the expenditure of large sums of money in exploration work or before discovery came to Congress for relief, which was granted them by the Pickett Withdrawal Act of June 25, 1910, in the following words:

"Provided, That the rights of any person who, at the date of any order of withdrawal heretofore or hereafter made, as a bona fide occupant or claimant of oil or gas-bearing lands and who at such date is in diligent prosecution of work leading to the discovery of oil or gas shall not be affected or impaired by such order as long as such occupant or claimant shall continue in diligent prosecution of such work: Provided further, That this act shall not be construed as a recognized abridgment of any asserted rights or claims initiated upon any oil or gas-bearing lands for any withdrawal of such lands made prior to June 25, 1910."

Mr. NUGENT. Will the Senator permit me to ask when was that act passed?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It was passed on the 25th of June, 1910.

I think Senator Husting makes it pretty plain that everybody who has any just claim or any possible equity had been already cared for by legislation, and that when you go one step beyond that you are compromising with those who have sought unlawfully and wrongfully to trespass upon and pillage the public domain; and that, too, upon a reserve set apart for the benefit of the Navy, which, if we may believe the judgment and opinion of those who have studied this subject with some care, is quite essential to the rank our Navy shall hold in the future. Senator Husting explains further:

As a matter of fact, all, or nearly all, of the present claimants, seeking to justify their defiance of withdrawals by dating back their claims to an earlier day, rest upon frauds against the mining laws either by way of asserting a claim before discovery—or by way of using "dummy locators" to expand their claims from 20 to 160 acres and taking assignments from the dummies before the discovery of oil.

That is, so-called paper claims—

Mr. President, I am going to read a part of the testimony of Assistant Attorney General E. J. Justice quoted in Senator Husting's unpublished report.

Before quoting from Mr. Justice I want to say just a word about him. He was a prominent citizen of North Carolina. I met him in 1915 at the home of Chief Justice Clark, of the State of North Carolina, at a little reception that was held there during my visit to Raleigh. I learned that he had been one of the candidates in a contest for United States Senator that had shortly before that time taken place in the State. I beg Senators to remember that this man, standing so well in his State that he had sufficient following to be recognized as a fit man to represent North Carolina in the United States Senate, was thereafter chosen by the Attorney General, and appointed by the President, to conduct one of the most important investigations that could possibly be carried on by the Department of Justice—an investigation in which the title of property running into the hundreds of millions of dollars was involved; an investigation in which were involved great and powerful monopolies reaching out for the remaining oil found in the public lands to complete their control.

When Mr. Justice came into public service here he called upon me, and I had the opportunity from time to time of a somewhat intimate acquaintance with him. All that I had heard about him in his State was confirmed in the favorable impression I then formed. He was a man of the highest qualities of character. He was not an emotional man; he was a man of calm, well-poised judgment. I never knew a man, upon such limited acquaintance, in the results of whose deliberate and ample investigation of any matter I would have more confidence. When I learned that he had died, I felt that one of the best men of our time had been taken away in the very fullness of his power and at a time when it was possible for him to have rendered to the people of this country the highest possible service. The fact that he was selected, through the Department of Justice, for this important service is in itself a commendation of his rare qualities as a man and as an investigator.

I now quote from Mr. Justice's testimony. An example of these frauds against the mining law is the claims located by L. B. McMurty, totaling over 30,000 acres. (Hearings Naval Affairs Committee 64th Cong., 2d sess., p. 43):

Mr. JUSTICE. A man by the name of L. B. McMurty, who lives in San Francisco, prior to the order of withdrawal had been doing what people generally did—posting notices on quarter sections, on the 1st day of January, as the custom was, getting there as near midnight so as to get ahead of anybody else. They had a piece of paper tacked on a board and nailed on a stick and drove the stick into the ground. On the paper there was a statement. The land was located for oil.

* * * * * * *

Now, this man McMurty in this way "located" lands—"claims"—but of course the mining law was passed to guard against monopoly. This kind of fraud was intended to evade it. The law was at one time that no man could have more than one claim of 20 acres upon one discovery, and he had to make discovery on that claim before he could acquire any vested right.

These lands are taken up under the act of February 11, 1897, which was passed to allow oil land to be located under the placer-mining law. It was provided that the maximum amount that could be embraced in one location by an association of eight people and upon which one discovery would suffice was 160 acres, so that the interest of each of the eight would be equal to 20 acres. I found, in my investigation out there, that in the early days of oil development the trick of using dummies was seldom resorted to, but in later years, when it was known by the use of the drill there was much oil around about there seven of the eight names used on the location were often mere dummies.

I put this into the RECORD and lay it before Senators for their consideration, because it bears upon the bill under consideration here. We have, in sections 18 and 19, recognitions of rights derived from entries as spurious as Mr. Justice is now describing:

This man McMurty went in, as a great many others did in California, on a large scale, posting notices on and claiming these lands. When the developer would come along he would hold him up, but when this order of withdrawal intervened it was water on his wheel, because the developer could not go back and locate because the land had been withdrawn. Therefore they began to buy out men like McMurty, who had prior notices posted.

We were struggling along trying to find out whether McMurty's arrangement with the locators was fraudulent or not. It developed he sent to Chicago and borrowed the names of 32 men employed around the stockyards whom he had never seen before or heard of and secured powers of attorney from them. Eight of them were used by him to get the northeast quarters of many sections, eight of them as northwest quarter locators, eight of them as southwest locators, and eight of them as southeast locators. He divided them up that way so it would be simple for his agents to go into the field and post the notices. He located over 164 quarter-sections with those dummies. He did not get advice from his lawyers he thought he needed, and became doubtful about the sufficiency of this plan. Of course, there was no valid location until there was a discovery.

That is the climax of the thing, as I see it.

So when he thought he might get into trouble about these Chicago locators, for some reason known to him and his attorney, he sent to New York and got some locators—the same number—and "located" them on the same sections, and he made some contracts with purchasers—this man McLeod, under whom the Standard claims, was one of them—under the Chicago locators, and when he dropped them and picked up the New York locators and "located" them he never changed his contract with McLeod, but moved on under the New York locators just as if he had continued under the Chicago crowd.

Now, when we sent to Chicago the men said—at the time the special agents first went to them—they did not remember giving McMurty any power of attorney.

Some of these men who signed these powers of attorney, when we saw them, said, "We did not do it." When reminded of the circumstances, they recalled it and said they thought they were signing some sort of an election petition, or something of that sort.

The matter began to look so fraudulent that we concluded we would just subpœna McMurty and bring him up the next morning before he had time to talk with anyone and put him on the stand as a witness. His testimony is set out in the record. It fairly shows the fraud. It is not full, as many things he did not remember. His answers were mostly in monosyllables, as one might expect in these circumstances.

All these sections I have mentioned here were "located" by McMurty at the same time and in the same township and in the same way as section 28, which has been investigated and tried.

Senator LODGE propounds a question to Mr. Justice:

Senator LODGE. Were those included in the 1,600 acres of the Standard Oil Co.?

Mr. JUSTICE. Every acre of the Standard's 1,600 acres came through that source.

That excited some interest on the part of Senator SWANSON, who was present at this hearing, and he said:

Senator SWANSON. That would be 1,600 acres?

Mr. JUSTICE. Yes.

Senator SWANSON. What would that be worth?

Mr. JUSTICE. I do not know. Mr. Richardson says that a man from the Bureau of Mines said $7,500 an acre.

Senator BRYAN. Every acre you say the Standard Oil Co. got was located by McMurty?

Mr. JUSTICE. Yes, sir; of those 1,600 acres claimed by it in naval reserve No. 2.

Senator BRYAN. Did he locate for anybody except the Standard Oil?

Mr. JUSTICE. Yes, sir; he located for himself.

Senator BRYAN. I understand. The 1,600 acres that the Standard Oil claim were located in the manner as you described by McMurty?

Mr. JUSTICE. Yes, sir.

Senator BRYAN. I ask, furthermore, how much more of these reserves, in addition to the 1,600 acres, were located by him in the same manner?

Mr. JUSTICE. Excuse me a minute until I make a calculation.

Senator BRYAN. How much of the 5,600 acres were located by him?

Mr. JUSTICE. Six hundred and forty multiplied by five—3,200 acres out of the 5,600 acres.

Senator SWANSON. Please explain the contracts and methods by which the Standard Oil got its interest in these lands.

Mr. JUSTICE. McMurty, of course, having these locations—that is, the paper notices posted and this order of withdrawal intervening—he commanded the field to a very large extent, because the men who got in had to have some sort of connection with somebody that antedated the withdrawal order. So McMurty went to the Associated Oil Co. and sold them a part of section 28 for over a half a million dollars, I think it was. I do not remember just how much he received, but a large sum; but he was required to go back and get the New York fellows to ratify his transaction as their attorney in fact. They wanted a little money, and he gave them the equivalent of about 4 per cent, and he kept the other 96 per cent.

On the witness stand he attempted to justify that by saying that he spent years in working on the matter, and they had spent only about 15 minutes.

Senator PITTMAN. But was there any question as to whether or not these men were in conspiracy with McMurty to deliver him their interest?

Mr. JUSTICE. No; I think the conspiracy and fraud of the men consisted in selling their names. The point that you have in mind, I take it, was made in the trial. The defendant said: "Suppose McMurty is in fact the principal for these men, so far as anything was said, and so far as anything in the record shows, why, then, if he has committed a breach of trust in not giving them their eighth, that gives them a cause of action against him for breach of trust."

"Yes," said Judge Bean from the bench, "if he located it for them, but he merely got their names to use for fraud, and used them for frauds, and they did nothing except permit the use of their names, that does not make the location honest and doesn't support that contention."

McMurty went around selling these claims to anybody that would buy them from him at his price. The Standard Oil bought these 1,600 acres through a man named McLeod, who was pretty close to McMurty. The circumstances tend to show that McLeod and McMurty were handling these things together through McLeod's wife's name and through him. McMurty and McLeod turned these claims in to the Standard Oil Co. under a contract that the Standard Oil Co. would go on these lands and develop, and if it discovered oil—then McLeod would go to the land office and make application for patent, and they would then, if they could get the patent, divide up between them according to the terms of the contract, McLeod getting little and the Standard Oil getting more. That is the way the Standard Oil came in.

The Senators who were present when I read the list of the companies operating in the naval petroleum reserve will remember that in addition to the Standard Oil the Associated Oil Co. was likewise one of them. It is a subsidiary of the Southern Pacific Railway.

Mr. Justice says with respect to this company:

The Associated Oil Co. came in in the same way, except that McLeod did not intervene, and so on, with all these claims, just as if he had a basket of eggs to sell, just peddling them around. Of course, the Standard Oil Co. and the Associated Oil Co. did not take his word for the fact there was oil there. They made up their own minds after a careful investigation of the matter. I say there are some circumstances which lead me to believe that the Standard Oil Co. and the Associated Oil Co. and others knew about these frauds. Now, for instance, one of the things that made me think that was that the Associated Oil Co. when it paid McMurty this money took more care in drawing this contract than seems necessary if there was nothing the matter with the title. In reciting a thing that was not borne out by the papers or the facts. McMurty did not use his own name in making the locations. He only acted as the attorney in fact. When he came to make the contract——

Senator SWANSON. Let me ask you this: Did they know who he was attorney in fact for—did they show all the data on the papers?

Mr. JUSTICE. Yes, sir; he showed all his papers. Then the contract recited that McMurty was personally interested in those locations. His papers did not indicate that he was. We called McMurty to the witness stand. We thought we would surprise him, but it turned out afterwards that they got hold of him the night before, so he says. That is another story, though. When they introduced this contract, under which the Associated Oil Co. claimed, there was this recital that he was personally interested. On the stand we asked him: "You say in this contract you were personally interested—how?" He said that one of the locators died, and there was an administrator's sale. "Is this the only way you got the interest?" "Yes, sir." "But," we said to him, "that man died after you sold." That false recital was put in that contract. He could not explain how it was, but it indicated they were simply fixing up the gaps.

That is the statement of Mr. Justice, appointed by the President, through the Department of Justice, to make a special investigation in this naval-reserve field, and it is quoted by former Senator Husting in the report which I am reading.

I have finished the quotation from Special Attorney General Justice. What I now read is from the pen of Senator Husting. He says, after quoting from Mr. Justice's testimony:

I submit that proceedings of this character are tainted with conscious fraud, and that neither those guilty of the frauds nor those claiming under them have any equities that justify us in jeopardizing our naval security. Yet section 16 of this bill, as recommended by a majority of the committee proposed to give up this naval reserve to all claimants who "asserted a mineral claim"—thus dispensing with the requirement of discovery—and had up to the time of the passage of this bill drilled a producing oil or gas well—thus condoning defiance of the withdrawal order and withdrawal act—if the present holder can show that he purchased the claim in good faith, which means with intent to drill for oil in defiance of the withdrawal order, for a valuable consideration, which means nothing substantial, and without actual knowledge of his predecessor's fraud—thus repealing for the benefit of defiant trespassers who endanger the public safety the wholesome rule of law which puts the purchaser of property upon inquiry as to the validity of the seller's title.

It will be worth while, I think, for Senators to compare the provisions of that section which Senator Husting there quotes with the provisions for relief incorporated within the pending bill.

Senator Husting further said in his report:

The beneficiary of this extraordinary legislation would pay the Government as royalty one-eighth of what the Government owns in full, after deducting the oil used in development and wasted by his own greed and negligence. The majority attempts to justify this proposal by calling it a compromise, but in fact it is not a compromise at all, for no claimant is required to abandon his contests in order to get the benefit of it; on the contrary, he may pursue his contest to final defeat on the chance of getting absolute title, and then, after defeat, take the benefit of this so-called compromise. This proposal, therefore, in substance excludes the Government from the benefit of proceedings in the courts and before the Land Department; insures that benefit to defiant trespassers who rest their rights on fraud and guarantees the wrongdoers against any possible loss in any event.

I find also in Senator Husting's report some quotations from the Attorney General and from the Secretary of the Navy that emphasize the importance of protecting to the very last measure the legal rights which the Government has in the oil lands within the reserved territory.

Secretary Daniels, in one communication presented to the Senate Committee on Public Lands when this legislation was pending at a previous session, which I find quoted in Senator Husting's report, said:

I wish to as earnestly as possible impress upon you our conviction, in which not only the Navy Department joins, but the Department of Justice, that this oil land, having been set apart for the Navy, belongs to the Navy; that this leasing bill would take away from the Government that which in time of peril might change the tide of war; that these gentlemen who have equitable or legal rights should be remanded to the courts or to the regular departments of the Government to have their rights tested.

They would then be tested under circumstances where both sides could be heard, not upon ex parte statements made here and there to the membership of a committee or to the membership of a body of Congress.

Again, the Secretary of the Navy says, as quoted here in Senator Husting's report:

The Navy Department is vitally interested in protecting these reserves, because they were relied upon when the policy of building oil-burning ships was adopted, and now that we have a large and increasing number of ships that depend solely upon oil for fuel it is of the utmost importance that the rights and needs of the Navy be not overlooked in the effort to relieve claimants to oil lands.

As bearing upon the situation with regard to pending litigation at the time this report was prepared, I have, I think, a little later data which I shall present further along in my remarks, but I quote this from Attorney General Gregory:

It (the bill)—

Referring to a pending bill which proposed to confirm the claims of trespassers, as the Government regards them, in the oil reserves and give them priority of right, as this pending bill does, the Attorney General says:

It (the bill) is apparently intended to apply to the oil and gas deposits in the naval petroleum reserves, for there is a proviso in the thirtieth section that any moneys accruing to the United States from lands of those reserves shall be deposited in a specified way. It applies generally to all the withdrawn oil lands. The result will be to destroy the value of those naval reserves as depositories of fuel oil in the ground and convert them into sources of pecuniary income.

I wish Senators would hold that fact in mind. This proposed legislation recognizes the right to continue the operation of certain wells in naval-reserve territory.

The point made in this case, while it is made with reference to another bill, has its direct application here. The only way the naval-reserve area can be preserved, as all other Governments are preserving their naval reserves from encroachment, is to prevent as much as possible the boring or pumping of wells located here and there throughout that territory. If you do not do that, you are sure to have the oil to a certain degree exhausted for a considerable area about every one of the producing wells located. Recognizing, as does the pending measure, what are claimed to be the equitable rights of these trespassers to continue on the reserves, and to operate those wells under leases that shall be executed under the terms of this bill, I submit is to do just exactly what is suggested here, namely—to destroy the value of those naval reserves as depositories of fuel oil in the ground and convert them into sources of pecuniary income. The Department of Justice is doing its utmost to protect the reserved areas, including the naval reserves. Over 20 suits are pending in California and Wyoming. These include but a few of the cases which have been investigated. Many powerful oil companies are interested in a multitude of claims set up to the withdrawn land. Practically all of the known oil areas in California have been covered by paper locations. Those whom we have sued and contemplate suing are those who appear to have no right or equity either under the mining law or the Pickett Act of June 25, 1910, but who have entered on the withdrawn land in spite of the withdrawal and in spite of the known purpose of the Government to enforce it, and who in many instances have taken enormous quantities of oil and appropriated the proceeds—millions of dollars—without making any provision to indemnify the Government, besides inflicting gross damage to oil deposits through hasty and negligent operation. * * * In some (cases) the claims are now sought to be supported by fraudulent dummy locations and fraudulent locations of gypsum. The recognition of any considerable portion of (these claims) could not fail to have a serious effect upon the oil reserves in general and the naval reserves in particular. Whether such a recognition will result from the proviso I can not undertake to say definitely, but, as now advised, I incline very strongly to the opinion that it would.

Mr. President, with that I conclude for the present presenting further extracts from the report of Senator Husting. I next come to quote just a paragraph from the debate in the Senate on December 17, 1917. When this bill was engaging the attention of the Senate for a brief time, some reference was made to this subject and to the history of these intrusions upon the naval reserves.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] made on that occasion in the course of the debate a statement referring to the people who were seeking relief and many of whom are to be afforded relief in sections 18 and 19 of the pending bill, as follows:

Mr. SWANSON. * * * These very men in this naval reserve came to Congress and got through what is known as the Pickett Act. They say that all they ask is to be allowed to take care of their cases under existing law. They are not satisfied with existing law, however. They come here and want the law changed so as to give about $100,000,000, the value of this property, to whom? The Standard Oil Co., the Honolulu Co. They want to change existing law. The Navy Department has not asked to have the law changed; the Navy Department has not asked them to do anything but go into the law courts and contend for what is right and just.

I say that is what Congress should do now. It should keep its hands off; it should send these trespassers upon the naval reserves into the courts of justice to get their relief. I continue the quotation from Senator SWANSON'S remarks on that occasion:

> This bill comes in here and changes the law, and gives these people rights to which they are not entitled under existing law; and they try to connect what they want with the general policy, hoping to put it through by attaching it to a bill for general relief outside of that.
> We are not afraid of any discussion of this measure, in Congress or elsewhere. We are willing to have it investigated. It was heard by the Naval Affairs Committee. All we ask is that these people may have the rights to which they are entitled under existing law. Do not change the law. Let them go to the courts and contend for their rights. This bill comes in here and changes the law, and I will tell you how in one case it will change it. It is in evidence here before the Naval Affairs Committee that a prospector or prospectors from San Francisco, Calif., went to the stockyards in Chicago, and got 39 men, I believe, to file claims under the law as it then stood—all fraudulent claims, mere dummies. After that title was obtained it was sold to these people. The title to nearly two or three thousand acres of land under this reserve is in fraudulent dummies, entered by men in the stockyards, who came and testified that they thought they were signing an election petition.

The Senator repeats:

> The Navy Department does not ask any relief. It says, "Let these people have what they are entitled to under the law when it was settled years ago." Finding that they can not get what they claim to be their rights under the law they come in here and want the law changed so as to turn over rights worth about $100,000,000 to a few private individuals that we say under the law in justice and equity are not entitled to it.

Much more of that debate respecting the views of Senators who at that time were present and who were in close contact with the Secretary of the Navy, who was then in the city of Washington, might be read as showing the opposition of several Senators here, from one of whom I have quoted and others of whom I may quote later. As a result of that debate the naval reserve provision was struck out of the bill then pending before the Senate.

(At this point Mr. LA FOLLETTE yielded the floor for the day.)

Friday, August 29 (legislative day of Saturday, August 23).

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, yesterday I spoke upon certain phases of the problem raised by the pending legislation, and about the time that I yielded the floor the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] presented a letter signed by one Joseph A. Phelan, oil examiner. The letter is written upon the stationery of the United States Shipping Board, Emergency Fleet Corporation. It raises the question as to whether it is possible for the Navy Department and the Government to save anything from the clutches of the Standard Oil on the naval reserves. It not only raises that point but, if the letter is to be accepted as an authority, it settles it. It seems to be written with a view of impressing the Senator to whom it was addressed, and the Senate, if it happened to come to its attention, with the idea that it is utterly futile to attempt any longer to resist the encroachments of Standard Oil on the naval reserves; because they have already gotten such a hold there that we might as well surrender to them. The writer of this letter expresses his opinion, after making statements with respect to the holdings of the Standard Oil, that he has "no hesitancy in saying that the delay in the passage of a general leasing bill has enriched the Standard Oil Co. millions of dollars, and any continued delay will work to the sole advantage of that company."

I have not had much opportunity since this letter was presented to look up Mr. Phelan, but I called up the Shipping Board to learn about him, and I found out that he is employed there, but has only been employed for the brief space of two or two and a half months; that he had left a memorandum that he was in the "Democratic gallery" of the Senate. He is here watching the progress of legislation either because he is a very patriotic citizen or because he has some underground connection. At any rate, he is very much interested in being on the ground while this legislation is under consideration, and he is not serving the Shipping Board in being here.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Did I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to say "the Democratic gallery"?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is the memorandum he left.

Mr. SHEPPARD. There is really no such gallery.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; there is no such gallery. I suppose he is probably in the gallery on the Democratic side; I do not know just where he is; but I venture the opinion that if you can find out where the Standard Oil lobby is, there you will locate Phelan.

I find that a Phelan of the same initials was formerly a representative of private oil corporations in their efforts to secure leases on Indian oil lands for the Foster and the Doherty interests. I find that he was recently employed by the Empire Gas & Fuel Co., of Bartlesville, Okla.; that he was an employee at one time of the City Service Co. of New York, a subsidiary of the Doherty company, one of the great monopolies of light in the United States. I find that he was at one time an employee of the Indian (T) Illuminating Oil Co. of Oklahoma.

Mr. President, I do not believe that there are many Senators on this floor who will be inclined to follow the suggestions of this gentleman as to whether the United States Government can secure and preserve its naval reserve in the contest against the trespasser. I do not know what assurances concerning the antecedents of this gentleman the Senator from Montana had when he presented his letter upon this floor, carrying with it the positive statement that any delay in the passage of this bill would be hostile to the public interest and would serve the Standard Oil interests. His letter is in the RECORD; it is offered here on the floor, and for the present I let it stand just there, with this addition, that the writer of it does not take the same view of the public interest, the vital interests of the Navy Department in the naval reserves, that Secretary Daniels does.

It is true, Mr. President, that I have one other word from the Secretary of the Navy later and more directly applicable to the specific terms of this bill than what I am now about to present to the Senate. I will lay that before the Senate, or, still better, put it in the RECORD, where it can reach the Senate if they are interested in finding his views.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to ask the Senator how the bill fails to protect the Government's interests in those naval reserves. I do not clearly understand the point.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. To answer the Senator's question in just a brief way, it gives trespassers who have gone upon these lands, and against whom suits are pending, priority rights under the terms of this bill against anybody else, even in the naval reserves; and, of course, as to the naval reserves, if the reservation provision were protected, the public would not have any rights outside of these sections in this bill. So that it rewards these trespassers; it relieves them of defending their rights in the courts and taking the judgment of the courts as to whether they have any equity even in this territory; and it gives them out of hand rights in the naval reserves that they would not have except for this legislation. That is what it does. That is one thing it does.

But, now, in opposition to Phelan's views, I want to read something from Secretary Daniels. It is not written at this hour. I will read later a letter that has been written within two or three weeks, and that does apply directly to the very terms of this bill; but what I am going to read now is a general statement that has application to the issue that is involved in this contest.

Mr. President, the supporters of this legislation ought to be able to summon here some better authority than this man Phelan. I make my appeal here, Mr. President, in support of the effort of the Secretary of the Navy and of the Department of Justice, to save to this Government and to our country these oil lands in the naval reserves. I am not a member of this committee. I was blamed yesterday, in a speech made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] in criticism of my course here, because I had not appeared before the Committee on Public Lands and suggested to that committee my ideas and these amendments which I have offered here. Mr. President, this original bill was introduced only on the 2d day of June, a little over two months ago. It went to the Committee on Public Lands, but that is not the identical bill we are now considering. That was the first bill that was introduced. That is not this bill.

The bill that we are considering, which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] criticizes me because I did not appear before the committee to seek amendments to, such as I have presented here in the Senate, was only introduced on the 15th of August, and it was reported right back to the Senate on the same day. I want to say to the Senator from Colorado that I do not think he had a really good case against me on laches. I do not think I am fairly chargeable with negligence for not appearing before this committee to propose my amendments or the amendments which I have offered here to this bill. It was introduced on the 15th of August and reported to the Senate on the 15th of August.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Surely.

Mr. LENROOT. I am sure my colleague will welcome an explanation of how that came about.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, I think I understand how it came about. I was about to make a statement in regard to it.

Mr. LENROOT. The original bill was considered in committee in full and many amendments adopted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Then the committee instructed the chairman of the committee to introduce the amended bill as a new bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; I so understood. I understood that; and the most important amendments that were adopted were proposed by the conservation association, of which Gifford Pinchot is the head. I happen to be informed that when this Smoot bill was first introduced it was a pretty faithful copy, I think, of the conference bill; am I wrong about that?

Mr. LENROOT. Partly, because the Smoot bill as originally introduced was a straight leasing bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; but so far as other features of the bill were concerned it was a pretty faithful copy of the conference bill which came in here at the close of the last Congress and which was defeated here by a filibuster. I am going to have a bit to say again about that filibuster, because the Senator from Colorado has arraigned me here on the floor of the Senate as largely responsible for that filibuster.

I come back now, Mr. President, to present to the Senate the views of Secretary Daniels as bearing upon the point covered by the letter offered by the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] written by this man Phelan.

On February 15, 1916, Secretary Daniels in a letter to Mr. E. B. Latham, one of the best oil experts in the United States, thoroughly familiar with this field, having been water commissioner and chief geologist for the Oil Protective Association of Kern County and a graduated geologist of Harvard and Columbia, asked him his opinion. I quote from Secretary Daniels:

6. Suitability of naval petroleum reserves Nos. 1 and 2 for reserve sources of fuel oil for the Navy?

In a very long opinion, Mr. Latham replied in part to the above inquiry. Answering inquiry No. 6, "Suitability of naval petroleum reserves Nos. 1 and 2?" as per Secretary Daniels's inquiry—

Now, I quote from this expert authority:

It was contended at the hearing that there are over 3,000,000 acres in the public domain from which the Navy may be provided with petroleum, and that reserve No. 1, Elk Hill, may be kept for the Navy's use; but No. 1 should be subjected to the preferential leases asked for. Based on results and procedures adopted by the best-informed companies, I calculate that the possible depletion from all causes and under the most severe conditions would not exceed 25 per cent. In reserve No. 2 it will probably never reach 20 per cent; and, furthermore, since reserve No. 2 was set aside, a new and deeper oil sand has been discovered underlying it. This second producing measure is now virgin, and may be so maintained. It is as prolific as the original or top sand, its oil content and gas pressure as great. It has been drilled into enough to prove its continuity, but not enough to drain it, and may be preserved unimpaired for a thousand years.

Now, there may be Senators who prefer to accept the opinion of Mr. Phelan, oil expert of the Shipping Board, former employee of various private monopoly oil-lighting and oil-grabbing interests. I assume that the Senator from Montana knew nothing about the antecedents back of the letter.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator is quite right. I know nothing about his antecedents nor about the facts he states in the letter. I give the letter for whatever it may be worth.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is what I assumed.

But here is the opinion of Secretary Daniels, whose antecedents are better than this fellow's. Here is the opinion of a man of authority who says that not in a thousand years can this situation change on the oil reserve. It may be we will have some testimony presented before we get through with this argument that these expert opinions are all wrong, but I venture to say that it will be somewhat superficial if it is.

Mr. Latham says—and there is nothing to color his opinion in the way of prejudice or self-interest, there is no taint of Standard Oil on him. He never has been connected with any grabbing proposition. He never sought to pillage upon the great national petroleum reserves of this Government. Here is his opinion, that the drilling indicates very conclusively conditions there that a thousand years will not change or jeopardize the oil reserve that this great Government through Secretary Daniels is seeking to preserve if we will just keep these trespassing thieves out of the territory.

Are you going to follow Mr. Latham, are you going to follow Secretary Daniels and his impartial experts, and are you going to take care of the interests of the Government in the matter of these naval reserves, or are you going to support the Standard and allied oil interests? It is up to you. Make your record and abide by it.

I do not think that this administration in dealing with the situation took the aggressive steps that it ought to have taken. When these naval reserves were made, had there been a man in the White House seeking only to protect the interests of the public a policy would have been inaugurated that the Standard Oil and these other organizations would have been bound to respect. But there has been the same policy pursued here with reference to protecting the reserves covered by Executive orders that there has been in dealing with these great interests out in the general commercial field.

I have said, and I will say again, that we have not had a President in the White House in a quarter of a century who has dared to vigorously oppose the trusts and combinations—not one! There never has been one moment in all that period of time when one strong, resolute, courageous man in the White House could not have broken the strangle hold of these corporate monsters by a strict enforcement of laws already on the statute books.

There never has been a minute in all these years when if the power of the law that was given in one single act had been honestly enforced the Government could not have destroyed the power of these great interests, one of which is so vitally concerned in this legislation.

We are temporizing, we are simply camouflaging and fooling the American people. We know that we are leaving to another generation this problem which will have to be settled.

Mr. President, does any man on this floor dare to say that the statesmanship that produced the Sherman antitrust legislation was of a lower order than the statesmanship of to-day? I think that generation of men marked the high tide of statesmanship, at least for a considerable period, in the United States Senate. They wrote into the statute books, long before it was necessary to apply it, the Sherman antitrust law.

I see men about me at the present moment of the second generation since that statute was written. I see some of the direct lineal descendants of the men who had to do with the writing of that great statute on the floor of the Senate now. It was my privilege to serve in the House of Representatives when that law was written on the statute books. It was my privilege to know as a young lad in the House of Representatives the Nestor among the lawyers of that body, the father of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], one of the ablest lawyers who ever served in either body of the United States Congress. And there were other men, John Randolph Tucker and others of his type; Ezra B. Taylor, of Ohio; and in the Senate were men who had none to excel them in statesmanship or in legal ability in the history of the Government.

At that time, piloted by prophetic statesmen, men who had vision, seeing what might come to this country and what has come to it, they wrote upon the statute books the antitrust law. It gave to the executive department all the power that the Constitution can give to the executive arm of the Government. It said all that was to be said. It was made possible because, even though we had not more than three or four organizations in this country at that time that suggested the possibility of trusts or combinations, those men had vision enough to see that there might come in the future an organized power that would attempt to dominate the commercial and industrial life of the American people in contravention of the fundamental principles of the common law with respect to markets and prices and the products of labor.

Ah, Mr. President, let me say here in this connection that there has, in my opinion, been only one great issue in all the history of the world. That issue has been between labor and those who would control, through slavery in one form or another, the laborers. That is history. Read it. Study it. Nations have gone down in ruin from the first dawn of history that have sought to make slaves of the great masses of men. That is the destiny of nations, for the God of justice and humanity is over all, and when one privileged powerful class of the human race seek to benefit themselves unjustly from the great masses of people, they run counter and bring down upon themselves ultimately the judgment, the justice, of God Almighty. We are on the road, I fear, that other nations have traveled. I do not know that it is possible, sir, to arrest that progress. It may be that it is a disease that must afflict all nations and all peoples. It may be that it is an inexorable law of evolution.

Here in this country we have been led to hope for something better than that. I have inherited, as it were, the belief and the hope that this was the place for the consummation and the working out of the most perfect Government on earth, the most perfect Government attainable.

We had in this country a splendid opportunity, better, I think, than any other nation in the world. If the human race is gradually to be lifted to higher and higher levels, if civilization is to be truly democratic and progressive, and if we are ultimately to come to as high a degree of perfection in government in this world as finite human beings can attain, it ought to be here in America, above all other places in the world, for we had here the best opportunity. We had virgin soil in which to lay our foundations. We had the new material that came from the Old World. Every immigrant wanted more liberty and democracy, wanted freedom, and hoped to realize the ideals to which the human heart aspires. It is the only place, as I see it, for the human race to attain it.

I see forces carrying us in the other direction. The Standard Oil, the Copper Trust, the Beef Trust, and all the great organizations of power and capital that have been builded up here in violation of the law of the land, that have thriven and controlled and defied the Government—these trespassers upon the naval reserves are following exactly the same lines which all the others have.

Why, Senators, are you not able to see? Is there nothing that can arouse the statesmanship of this day from its lethargy? Can you not interpret this wonderful movement that is sweeping over the Middle West and going on to the Pacific and throwing out its feelers even into the New England territory—the movement of the Farmers' National Nonpartisan League? What is its cause? It is organized because there is a belief among the people that there is a power that puts them at a disadvantage by controlling the market price of what they produce and the market price of everything they buy. They have appealed to the Democratic Party and they have appealed to the Republican Party, and they have appealed in vain, for relief, for legislation to break the power that took out of their toil just what tribute it pleased; a power that forced them when they marketed their grain to take a low price, and then took that grain into the great storage elevators and sold it to the consumer at a high price.

The great body of the agriculturists of this country decided that they had stood that thing long enough. They have protested; they have appealed to the various parties; they have gone before the various national committeemen; they have asked for this plank and that plank in the national platforms, but they have obtained no relief. Decade after decade has passed. They sweated to produce the crop; they sent it to market; they have taken out of it not enough to pay for the production and to carry the interest charges upon the capital invested in the farms. They have bought the supplies controlled by the Harvester Trust, the Beef Trust, the Fertilizer Trust, the Woolen Trust, and the Cotton Trust. The price of everything they had to buy has been controlled arbitrarily by selfish interests and no longer controlled by competition.

Do you not understand that from the beginning of organized society down to 20 years ago the price of every manufactured commodity that anybody in organized society bought gradually declined? Why? Because methods of production were improved and there was competition between the producers that kept profits at a reasonable level. About 1897 they began to combine to suppress competition and to control the markets, and from that hour, if you will consult the statistics for 20 years, you will find that the price of everything you have had to buy has increased in this country. Why? Because combinations and trusts were formed to control the prices, to take the benefits of the improvements for those who owned the factories and parasitical middlemen, and to give none to the laborers and to give none to the consumers.

That is what this thing means; that is the meaning of this great struggle. That is the biggest problem that confronts you. It is not Shantung; it is not the league of nations; it is not the treaty made at Versailles; but it is whether you can save democracy in the United States. That is the fundamental problem of the American people. The power that is trying to take the naval reserves is only one of the many that are encroaching upon the rights of the American people and upon their democracy.

Mr. President, I say that it lies with the people of this country to settle this great problem and to settle it under the Constitution without violence. I think they can accomplish its solution. It must be settled, for it is possible to carry this thing too far; they may rob the public and the public's domain once too often.

We have strikes on every hand. Senators have attempted here by resolutions and by speeches on the floor to intimidate and to restrain labor and to restrict free speech in this country not only in time of war but after. The American people are a patient people, but it is possible to push things too far. Is it not worth while for enlightened, conservative statesmanship to stop and consider this situation so that effective steps can be taken to meet these issues? We must curb this mighty monopoly power and give to the people of this country a free, open, competitive market, and free, open, competitive conditions under which they may buy the products of all manufacturing and producing organizations in this country at reasonable prices regulated by competition.

Perhaps this is an old-fashioned view, Mr. President, and yet we hear talk on this floor about price fixing. Price fixing will not give substantial relief. Think of the problem involved in fixing the prices in just one branch of industry—steel, for example, from pig iron to cambric needles! The Government would break down. We have been unable to regulate even railway transportation. It has failed after over 30 years of trial. It has been found so intricate a problem that a commission could not be organized that could take care of its details. Then, in God's name, tell me how can it be hoped to regulate prices in all the branches of industry in this vast country of ours?

Why, price fixing can not begin under the Constitution of the United States until the valuation is made of every plant, of all its holdings of natural resources, of all its raw materials, and of all the processes of production. The history of railroad-rate regulation ought to be a lesson to the statesmen who argue on this floor about protecting under this bill, for instance, the use of coal or the use of oil by price fixing.

We have had a great commission at work ever since 1913 to ascertain the value of the railroads of this country. This is 1919, and they have not reported. You are going to fix the price. A generation will pass before there can be effective price fixing that will save the people from extortionate profits levied by these buccaneers who have been given their opportunity through the cowardice of Presidents and Cabinets and Attorneys General who did not dare to prosecute them for violation of laws. A law might be passed to-morrow in Congress, and have the sanction of a unanimous vote in both Houses, and the approval of the President, fixing the price for everything the American consumer must buy. But it would not bring relief.

The Constitution prevents the taking of property without due process of law, and the packers and all of the combinations affected by such legislation would immediately go into court. They would invoke the power of injunction to restrain the enforcement of that statute until it could be determined whether fixed price would confiscate the property. Senators know that perfectly well.

The course I am pursuing is my duty, according to my view, and I shall follow that course. Every Senator has to do just what he thinks is right, and I am not impeaching any other Senator who pursues another course. I am not questioning the validity of his judgment or the integrity of his thinking; but, for my part, so long as I can, so long as I am in public life, when I meet the issue raised by the encroachment of these organizations upon the free markets of the country, and exaction, through the power of combination, of undue profits from the American people, I shall do everything I can to break their power. I may stand alone. I will not mind that. I have become used to that in the past 25 or 30 years.

Mr. President, it is true that when trust organization began 30 years ago it soon became apparent that it could not accomplish its purpose unless it controlled the press of the country. So by purchase and indirect control, that is, by owning bank and other stock that could be brought to bear upon the advertising, which is the chief source of revenue of the press, it was largely brought under their control.

Great daily after great daily succumbed to these influences. People who are here this afternoon may think that the press of the country can not fool them. They may read what they know is a lie to-night in the papers. They read it repeated to-morrow and the next day and the next day, and they say to their families that there is nothing in it. That thing is repeated time after time, day after day, it may be when they see it in some special article elaborately set up and illustrated, but finally it steals in upon the judgment of the people.

If you will study the editorial pages of newspapers through the years, beginning a little more than 20 years ago, you will find the trail of the serpent that has control of the great newspapers of the country.

Then what happened? Enterprising young men saw that so far as publicity was concerned the great newspapers of the country had become the tools of this new industrial power, this new political power. So these keen, intelligent young men, who had had a training for journalism, realized the control of the trusts over the newspapers and established weekly and monthly magazines to represent the public interest. They assailed these trusts and combinations as unlawful organizations, as undemocratic, un-American, and dangerous not only to the industrial freedom of the people but to their political liberty as well.

The start was made in McClure's. Ida Tarbell, Lincoln Steffens, Ray Stannard Baker, John S. Phillips, and others got control of that magazine, and they pushed out into the field, and what happened then?

The American public, stifled because it had no voice, the press and the great papers being controlled in the country by the trusts, supported that magazine, and its subscriptions mounted by thousands. Then there came magazines one after another, the American, Hampton's, Everybody's. Why, Everybody's employed Lawson to write "Frenzied Finance" to attack the Beef Trust. So we had a long list of magazines. Even the Saturday Evening Post, seeking to ride the wave of popular favor for a time and to increase its circulation, ran articles of a radical nature. They enjoyed great success, grew in circulation, and became a tremendous power. One after another of them reached up to the half million mark in circulation. I knew most of the men who were interested in that class of publications. I saw them week after week, month after month, as they came to Washington to survey the situation here in national legislation. It was an interesting phase in the journalistic history of the American Government. They rendered a most remarkable service.

Then what happened? I spoke over at Philadelphia in 1912, and I warned these magazine publishers that the day was at hand when they, one after another, would be confronted with the necessity of yielding to this mighty power and ceasing the publication of articles of criticism against the great industrial and commercal organizations in this country or they would be denied advertising and forced to the wall.

Mr. President, I stand here this afternoon to say that one after another of those magazines has succumbed to that influence. I stand here to say that it is impossible to secure the publication in those magazines to-day of articles denouncing this violation of law, this encroachment upon the liberties of the people, this overlordship that controls the industrial and commercial life. I say there is not one of those great periodicals, excepting four or five that I could number on one hand, left to-day the control of which has not been acquired by the special interests, the Standard Oil or like organizations. One after another of these magazines, periodicals, and publications has surrendered to that mighty power. There are only a few publications that reach, in all probability, more than 150,000 to 200,000 subscribers—which means probably not more than a million readers in the United States—that absolutely are free to publish criticism. That is the truth, and it is a terrible commentary on our Government. The failure of our Government to grapple with the trust problem and the control of the press causes me to hesitate when I say that we ought to be able to work out peaceably with the ballot all the problems of government.

The man who is now in the White House was elected solely upon the issue that he would free the American people from the domination of this insidious power. The most important pledge in the platform upon which he was elected, the promise made in nearly all the speeches that he delivered in the campaign of 1912, was that he would break the power of monopoly, would free the Government of the United States from the control and dictation of the special interests. If you need any proof of that assertion, I have it right on my desk. He charged that the Republican administration had not prosecuted the officials of these criminal combinations, and that was the truth, sir. They had not. The Republican administrations had not dared to do so; Roosevelt had not dared to do so; Taft had not dared to do so.

Wilson says in his New Freedom, in which are gathered all the essential portions of his speeches delivered in the campaign of 1912, that this Government is controlled by a handful of men; that he will not live under a Government controlled in that way; that if he is elected he will free the Government.

The Democratic platform promised three specific things: To prosecute the officials of the criminal organizations, to free the country from monopoly, and that criminal commercial combinations should be destroyed.

Ah, but some Democrat may arise and say: "Wilson did not have a fair chance; he had this war on his hands." Mr. President, years went by after his election before we were inducted into this war by Wilson, and yet the President never lifted a hand to redeem one of those pledges; he never criminally prosecuted a trust official. Private monopoly is riding upon the necks of the American people, charging what it pleases for the necessaries of life. Every criminal commercial organization that was in the saddle and controlling in its field in 1912 is stronger to-day than ever.

I do not arraign Woodrow Wilson more than I do William Howard Taft or Theodore Roosevelt.

Mr. President and Senators, responsibility rested upon each one of these men. I do not say it was any more binding upon one of them than another, but I do say that conditions had reached a crisis at the time Woodrow Wilson was elected which made that one issue paramount. It was an issue in 1908; it was a more prominent issue in 1910 in the congressional elections, and on that issue, because the Republican Party had failed, we lost the House of Representatives by 40 majority. By 1912 the increased cost of living, due to the control of the trusts and combinations, had become the one issue. He was elected to solve this problem, and I think he intended to do it. I think for the first three months he was in dead earnest, and then he was confronted with the proposition that if he did not let up a panic would sweep over this country, and there would not be any second term. I heard Republicans representing the big interests say that if there was not a let-up the factories would shut down, the banks would pinch on credit, and the American people would be glad to dig up CANNON and Aldrich inside of four years and have them take charge again.

Mr. President, I think I know the time when it was decided by this administration that they had to let up and go easy.

True, they were investigated a little, speeches were delivered now and then against the high cost of living, a few of the retail dealers were prosecuted; but the President kept his hands off the United States Steel Co. and the other big fellows who threatened his administration. I tell you it is an awful situation for any President to confront. I realize that. I think the man who does this service for the people will have to go into the White House contented with one four-year term and then go down to defeat. He will, unless the American people can be enlightened. If the American people could be fully enlightened, they would know that they must pass through a very trying period to get back to the normal, natural conditions of trade and commerce; that they have got to destroy this great monster which has been artificially created in the last 20 years; and that in doing so they must suffer pain and anguish; that they who are not to blame must pay for the sins of their fathers in high places here and at the other end of the Capitol, and particularly in the White House, for Congress, it should be said, has furnished laws under which the industrial life of the American people could have been made free and kept free. No people are ever industrially enslaved who do not shortly thereafter lose their political freedom as well.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I was very much interested in the statement of the Senator. As I understand him—and I do not want to misinterpret him—he believes that the proper natural play of the law of supply and demand and proper competitive forces in the United States would give us that industrial and economic freedom essential to the growth of civilization and the perpetuity of our form of Government. I understood the position of the Senator to be that he is not in favor of turning over to the Government the private business of the people—the farms, the fields, the factories, the sources of production. He did not say it in those words, but that is the impression that I obtained from the Senator's statement. If that is the Senator's position, I think it is a very sound one economically. I was glad to hear the Senator say—and I wish to see if I understand his position in that respect—that the Government can not by attempting to fix prices effectuate the object so many people are seeking now to bring about; that if we would enforce the laws against trusts and monopolies and allow the free play of the law of supply and demand and the economic forces of the country, we should have nothing to fear with respect to the industrial freedom of the American people or the progress and growth and development of our country. Have I interpreted generally the attitude of the Senator?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, of course, right out of hand on the moment one would hardly be expected, I suppose, to more than suggest remedies to restore to our people their industrial freedom.

I want to see broken, first of all, this artificial power which controls prices and production by agreement and which, in violation of law, is able to dictate the market prices of the raw materials and finished products for practically all of the products of this country. I would break that power.

I would enforce the law firmly and relentlessly as to the wrongdoers.

I would press for the freedom of all business from unlawful control as rapidly as the business of the country could be readjusted to the natural laws of trade.

I do not underestimate the magnitude of the task. The failure of every President to keep faith with the people and enforce the law has aided to intrench lawless monopoly in business throughout the land.

It has so long ruled in business and government that it scoffs at authority.

It has had its way alike with Republican and Democratic administrations.

It has its "rough-neck" daily press to manhandle any troublesome public official. It has its "high-brow" weekly and monthly publications which criticize in choice diction any suggestion of curing existing evils by "putting a few gentlemen in jail" and then vaguely prescribes "a better adjustment of distribution."

But it is high time for us to realize that the public will submit to be no longer juggled with. The Government must soon make its choice. It must destroy private monopoly wherever it exists in this country or monopoly will destroy government.

It will not be possible to restore industrial and commercial freedom at once.

Unrestrained lawless wealth in combination has run amuck for a score of years, until it has so involved our entire industrial and commercial structure that to attempt to effect a radical and immediate cure would endanger the whole structure.

But we must make a beginning. We must make that beginning at once if we would avert disaster.

If I had the power, I would start with the United States Steel Corporation. I would begin there, because iron is the basis of everything in the industrial life of any people on the face of the earth.

It is really staggering to think what iron means. There is not a great architectural structure in the world that would be standing to-morrow morning if iron turned to dust overnight, if iron in all its forms were destroyed between now and sunrise. There would not be a railroad line anywhere, there would not be a wheel turning, there would not be a blacksmith shop standing, there would not be an agricultural implement in existence, if iron in all forms were destroyed. Did you ever stop to think of the extent to which the price of iron and its products controls the price of everything?

So I would begin with iron. I would take the actual valuation of all of the property of the United States Steel Trust. I would ascertain the actual investment in the business. I would not give them credit for a dollar of value which is the result of their monopoly control, but only that which they had actually invested in the business, together with a fair return upon the investment.

Then, Mr. President, taking their actual investment in their manufacturing plant and allowing them a reasonable return on the investment, I would make public a fair and reasonable price list on their manufactures—pig iron, billets, merchantable bars, steel rails, structural shapes—all their manufactures of iron and steel, and would allow a reasonable measure of time for public opinion to enforce an observance of such fair and reasonable price list.

Their failure to adjust the selling prices of their manufactures of steel and iron to the fair-price list published by the Government would invite to more drastic action by the Government in dealing with them.

But, sir, I would proceed in a much more radical way as to their raw material.

I would condemn and take away from them such of their holdings as would be called raw material or natural resources. I would have the Government take back the title to its iron ore and coal and copper and timber and the other natural products. Then I would maintain such an absolute control of the production and the prices of those basic products, either by a strict leasing system or by actual Government operation, or both, that every manufacturer, small as well as large, should have an equal opportunity to get the raw material at the same price. I would do that for the purpose of restoring competitive conditions at the very foundation of all manufactured production.

I would apply the same method to all others who own the great primary products that may be called, in a general way, the resources of nature. I would have the Government hold the title to and maintain the absolute control of all these primary products. I would try, perhaps, operating them under a strong leasing system, under which the Government should control prices.

But I would introduce a limited amount of Government operation in various lines of production, to the end that we might have a measure, a standard, of fair production cost and fair selling price. I would try that as an initial proceeding for the ultimate achievement of industrial freedom.

That may be temporizing, but I would try that to give the old theory of individual initiative its fair chance, and if that experiment failed, then I would go after Government operation of all those basic essentials absolutely; and in the meantime I would not hesitate at all about Government control and ownership of all transportation and all lines of communication—everything of that character.

I expect to stand here and make a fight alone for Government ownership and control of the railroads. I am for Government ownership of railroads and every other public utility—every one—and I propose to show on this floor that where it has ever been given a fair chance in any part of the world it has been successful. I am going to show that the cards were stacked on Government operation here in this country during the war period by those who were interested and that it was not possible for Government operation to make a fair showing.

I do not know whether I have answered the question of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] or not, but I have at least tried to do so frankly.

When you go back to talk to the people in your various States about having turned all the remaining coal and oil and all the phosphate lands over to somebody else under leases and under a system of leases that is not for 99 years, but, I think, when you read the bill, practically in perpetuity—of course, there is a provision here that says that it is for 20 years, with a right of renewal at a reasonable price by the Secretary every 10 years. That right of renewal is absolute unless Congress shall pass some law to stop it, if I understand the terms of the bill, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to be corrected right now if it is not.

Mr. SMOOT. It is entirely in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior as to whether he shall grant the lease or not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not think it is. Well, read it; read it, and let us see. Let us get that settled right here.

Mr. LENROOT. It is.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is what?

Mr. LENROOT. It is subject to the right to have renewal upon such terms as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe or the law may prescribe at that time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is just as I stated, and the chairman of the committee said it was not.

Mr. SMOOT. I say it is in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I say it is not in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior at all. He can prescribe a reasonable rate, and when he prescribes what he says is a reasonable rate—and that is not much protection; the Secretaries of the Interior from the beginning down to the man who is there now have not been overzealous in protecting the public interests against private interests——

Mr. SMOOT. Well, of course, if the Senator takes that ground——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do take that ground, and I take that ground on the history of the matter.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, of course, I have not anything more to say as to the position the Senator takes; but I do say that the Secretary of the Interior has the power under the bill to fix the rates.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I said so myself. I said the Secretary of the Interior could fix the rates. That is the only way the Secretary of the Interior can stop the man who has had a lease from getting his lease for all time.

Mr. SMOOT. Well——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, that is just what I said, and it was not subject to anybody's correction.

Mr. SMOOT. I would not have interrupted the Senator if he had not asked it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I asked the Senator if it was not so, and not if it was not.

Mr. SMOOT. But the Senator did not make the statement the first time as he made it the second time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I did; I made it exactly the same.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, I will show the Senator——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will put it in the RECORD exactly as I said it. I will not change it, but will let it stand. See if I did not.

Now then, I say that this bill that you have before you, while it is called a leasing bill, is a bill that will enable a lessee or his successors or assigns to go on forever leasing that property. The only way it may be prevented is for the Secretary to make the rate prohibitive.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Congress itself may cut it off.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, yes; I have stated that before, and I was going to state that now. You could come to Congress and get a bill through to stop this business. Have you ever tried to do it? How successful do you think you would be in anything of that kind after you once let these people in? You know. The expression on your faces is answer enough, Senators. Let them in once, and it is gone.

As I see it, first, we ought to strike out of the bill the part that applies to the naval reserves and the so-called relief provisions. On that point will the Senate heed the Department of Justice and the Secretary of the Navy or listen to one Phelan, oil examiner, who has heretofore held positions with those who speculate in oil and who build up monopolies to control the prices for oil and light for the American people? This may says that we are lost if we do not pass this bill and confirm all the rights and priorities to the Standard Oil and the other big fellows which these provisions give them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not understand Mr. Phelan's letter in that sense. Mr. Phelan's letter is to the effect, as I understand it, that the Government ought itself to drill wells and extract oil from the reserves or that it will be lost by reason of the openings already existing on the naval reserves. That is as I apprehend the letter. I certainly would not have introduced the letter if it had been to the effect that the Senator now states.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That depends a good deal on how we interpret the bill. This gentleman says:

> I have no hesitancy in saying that the delay in the passage of a general leasing bill has enriched the Standard Oil Co. millions of dollars, and any continued delay will work to the sole advantage of that company.

And he urges that we pass the bill. The Secretary of the Navy does not think we should pass the bill. I should like to know by whom we had better be advised—by Phelan, of the Doherty Co., or the men who are considering the public interest above all things?

I say again, Mr. President, there are the Standard Oil and the Midwest, which runs into Standard Oil, as I am told, and all the other oil representatives who are here now and have been and have maintained for months elaborate offices in this city, rich and powerful above all calculation, and no man can stand up on this floor and suggest any opposition that has been indicated anywhere at any time by those interests to this legislation. It has been seen heretofore. When anything was pending that did not conform to and adjust itself and accord with the interests of these great oil monopolies, particularly the Standard Oil, everybody knew it; it was manifest. Everywhere in the committee rooms and at every stage along the legislative career of a measure it was to be found. It has not been shown here any place. They seem to be heartily in accord with it, perfectly satisfied.

What is it? I have wondered, Mr. President, whether they have not such great interests in these oil reserves and such paper coverings of all the known oil lands that while this is called an oil-leasing bill and the country is led to believe that it is going to open up and allow an opportunity for capital here and there, small as well as large, to go in, it is going to be fooled on it and it is going to find that provisions in the bill, tucked away in two or three different sections, provide such protection to the people who have these paper coverings that all the known oil fields will be covered by it; that the priority rights will shut out anybody else; that the men who are in there are either dummies or the successors of dummies; and that they all pass by in quick succession, one after another, finally to the Standard Oil or to the great company that Great Britain has here in this country seeking to get control of a part of our oil.

This letter from Phelan, presented by the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], warns the Senate that this oil will all be pumped out by the Standard Oil, and that the only way the Government can protect itself is to pass this leasing bill and get in there and do something on its own account. Is that correct?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; not quite. I take it that the letter is a suggestion that we ought to amend the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. He says:

> Unless some legislation is enacted giving the Government the right to secure some royalty oil in these reserves, or unless the Navy itself drills in the territory to which it has a clear title, the Standard Oil Co. and the Southern Pacific Railroad Co., by reason of their widely scattered acreage, and the fact that they have the best selections, means that the reserves will, if not entirely depleted of oil, have the available oil reduced to a minimum.

That makes the suggestion that——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just a moment, please. That makes the suggestion that there are certain alternatives presented to the Senate, but, of course, there will not anything of that kind be done.

That pushes this particular measure along by suggestion.

I wish to read, in contrast with that, the late letter from the Secretary of the Navy. When this bill came up here, as it did two or three days after it was reported, I called up the Navy Department on the telephone to know if the bill was satisfactory. I had confidence enough to believe that if it was satisfactory, since it was a general leasing bill, probably it was all right; and at least I wanted to know their views upon it. I was informed that Secretary Daniels was in Honolulu on that day, that he would only be there for a day, and that it would not be possible to reach him personally by cable.

But I was informed by Secretary Roosevelt, acting in his place, that he knew the situation, and I was told that he would transmit to me a letter stating the position of the Navy Department upon this legislation; that while the letter had been addressed to the chairman of the committee having charge of this legislation in the House of Representatives, it would be applicable to the bill which had been reported from the Senate Committee on Public Lands, which was then pending before the Senate, and about which I was inquiring at that moment over the telephone. I received this letter from Franklin Roosevelt, Assistant Secretary of the Navy:

AUGUST 22, 1919.

> MY DEAR SENATOR: In reply to your telephone inquiry of yesterday relative to the Navy Department's attitude toward the present oil-land leasing bill, I am inclosing a letter that was sent to the chairman of the House Committee on Public Lands outlining the department's view on similar legislation now pending before that committee.
> Sincerely, yours,
> FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

The letter which he inclosed is unsigned, but I understood over the telephone that it was a letter from the Secretary of the Navy addressed to Chairman SINNOTT, of the Public Lands Committee of the House of Representatives. It is as follows:

> MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In response to your inquiry with reference to pending bills relating to the leasing of public lands, I have the honor to state that I do not feel warranted in making any comment or recommendation except with reference to lands set aside as naval reserves. I have heretofore expressed to the Committee on Public Lands my conviction that all naval-reserve lands should be omitted from lensing legislation. I still entertain that opinion, and trust that the committee and Congress will except such lands from any legislation enacted.
> However, if Congress sees fit to legislate in the leasing measure on the naval reserves, I beg to call your attention to the following, known as the Swanson amendment, which the Navy Department is willing to accept in order not to stand in the way of lensing legislation.

Now, mark you, this is not what the Navy Department thinks is for the best interests of the Navy Department and the Government, but, as a compromise, they offer this suggestion:

> That any claimant who, either in person or through his predecessor in interest, entered upon any of the lands embraced within the Executive order of withdrawal dated September 27, 1909, and prior to July 3, 1910, honestly and in good faith for the purpose of prospecting for oil or gas and thereupon commenced discovery work thereon and thereafter prosecuted such work to a discovery of oil or gas—

That is the law—

> shall be entitled to lease from the United States any producing oil or gas well resulting from such work at a royalty of not less than one-eighth, with an area of land sufficient for the operation thereof, but without the right to drill any other or additional well: Provided, That such claimant shall first pay to the United States an amount equal to not less than the value of one-eighth of all the oil and gas already produced from such well: And provided further, That this act shall not apply to any well involved in any suit brought by the United States or in any application for patent, unless within 90 days after the approval of this act the claimant shall relinquish to the United Sttaes all rights claimed by him in such suit or application: And provided further, That all such leases shall be made and the amount to be paid for oil and gas already produced shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior under appropriate rules and regulations.

The Secretary of the Navy says in this letter—I read it with emphasis:

> I have heretofore expressed to the Committee on Public Lands my conviction that all naval reserves should be omitted from lensing legislation. I still entertain that opinion and trust that the committee and Congress will except such lands from any legislation enacted.

Mr. President, that is what the Secretary of the Navy thinks is for the best interests of this Government; that is what he thinks is just to the Government. Why should we not exact justice for the Government? What will we say to the people who sent us here if we have listened to the appeals of these trespassers as against the needs of the Navy?

I put into the RECORD on yesterday a history of at least 1,600 acres of land obtained by the Standard Oil, which relied for its equities and any right that might possibly be claimed upon fraudulent dummy locators who had been paid a paltry $250 each for the use of their names to enable one McMurty to get in and use people in the stockyards of Chicago and in the city of New York, who never heard of the lands and signed the power of attorney under the impression, as some of them stated to the investigator, that they were signing petitions relating to elections. Is the Senate prepared, Mr. President, to go on record here to surrender anything which is of value to our Government in the interest of a great organization that derives its title from frauds of that sort? I hope not.

The Senator from Colorado in his remarks of yesterday dwelt upon the controversy between the Navy Department and the Department of Justice on one side and the Interior Department on the other regarding this oil-land leasing legislation. May I venture the assertion in this respect that when the history of this unusual public-land controversy is written the facts will show that public service of a high character has been rendered by Secretary of the Navy Daniels, and Assistant Secretary Roosevelt, Commanders Landis, Richardson, and Wright, Mr. Payne, Mr. Latham, and others in the Navy Department, and Attorney General Gregory, and the late Assistant Attorney General E. J. Justice, former Assistant Attorneys General Ernest Knaebel, Francis J. Kearful, and other officials of the Department of Justice.

I regret to say that in my opinion the facts will warrant no such encomiums as to certain officials of the Interior Department.

FILIBUSTER A CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] took me severely to task because I participated in a filibuster for the defeat of this legislation and of other legislation in the closing days of the last Congress. In the course of his comments he said:

I affirm that no filibuster ever carried on within these walls was justified or productive of any beneficial result.

Mr. President, I say in answer that a man is as much within his constitutional rights and it is as incumbent upon him to exercise those rights in the conduct of a filibuster to prevent the passage of measures harmful to the public interest as it is for him to exercise any other right accorded to him under the Constitution, which he is sworn to support when he enters the Senate. The Constitution, I believe, plainly recognized the exercise of the right of the minority to prevent the aggressions of the majority when that majority might work harm to the country. I want to put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in this connection some reflections of mine upon this subject.

What is a congressional filibuster? It is an attempt on the part of a minority to prevent the majority from executing its will. It is resorted to by a minority, sometimes a very small minority, to delay or defeat a majority of the House or Senate from voting upon and passing a bill, or perhaps a number of bills, which the minority can not otherwise defeat at the time should such measure come to final vote. Upon its face it appears to be an unjust and unwarranted interference with the rule of the majority in legislation. It is often denounced as undemocratic and revolutionary and a reprehensible interference with the right of a majority to exercise its constitutional power; but in the view of the framers of the Constitution the majority may at times abuse its power. It may become arrogant, tyrannical, reckless, wantonly extravagant, and wasteful of the public revenues; and a majority may even become corrupt in the conduct of the public business. It was, therefore, deemed wise by the framers of the Constitution to provide in that instrument the means by which the majority might be restrained or defeated in its undertakings, at least for the time being. To that end they made it possible for one man to defeat the action of the majority of Congress.

They gave the President the power of the veto. That seems quite an undemocratic thing to do. That was written into the Constitution as a safeguard against the abuse of majority power.

The makers of the Constitution did not stop with that check upon the will of the majority. They provided that one-fifth of those present could at any time—at any time—and as often as they deemed it necessary demand the calling of the roll upon any pending question. That is a powerful weapon for delaying the action of the majority. It can be so used as to defeat the passage of any measure in the closing hours of a session when the time for final adjournment is fixed and certain. That power is given to the minority, written into the Constitution.

The fathers thus deliberately, by constitutional provision, armed a small minority with the power to filibuster. They gave this power the sanction of constitutional authority. These wise men well understood that majorities are not infallible, that they are sometimes misled, that they are sometimes driven by passion to unreasonable extremes, that under the stress of great excitement the very power which a majority possesses might intoxicate and carry it beyond rational limits.

There are times in legislative proceedings, especially near the final adjournment of a session, when something akin to the mob spirit takes possession of the majority, and bills of all kinds—bad bills and good bills and bills partly bad and partly good—are railroaded through without a semblance of intelligent consideration or legislative deliberation, and whoever dares to interpose to prevent a private steal is certain to be denounced for obstructing the public business.

I want now to say just a few words about the filibuster of last March, concerning which I have been criticized by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. He says:

I affirm that no filibuster ever carried on within these walls was justified or productive of any beneficial result.

Of course I know that that is his honest opinion. There are people in this country who do not take that view. There are a considerable number of people in this country who have been in favor of what is known as conservation, who have been willing sometimes that legislation that was to dispose of all of the public domain and make it possible for private interests to secure control of it might be defeated even by a filibuster, and a public service rendered thereby. I have had differences of a political nature with Mr. Gifford Pinchot. I have had no communication with him since 1912.

I have publicly and in permanent form denounced certain things that he did that concerned me personally that I thought were reprehensible. But when that 4th of March had passed by I received this communication from him with regard to the very subject which I am now criticized for—that is, defeating the bill that would have made it possible for all the coal and oil lands to have passed by patent into private hands; a bill that opened the Grand Canyon of the Colorado to coal and oil exploiters. Had the bill passed, railroad lines could have been projected through the Grand Canyon, prospectors could have blasted down the cliffs, reared their dumps, and smeared the face of that great natural monument with the sordid greed that goes with speculative development of that sort. I thank the Lord that it was put within my humble means to be able to defeat by filibuster the legislation that carried those provisions; and Mr. Pinchot, who I know is not popular in sections of the West, because he has pushed this question of conservation, reserving public lands, timber, oil, coal, phosphate, and the like, as an idealist possibly further than practicable limits would warrant, has nevertheless rendered great service—he and those associated with him in the time when he took hold of this great subject, checked for some little time at least the grasping and the greed to these great organizations that years ago would have swept all of this great domain belonging to the people into their treasuries for all time.

PHILADELPHIA, March 12, 1919.

HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your action in defeating in the Senate the coal and oil land bill reported from conference in the last days of the session just closed deserves, and doubtless will receive, the grateful acknowledgment of all friends of conservation.

As president of the National Conservation Association, I desire to assure you of our high appreciation of the service thereby rendered to the whole people of the United States.

In the name of the association, therefore, I take pleasure in thanking you for your courageous and successful fight against this bill when it had progressed so far that to defeat it seemed almost impossible, as well as for your readiness to defeat the water-power bill after the changes made in it, especially by the conference committee, had converted it from a good into an indefensible measure. In this expression of thanks I am sure all those who recognize the magnitude of the public resources at issue, as well as the exceptional difficulty of defending them in this case, will gladly join.

Very respectfully,

GIFFORD PINCHOT.

I want to say just a word about the filibuster that was conducted at that time as it related to other measures. A round billion of dollars was saved to the American people by the filibuster that defeated the appropriation bills at the close of the session that ended March 4 last. That, in a sentence, is what this special session of Congress has developed thus far. That fact alone is ample justification for the course taken by the Senators who would not permit the appropriation bills to be jammed through without proper consideration, debate, and amendment at the session which ended March 4. These men, especially the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], and myself, were denounced by friends of the administration as a handful of willful obstructors who, to force the President to call an extra session, would not permit the great majority to railroad the bills through Congress. These men insisted that the Congress should be called in special session and meet immediately after March 4. They said if that were done, there would then be time to properly consider the supply bills and that a great saving would result to the taxpayers of the United States.

Now that the appropriation bills have been passed, these Senators can point to the record as a complete justification of their course. That record is summarized in the following table, which shows the amount of the bills as it was proposed to rush them through by March 4 as compared with the amount appropriated for the same purposes at the present extra session. Mr. President, I will insert, without reading, in my remarks when printed, a comparative table showing the amount of the appropriations in the bills which were pending and which were defeated by the filibuster that I helped to conduct, and in another column the amount appropriated for the same purposes in the same bills at this session of Congress which were passed in substitution for the bills which were defeated by the filibuster, together with the totals.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that will be done.

The table referred to is as follows:

Appropriation bills.	Amount as of March 4.	Amounts as passed in Sixty-sixth Congress.
Third deficiency	$842,096,813	$24,305,929
Deficiency for Federal Railroad Administration		750,000,000
Indian	15,430,000	11,131,397
Agricultural	31,673,022	33,899,761
Naval	824,709,521	616,096,838
Army	1,238,282,000	72,324,877
Sundry civil	850,513,210	605,160,207
District of Columbia	14,446,364	15,364,421
	3,817,151,030	2,824,283,432
Saving to people	992,867,598

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It will be shown by the table that a total saving of $1,000,000,000 in round numbers was made possible by defeating the bills which were presented at that time, which forced them to go over to the extra session and receive careful consideration from the committees, come before the House and the Senate for ample discussion and considered amendments.

The greatest reductions were made in the appropriations for the Army and the Navy. Upon these two items there was a saving of $571,902,521. Also it is worthy of notice that the big Navy program was cut down, and the Army will be 225,000 in round numbers instead of 500,000 that was proposed by the Army bill in March. The sundry civil bill as it became a law carried $245,513,210 less than did the same measure as it was pending when the gavel fell on March 4. This is the bill that carries the supplies for all the great departments of the Government.

Great as have been the reductions made in these bills, there is no doubt that further savings could have been made had the extra session been called immediately after March 4. The responsibility for not doing so rests upon the President, and upon him alone. He alone had the power to call the Congress together.

The Congress was convened to meet May 19. From that time until July 1, the beginning of the fiscal year, the committees having charge of the appropriation bills worked day and night. Those committees within that time examined as best they could the estimates furnished by the departments. It was not possible to make a thorough inquiry into the estimates such as would have been made if the President had called the extra session early in March. However, though it was hasty and incomplete, this investigation convinced the committees that these big supply bills could be cut without injury to the public service and with a great saving to the taxpayers. Because it was necessary to pass the bills before July 1, some reductions were doubtless larger than should have been made in some instances, and other estimates carried in the bills could have been wholly eliminated or the amount appropriated cut far below the sums carried in the bills. However, from the standpoint of saving money to the taxpayers, this special session has served its purpose. If the President had called the Congress to meet earlier, a greater saving could have been made, and made with a wiser and more discriminating judgment. But it was a serviceable and effective filibuster. A billion dollars was saved.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] said some things in his criticism of me yesterday in connection with the filibuster to which I do not care to pay attention. He said one thing which I might mention in passing. He said it on his feet, and, I suppose, without any reflection, as many things are said by all of us here in debate. He said that not one of the men who had participated in the filibuster and participated in the prevention of the passage of those bills was present, according to his recollection, and participated in the discussion on those bills when they were reconsidered and came before the Senate at the extra session. Of course, even if that were true, it would not be any justification for criticism, because the bills were wholly different. They eliminated a billion dollars. There would have been a lot of time taken up in debate if the debate had been possible in the closing days of the last session, if we had taken up the Army bill or the Navy bill or the big appropriation bills for the purpose of expanding the Navy upon the plan of giving us the biggest Navy in the world and imposing a standing Army of 500,000 men upon the people of this country. There would have been some debate, and justifiedly. There was not the reason for that in the bills as they were presented at the extra session. I know that the other Senators participated in the defeat of those bills because they were brought in here at an hour when they could not be considered justly and fairly. There was no excuse or justification for their being brought in as they were, and it is time for the great Appropriations Committees to understand that they can not report legislation involving billions of dollars, changing in some respects the whole policy of government, and expect to put them through without debate, and to justify driving them because there is no time, and arraigning the patriotism and loyalty of Senators here because they will not sit quietly in their seats and see such legislation passed in a few minutes.

If committees expect to find an easy road for legislation of that great importance in the closing hours of a congressional session or of the life of a Congress, they are liable to meet with discourtesy and they ought to meet with discourtesy. There is no justification for it. It is not democracy. This procedure does not give anybody a chance to be heard or represented. It denies to every State that does not happen to be represented on the conference or on the committee that reports the legislation any chance to speak or to be heard or to be represented.

I for one shall exercise my constitutional rights and demand a hearing as long as I am here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the request seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I had not intended to speak at any length upon this bill; but I feel that it is my duty to devote some time to it, in view of some of the things that have been said during the course of the debate.

First, I wish to refer to a statement made in the opening of the debate by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], whom I, with every other Senator, respect and esteem. I was amazed at the statement he made, charging conservationists and Gifford Pinchot and others with tying up the mineral resources of the West, to the very great detriment of the people of the West.

Mr. President, if it had not been for Gifford Pinchot and Theodore Roosevelt, if it had not been for these conservationists, who are sneered at by some of the people of the West, these very lands that are now the subject matter of this bill would have been in private ownership and under the control of monopoly.

If it had not been for these men, Mr. President, the forests of the West would have gone into private ownership and private monopoly as the forests of the East and the Middle West went into private ownership and private monopoly. In time to come, Mr. President, monuments will be erected in the West by future generations to men like Pinchot, when those who are so severely criticizing them will be forgotten. So much for that.

Although I am as anxious as anyone can be to conclude the consideration of this bill as early as possible, I think it entirely proper to go into a little of the history of this bill.

It will be remembered that on September 27, 1909, something over 3,000,000 acres of public land containing oil, or supposed to contain oil, were withdrawn from all forms of entry. It was recognized by every official of the Government that that withdrawal would work a very great hardship upon many innocent people; but, notwithstanding that hardship, the public interest being paramount, they proceeded and did withdraw, under the order of President Taft, this large amount of land.

With reference to that withdrawal I want to quote now from Dr. George Otis Smith. No one will say that he has not at all times been alive to the public interest, and in all legislation that has been proposed he has had in mind only the public welfare.

First, let me call attention to what the withdrawal really was. It was designated—

TEMPORARY PETROLEUM WITHDRAWAL NO. 5.

In aid of proposed legislation affecting the use and disposition of the petroleum deposits on the public domain, all public lands in the accompanying lists are hereby temporarily withdrawn from all forms of location, settlement, selection, filing, entry, or disposal under the mineral or nonmineral public-land laws. All locations or claims existing and valid on this date may proceed to entry in the usual manner after field investigation and examination.

Speaking of this withdrawal, the Geological Survey states:

That this was a severe measure no one will attempt to deny. Without forewarning and without precedent, it knocked the breath for the moment from the California oil industry. Some of the orders promulgated since have been almost as severe although not so widespread in their effect. These things the officers responsible for them realize. The geologists who recommend or prepare withdrawal orders are not ignorant or careless of the hardships which they may cause. Many of them western men, personally familiar with the field under consideration, knowing its people, knowing the sacrifices they may have made, the risks they may have incurred, the hopes they may entertain of striking oil, these geologists regret keenly that the development of the West may by their action be in some measure retarded. Yet without hesitation or exception they recommend that the interests of the public be made paramount.

The temporary character of the withdrawals can not be too strongly emphasized. There is no thought of tying up permanently the oil deposits on the public domain. As soon as there are satisfactory laws for the development of these deposits the withdrawals should be revoked, but in the meantime it seems certain that withdrawals will continue to be made, not as permanent institutions but as temporary expedients, to meet an abnormal condition, during a period when the needs of the situation have far outrun the adequacy of the law.

Mr. President, following this withdrawal there was, as has been developed in all of the hearings that have been had—and they have been many—consternation upon the part of all who were upon the public domain affected by this withdrawal, and that, too, irrespective of whether or not they had fully complied with the law up to the point of withdawal. Those who had complied in every particular with the placer-mining law on September 27, 1909, were all in doubt as to what their rights were and whether or not the withdrawal order had deprived them of the rights that existed up to that time, that doubt arising over the language of the exception to the withdrawal order, which reads:

All locations or claims existing and valid on this date may proceed to entry in the usual manner after field investigation and examination.

At that time, Mr. President, the decisions of the courts and the decisions of the Department of the Interior had been that there could be no valid locations or claims unless there had been a discovery; and if that was to be the law applied to this withdrawal order every one of these claimants, although fully complying with the law up to the 27th of September, 1909, was deprived of any rights of any kind if discovery was necessary in order to get the benefit of the exception; and it was very clear that if discovery was necessary there were no benefits to the claimants by the exception, because, under the laws of the United States, if discovery had been made the withdrawal could not affect them, because upon discovery the claimants had secured a vested right.

That, however, was the situation. Many of the claimants, believing that they had not been protected at all, ceased work for a time upon their claims, and finally, in 1910, in the following spring, large delegations came to Washington and asked for protection, which resulted in the passage of what is known as the Pickett Act, expressly authorizing withdrawals and expressly saving the rights of bona fide occupants upon lands at the time of withdrawal who thereafter with due diligence pursued work to the discovery of oil.

It is true that between the time of September 27, 1909, and this legislative withdrawal of June, 1910, put into effect by President Taft on July 2, 1910, there were many eminent lawyers who advised that the withdrawal was invalid, among them Judge Lindsay, one of the leading mining authorities in the country. The district court of California held that the order was invalid, but the Department of Justice and the Interior Department insisted that it was within the province of the President to withdraw these lands; and, as has been stated, a decision was finally rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States sustaining that withdrawal. But, Mr. President, those who were upon the lands on September 27, 1909, diligently prosecuting work under the law and continued upon them, were not fraudulent claimants because they continued after September 27, 1909, because, in 1915, six years after the withdrawal, against the contention of the Department of Justice, the circuit court of appeals held—and I read into the RECORD the other day an excerpt from it—that the exception in the Taft withdrawal of September 27, 1909, fully protected every claimant who was a bona fide occupant on his claim on September 27, 1909, diligently at work seeking discovery of oil, and since that time the Department of Justice has accepted that construction of the Taft withdrawal, and I have their acceptance here upon the table. So that in that instance the Department of Justice, upon a very important feature of the law with respect to this matter, has reversed itself or, rather, has accepted the decision of the circuit court of appeals.

Now, as to the character of many of these men—and I am not speaking now of anyone who went upon these lands fraudulently or dishonestly or attempted in any way to secure a title from the Government through fraud.

What have the courts said about this class of claimants?

I hold in my hand the case of United States against Midway Northern Oil Co. et al., volume 232, Federal Reporter. I read from page 632. The decision was rendered by Judge Bean, sitting in the district court of California. Judge Bean is from Oregon, judge of the district court there, and one of the ablest and most honorable lawyers in the West.

The opinion states:

Now, in four of the cases—

And I will say preliminarily that the parties in this case were upon the land September 27, 1909, but had done nothing other than to make a paper location. They were not on September 27, 1909, diligently prosecuting the work looking to discovery, and of course for that reason the court very properly held that they were not entitled to patent, because at the time of the withdrawal they were not complying with the law.

The opinion goes on to say:

Now, in four of the cases the parties under whom the operating companies entered claimed a right to the possession of the property involved and to extract the oil therefrom because of attempted locations made prior to the withdrawal order or under contracts with such locators. In case No. A–30 the land in controversy was—at the date of the first withdrawal order, covered by a homestead entry, but as the adjoining lands were rapidly being developed as mineral the entryman concluded that he could not sustain his title and therefore permitted the operating defendants to enter into possession and prospect for oil. At the time of the withdrawal order, or soon thereafter, the area in the immediate vicinity of the properties in controversy was being rapidly developed as oil-producing property. It was therefore necessary for the claimants, if they were to protect their rights, if they had any, to take immediate steps to develop the property claimed by them in order to prevent its occupation by others or the oil under it from being drawn off and exhausted by wells on adjoining land.

And I will say this is not upon the naval reserves, but entirely outside—

They thereupon, acting as prudent and careful men, consulted counsel learned in the law and were advised that since Congress is vested by the Constitution with power to dispose of the public land (art. 4, sec. 3), and since it had declared by statute that valuable mineral deposits, including petroleum, in land belonging to the United States are free and open to exploration and purchase, and the land in which they are situate to occupation and purchase (R. S., secs. 2319–2329; act Feb. 11, 1897, c. 216, 29 Stat. 526; Comp. St. 1913, sec. 4635), the Executive was without authority to suspend the acts of Congress, or withdraw the lands from the operative effect thereof, and therefore the withdrawal order was invalid, and if they proceeded to a discovery of oil they would acquire a right to the property and its contents.

Remember, Mr. President, here is one of the claimants who would be entitled to a preferential lease under this bill.

Acting on this advice, honestly and in good faith, without any intention of wronging the Government, they developed the properties, expending large sums of money in so doing, the aggregate in the six cases in question amounting to more than $1,000,000. By their labor and expenditures they have demonstrated the mineral character of the lands and increased their market value from $2 or $3 an acre to $2,000 or $2,500 an acre. What was before a barren, arid waste is now demonstrated valuable mining properties, with numerous oil-producing wells thereon, and that through the efforts and expenditures of the defendants. The Government agents and officers charged with the disposition of the public lands knew of the possession and development of the properties and made no objection thereto, and while this does not stop the Government from now asserting title or right to the possession (Pine River Logging Co. v. U. S., 186 U. S. 279, 22 Sup. Ct. 920, 46 L. Ed. 1164), it should not be overlooked by a court of equity in considering the character of the defendants' possession, or the damages which they should be required to pay.

It is true the defendants, as laymen, are presumed to have known the law, and that the withdrawal order was valid, although many of the leading members of the California bar and 5 of the 10 Federal judges called upon to consider the question judicially apparently did not, and even the Executive himself was in doubt as to his authority to make the order. The maxim that every man knows the law applies to defendants, but there is a marked difference between those who recklessly, or with actual intent to rob others, trespass upon their property, and those who, acting on the advice of counsel, trespass by mistake, with no evil purpose but with an honest belief that they have a right to do so. "One who acts in good faith, upon the erroneous advice of reputable counsel upon questions of legal right concerning which a layman could hardly have actual knowledge, is not chargeable with bad faith, or with a willful intent to commit a wrongful act because his counsel was mistaken in his view of the law." (U. S. v. Homestake Mining Co., 117 Fed. 481, 54 C. C. A. 303; U. S. v. St. Anthony R. R. Co., 192 U. S. 524, 24 Sup. Ct. 333, 48 L. Ed. 548; U. S. v. Mullan Fuel Co. (D. C.) 118 Fed. 663.) The defendants were not willful looters of the public domain, nor reckless trespassers thereon. They acted on the advice of reputable counsel, expended their money and labor in good faith, relying upon a law of the United States and in the honest belief that they were within their rights.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask from what case the Senator is reading?

Mr. LENROOT. I am reading from the case of United States v. Midway Northern Oil Co. (232 Fed., 619).

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the question of withdrawal was up before the Committee on Public Lands when I was chairman of that committee. I prepared a report on it, holding that the Government had the right, and had always had it from the inception of our public-land system, to withdraw lands from sale and entry. The Supreme Court in that very case cited my report and decided it according to the principles laid down in my report. So these men were not in entire ignorance. They may have considered my report as that of a hayseed lawyer, but it was there and it was indorsed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. LENROOT. I have already stated that was the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and this very decision excludes them and denies them any title because of that very contention. I stated that. There is no doubt about it.

I am only quoting what I have read from this decision, so as to get before the Senate the opinion of the court that these men were not fraudulent claimants, but nevertheless, although they had expended $1,000,000 in good faith, as the court said, under the amendment that is now proposed and upon which the Senate is called to vote, the Government will take their wells upon which they have expended $1,000,000 and advertise for sale and sell or lease those wells to the highest bidder. Under the provisions of section 18, which are sought to be stricken out, these men will simply get a preference right to lease this property if they have not been guilty of any fraud or had knowledge of any fraud, and they will be permitted to secure a lease of the property at a royalty of not less than one-eighth nor more than 25 per cent.

Another case I have here—but I am not going to take the time to run through many of them—is that of the Obispo Mining Co., where both the court and the Secretary of the Interior rejected their application for patent. It was a case where Gov. Thorne, of Kentucky, with some associates, expended some $20,000 fruitlessly before the withdrawal upon 40 acres of land that were afterwards included within the withdrawal. They put down one hole 500 feet, and it went crooked and they abandoned it. They put down another, and that went crooked and they abandoned it. By that time their money had run out. They stopped work on August 5, 1909. The withdrawal came in less than 30 days. They had no money. No one was disputing their possession. They had carried on the work in the utmost good faith. Finally they got an opportunity to make an arrangement with another company, I believe upon a leasing proposition, and that company went on to discovery and discovered oil, but there having been a cessation of work between August 5, 1909, and September 27, 1909, the Secretary held, and very properly held, that they were not diligent in the prosecution of seeking discovery on the date of withdrawal and rejected their application for patent. The court confirmed the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior. In that case, on 40 acres of land where they had expended $20,000 before there was any withdrawal, by the amendment, if adopted, we will take the expenditure of those men, made in the utmost good faith, and lease these wells, upon which the Government has not expended a penny, to some one else, while under our section 18 those men will be entitled, if they have not been guilty of any fraud, and there is not a word in any of the opinions suggesting it, to a preferential lease upon that 40 acres of land at a royalty of not less than one-eighth nor more than 25 per cent. That is the class of cases generally that come within section 18 that it is sought to have stricken out.

To go back a little, in 1914, early in the year, a bill was prepared, upon which all subsequent bills have been modeled, for the leasing of withdrawn oil lands. The first bill that was prepared was a leasing bill without reference to any equity that any of these claimants might have. At that time I was a Member of the House and a member of the Committee on the Public Lands of that body. It is true that we were besieged by men from California, and from Wyoming as well, insisting that if we should pass the bill in that form, in view of the doubts concerning the withdrawal order, in view of the uncertain state of the law as to what constituted diligent work seeking discovery, the Government would take all of the property, regardless of any equity, and lease it to some one else. It is true that many of those men asked the House Committee on the Public Lands to so modify the placer-mining law as to give them title to a large portion of those lands; but I wish to say at this point that at that time I, and the then chairman of the committee, Mr. FERRIS, took the position we have ever since maintained, that we would not, if we could prevent, permit any amendment of the mining laws that would give a patent to a single one of those claimants if he was not entitled to it under the law as it then existed; but we said we were perfectly willing, in so far as these claimants have acted honestly and in good faith and without fraud, to give them a preference right to secure a lease for these lands that the bill says shall be leased to somebody anyway. That position I have ever since maintained and I maintain to-day.

It is true that the Senate did, time after time, pass bills denominated "leasing bills," but which did let down the bars for these claimants and permit them to secure patent for many of these claims. The House has consistently and always declined to consider any modification whatever in the present placer-mining law, and has maintained its position that whatever relief is to be given to these claimants shall be given only through preferential leases. I may be permitted to say that I never observed that there was any great contest in the Senate except on the last bill over the passage of these bills.

Mr. President, criticism has been made of this bill. I wish some Senator would take the time at his convenience to compare the bill that is before the Senate now with any other bill that has ever been before the Senate on this subject.

I said that these claimants came before us, and they did, in large numbers. It has been stated that there has never been a hearing upon this bill. There has not. I joined with other members of the committee in the opinion that there was no necessity for additional hearings upon the bill. I have sat for weeks, and it will total into months, hearing testimony in the other body upon this very subject. Those hearings comprise volumes upon volumes of testimony. Last year—only last year—the House Committee on Public Lands held additional hearings. I hold the volume in my hand. It comprises 1,292 pages, and much of that testimony was not upon the question of any relief to claimants to oil land but was upon the charge that the bill then pending was in the interest of the Standard Oil Co.

Senators may remember that in December of 1917 and January of last year whole pages of advertising were to be found in the Washington papers here charging that those leasing bills were in the interest of the Standard Oil Co. When we came to the question of the consideration of that bill, although there were many members of the House committee who felt that there was no occasion for further hearings, I insisted that we should hold hearings and demand that the men who were making those charges should come before the committee and, if they were able, prove that any portion of the bill at that time pending was designedly or otherwise in the interest of the Standard Oil Co.; and if so, that it was our duty as a committee to correct it. We did that. There were two gentlemen—a Mr. Rice and a Mr. Ball—who acknowledged themselves responsible for those advertisements and acknowledged that those advertisements charging that those bills were in the interest of the Standard Oil Co. were paid for with the money of the Roxanna Oil Co., which was a corporation owned by the Royal Dutch Shell Co., the same English and Dutch interests that now own the Shell Co. of California and that are still operating the Roxanna Oil Co.

The chairman of that committee with my assistance prepared a letter to the Secretary of the Interior asking for the most thorough investigation and report on every large company operating in every field in the United States, and, so far as they could secure it, of the affiliations any company might have with the Standard Oil Co. That report was made to us. I shall not take the time to go into it at length. It may be found in the hearings before the Committee on Public Lands in 1918, volume 214.

It was charged that the Midwest Oil Co., concerning which we have heard much here during this debate, was a Standard Oil Co. subsidiary. The committee determined to ascertain the facts to the fullest extent possible concerning that matter. We had before us one of the directors of that company, Mr. Karl C. Schuyler, of Denver, Colo. I want to read what he said, or a portion of it:

> I appear here for the presentation of matters that are of interest in connection with this bill in behalf of the Midwest Oil Co., an Arizona company, of which I am a director but not an attorney; the other directors are Mr. L. L. Aitken, president; Mr. W. F. Schuyler, Mr. T. S. Dines, and Mr. Orville L. Dines. That is a company which under the provisions of section 16 of the Senate bill should be entitled to relief to the extent of 970 acres, approximately, in the Salt Creek oil field, Wyoming. That company has instructed me to read the following telegram, which is signed by its president, Mr. L. L. Aitken, and its secretary, Mr. J. L. Warren:
> DENVER, COLO., February 16, 1918.
> KARL C. SCHUYLER,
> New Willard Hotel, Washington, D. C.:
> In order to correct any possible misunderstanding as to the Midwest Oil Co. will you please advise the Public Lands Committee of the House that the company is owned by 3,800 shareholders. That so far as officers of the corporation know none of its capital stock is owned by any Standard Oil Co., subsidiary, or officer of any such companies. Midwest Oil Co. was pioneer of oil development in the State of Wyoming, building the first successful pipe line and refinery in that State. The point we would like to have you make clear to the committee is that the Midwest Oil Co. is a publicly owned company that is operating patented lands and is a claimant to other lands now in process of adjudication in Salt Creek field, and that it is not any part of any combination to control production, output, or prices.

> J. L. WARREN, Secretary.

There was a Midwest Refining Co. as well as a Midwest Oil Co., and the committee went into an investigation of that question. It is all found in the hearings. Finally the committee found that there was a man by the name of William John Hanna, of Toronto, Canada, who had an interest, a small interest, in this company. At that time Hanna was also a director of the Imperial Oil Co. (Ltd.), which we understood was a Standard Oil Co.

This affidavit was finally furnished us:

FEBRUARY 9, 1918.

STATE OF NEW YORK,
County of New York, ss:

I, William John Hanna, of the city of Toronto, in the Province of Ontario, in the Dominion of Canada, barrister at law, being first duly sworn, say:

1. I am a director of and counsel for the Imperial Oil Co. (Ltd.), a company incorporated under the laws of the Dominion of Canada, and am now and for many years past have been thoroughly familiar with its financial affairs and property holdings.

2. That the said company does not now own and never has owned, nor has any person or persons or company owned, acquired, or held, or now own or hold for said company as trustee or otherwise, directly or indirectly, any stock whatever in or of the Midwest Refining Co.

3. That the investment made by certain Canadians in a relatively minor portion of the total capital stock of the said Midwest Refining Co. was to my certain knowledge a strictly personal investment of said gentlemen for their own personal account and not for the benefit of any corporation whatsoever, directly or indirectly.

W. J. HANNA.

Sworn to before me this 9th day of February, 1918.

CHARLES L. FROST,
Notary Public.

We shall find pages and pages of testimony, Mr. President, where the House Committee on Public Lands sought to get all of the facts with reference to the ownership or control upon the part of the Standard Oil Co. regarding these oil fields. In oil fields in the State of California the Secretary of the Interior reported that out of a production of 75,000,000 barrels of oil in 1917 the Sandard Oil Co. produced 18,000,000 of those 75,000,000.

Before concluding the matter, Mr. President, we were anxious to learn what was the motive of this English company in making the charge that the bills were in the interest of the Standard Oil Co., and when we finally got down to bedrock they said that these bills were in the interest of the Standard Oil Co. because the acreage permitted by the bill to a single corporation was so small that no competitor of the Standard Oil Co. could come in and get a sufficient acreage. Their entire objection to the bill was that the leases were all far too small an acreage. They urged our committee to permit the lease of 2,560 acres in proven fields and 4,000 outside. It developed that it was an effort upon the part of this English company to secure control of vast areas of these oil lands. The committee in the other House in every bill that was passed provided for a leasing system with a patent to one-fourth of the prospecting permit as a reward to the prospector. Every one of their bills also contained what was known as a relief section, giving to claimants who were bona fide, in good faith, free from fraud, a preferential right to lease their claims.

The Senate had always been insisting on letting down the bars further than the House was willing to go. So in 1915, 1916, 1917, and 1918 there was no legislation upon this subject, because the House believed and the Committee on Public Lands of the House believed that the public interest was not sufficiently protected by the bills the Senate was willing to accept.

I desire, however, to say right here, Mr. President, that the bill now pending before the Senate, and which is being so much criticized, goes further in the protection of the public interest than has any bill that has ever been proposed upon this subject in either the House or the Senate. I wish now to take just a little time in demonstrating that. In the first place, every bill up to this one permitted two modes of acquiring coal lands—one through purchase and the other through lease. For the first time, this bill repeals the coal-land law permitting purchase. The other bills permitted patents to one-fourth of the area of the prospecting permit for oil; this bill does not. It is a straight leasing bill.

For a long time I have been in favor of a straight leasing bill and of excluding patents, for two reasons: One, whenever the Government parts with title through patent the Government loses all control over the property; the Government's power with reference to monopoly or competition then must be exercised not as a proprietor but through its sovereignty. Under our dual form of government, as we all realize, there are many things we can not do under our sovereign power because of the limitations of the Constitution. We can, however, make conditions in a lease that will bind the lessee, which if he were a patentee we could not control. So this being a leasing bill for all of the oil lands, the provisions we have in the bill against monopoly and looking toward competition remain so long as there is a barrel of oil left in the land.

Then, there is another economic reason why there should be only one system. With a leasing bill the Government can control the operation of the wells; it can provide and will provide that an oil well shall be protected from water. A single well in a field if it is not properly protected against water coming in from the water levels can practically destroy 100 other wells; but by a leasing system the whole field can be protected, where otherwise it could not be.

Then, every one of the other bills which we have had have provided for prospecting permits within producing fields as well as outside of them. For the first time in a leasing bill we do not permit any prospecting permits within a producing field anywhere. We permit prospecting permits only in what is known in the parlance of the oil men as "wildcat territory"; and there, instead of giving the discoverer a patent, we give him, first, a lease under a 5 per cent royalty to one-fourth of the area of his prospecting permit. The remainder, or the three-fourths, we give him a preferential right to lease at a minimum royalty of one-eighth and a maximum of 25 per cent. The moment, however, that a man makes a discovery of oil in new territory no other prospecting permit can be issued in that field or territory; the leases must be put up to the highest bidder. Those are some of the main distinctions and main improvements in this bill over other bills which have been proposed.

Now, a word, again coming back to the subject, with reference to any interest that the Standard Oil Co. might have in the provisions of this bill. It is true that under the relief section the Standard Oil Co. may get a preferential lease for some of its holdings; but it may not. That will depend entirely upon whether the Standard Oil Co. believes that it can sustain its right to a patent. If it does not believe that, and is in good faith, it would have a preferential right to a lease as provided by the bill. But let us see whether this bill in the form in which it is reported is or is not in the interests of the Standard Oil Co.

In the first place, 640 acres is the largest area that is permitted to be leased in a proven field, except under the relief sections, which allow the leasing of 3,200 acres. Under a prospecting permit in wildcat territory the largest area that can be leased is 2,560 acres. Provision is made that no more than one lease can be issued to a claimant within the same geologic structure, and not more than three leases within a single State. Provision is also made that if a man is interested as a stockholder or otherwise in any leases under this proposed act the aggregate of which would exceed the amount permitted in the bill, that interest shall be forfeited to the United States by appropriate action in the Federal courts. If anyone can suggest a provision that will limit holdings any more than the provisions of this bill do in that respect, so as to prevent the Standard Oil Co. or any other corporation from getting large areas, I shall be very glad to vote for it; but I wish to call attention, Mr. President, to the fact that there has been no such amendment proposed thus far, from which I gather that all Senators are convinced that the committee, in its efforts to limit these holdings, has done the very best that can be done.

We next come to the provision allowing producers of oil to combine their interests for the purpose of building refineries. Will anyone maintain that that is a provision in the interest of the Standard Oil Co.? Independent producers of oil appeared before our committee last year and asked for that provision, and stated that if they could make such combinations they could build refineries of their own, and that they would be afforded an opportunity to exist, instead of being at the mercy of the Standard Oil Co.—which is represented by the Ohio Oil Co. in Wyoming—or the Midwest Co., the only two companies that had refineries in Wyoming at that time. They said that if the independent producers were permitted to combine their holdings for the purpose of raising money to build refineries they could enter into competition with those two great corporations, and that they would not be at their mercy in the price paid for crude oil. That was the reason that provision was put in the bill, so that there might be opportunity for competition with the Standard Oil Co. in the refining of oil.

Then, we come to another provision suggested by Mr. Shwartz, who represents the independent producers in Wyoming. I refer to that portion of the bill which provides that unless the Government desires the royalty oil for its own use it shall be sold to the highest bidder. The independent producers say that these two great companies engage in the practice of making contracts depriving the independent refineries of any opportunity to get a supply of oil. This provision was put in in the interest of the independent refineries, so that they have a chance to bid for royalty oil in competition with the Standard Oil Co. and the Midwest Refining Co. So much for the provisions of the bill as favoring the Standard Oil Co.

Mr. President, I wish to hurry on and get through as quickly as possible, but I desire to come to a very brief discussion of the naval reserves. I doubt whether there are many Senators who understand the situation with reference to the naval reserves. There were 30,000 acres withdrawn in naval reserve No. 2. The very natural supposition upon the part of anyone when he hears about a naval reserve is that it is made up of a compact body of Government land constituting a naval reserve. That is not true. Out of this 30,000 acres of land within the outer boundaries of this reserve 15,000 acres have been patented to the Southern Pacific Railroad. The last patent was issued to the Southern Pacific some seven years before the first discovery of oil on naval reserve No. 2.

Actions were commenced against the Southern Pacific to cancel all the patents in all of the oil territory on the ground of fraud, the Government charging that at the time the Southern Pacific made its selection they knew, or should have known, that the land was mineral in character. I may say in passing that their right to the selection came through a land grant under which they were entitled to every odd-numbered section within the primary limits and entitled to make selection within the indemnity limit for all lands that they may have lost in the primary limits. The first case tried had reference to reserve No. 1, where the patents of the Southern Pacific had been issued only a short time before the discovery of oil in the vicinity of the reserve. The lower court held in favor of the Government; it held that in making that selection the agents of the Southern Pacific knew or had reason to know that these lands were of mineral character, and, therefore, were not subject to selection.

The fact was that at that time the Associated Oil Co., which is connected with the Southern Pacific Railroad Co., had drilled one or two wells in naval reserve No. 1, and it was shown upon the trial that discovery of oil had actually been made; but one of the badges of fraud that was relied upon was that they capped those wells and concealed the discovery.

As I said, the lower court held in favor of the Government. The circuit court of appeals reversed the lower court, and confirmed title to these lands in naval reserve No. 1 in the Southern Pacific Co. The Government appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States. The case was argued last winter, and I was very sorry indeed that the court took its summer recess before handing down a decision in that very important case, because upon the result of that case will depend very largely whether we will have an adequate naval reserve in naval reserve No. 1, because it so happens that in naval reserve No. 1 the Standard Oil Co. has under private ownership acquired through State land titles something like a section and a half, and upon one of those sections within the last six months the Standard Oil Co. has drilled wells and discovered oil, and the best estimate upon that one section in the heart of naval reserve No. 1 is that that section alone will produce 20,000,000 barrels of oil; and if the balance of the reserve shall hold out as indicated by this one section, naval reserve No. 1, including the Southern Pacific land, has about 400,000,000 barrels of oil.

I say I am very sorry that we did not have the decision of the Supreme Court in that case, because if the Government should win that case it is my intention to introduce a bill for the condemnation of this section and a half of the Standard Oil Co.'s property, so that the Standard Oil Co. will not be permitted to drain the oil of the Government in that naval reserve by reason of its own wells upon the boundaries of its properties; but according to the last decision the Government has lost that case.

With reference to the Southern Pacific lands in naval reserve No. 2, the chances, as stated to me by officers of the Department of Justice with whom I have discussed it many times, were much less favorable to the Government than in naval reserve No. 1; but last week the district court sitting at Los Angeles rendered a decision against the Government in regard to the Southern Pacific lands in No. 2, and the Government's chances of ever recovering any of the lands in naval reserve No. 2 are very small indeed.

That becomes important in this respect, Mr. President: In the case of these lands in naval reserve No. 2, as in No. 1, the Southern Pacific having every odd-numbered section, the Southern Pacific lands and the unpatented lands form a checkerboard. You might illustrate the Southern Pacific lands with the red on the checkerboard and the unpatented and private lands as the black.

Now, with reference to the possibility of maintaining a naval reserve in No. 2, where there are only about 7,000 acres out of the 30,000 that could in any possible way be affected by this bill, what would be the result if we should attempt to shut down the wells that are now producing on naval reserve No. 2? I will tell you, Mr. President. We will be making a gift to the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. of the oil that is now being produced from many of the wells upon those unpatented lands.

On these lands, very naturally, the Southern Pacific Co. have put down oil wells at the outer boundaries of their lands. The claimant of public lands puts in his wells at the outer boundary of his claim for two reasons—first, to prevent the other fellow from draining his oil; second, if the other fellow is not active, he will get a little of the oil of the other fellow. So that in visiting any of these oil fields you can look down a lane for a long distance and see derricks on either side, with 300 feet between them, upon the boundaries, with the wells of one owner upon the one side and the wells of the other owner upon the other side. Shutting down the wells of either one does not conserve for the owner, whoever it may be, whether it is the Government or the private individual. If you shut down the wells upon one side of a line, you are giving the oil to the man who has the wells upon the other side of the line. The testimony before both committees has been that this oil will drain as much as 500 feet. In 640 acres that would leave conserved in the ground about 420 acres. In 160 acres, with oil draining 500 feet, with wells surrounding the 160 acres, you could save the oil in the ground for about 60 acres and no more.

That is the situation with reference to these naval reserves. I am very frank to say that I do not believe it is possible for the Government, irrespective of any questions which are pending here, ever to maintain naval reserve No. 2 as a naval reserve. If we get these claims, the only way to save the oil for the Government is to take it out of the ground from the wells that are now existing there.

So much for that; but the provisions of the bill, so far as naval reserves are concerned, are very different than are the provisions with reference to claims outside of naval reserves, because, as the Senate is aware, the bill provides that only existing wells can be leased by the Secretary of the Interior within the naval reserves, and provision is made that no other well can be put down within 660 feet of the existing wells. Provision is made, however, that the President may have a right to lease—a very proper and a very necessary provision, as it seems to me, in view of what I have said concerning the situation with reference to conserving the oil in the ground.

Let me say, in passing, that there are over 300 wells upon this reserve. Not one-half of them—no; not one-third of them; I have not the exact number—will be affected by this bill at all, because they are either upon Southern Pacific lands or upon patented lands. But suppose it becomes apparent that the Southern Pacific or some other owner is putting his new wells slam up to the line, draining these lands that are not drained now by existing wells. Is it not necessary that the President shall have the power in such case to lease an offset well, rather than to give this oil to the owner of the other property without giving any royalty to the Government? That is the only purpose of granting to the President the power to lease this additional property, and, if he does lease, the claimants shall have a preferential right to lease.

With reference to that, Mr. President, why should they not have a preferential right to lease? We are going to lease to somebody; and if they have expended money honestly and in good faith, why should they not have a preferential right to lease? Should we punish them if we are going to lease the property in any event? Should we take their money, expended in the utmost good faith, and hand it over to somebody else? Is there any rule of equity that would call for such a line of conduct?

But it is said repeatedly that if these men have any equities the courts can take care of them. Mr. President, that is not true. The courts can take care of no equities in these cases. The courts must follow the law as laid down by Congress and construed by the courts. Why, I read you a decision here in the Midway case where the court gives to the claimants the highest stamp of its approval so far as honesty, good faith, and making valuable discoveries are concerned; but under the law the court very properly held that no relief could be granted to them. If a claimant has suspended work for as much as 60 days, although he may have spent $100,000 before doing so, although he has suspended work through failure to secure money because his capital was gone, and he had to rustle new capital, no court can protect that man, Mr. President. The Government takes his wells, and under this bill if section 18 is stricken out it will lease them to somebody else.

Mr. President, it is not the big corporation that will take the benefits of section 18. It is not the Honolulu Oil Co. that will avail itself of the benefits of section 18. My colleague has read the decision of the commissioner in that case, and I am not going into the details of the case. The Secretary of the Interior has twice clear listed those cases. The district court had appointed a receiver. Although fraud was charged, they made no findings of fraud; and if the Secretary of the Interior shall confirm the findings of the commissioner in those cases, that ends them, both as to courts and Secretary, because the court has jurisdiction in any of these cases only pending a final determination of the Secretary, and the moment the Secretary renders his final decision the court is without further jurisdiction, except that if a denial of a patent is made by the Secretary these claimants then will still have their day in court in an action to remove them or for trespass. But so far as granting a patent is concerned, when the Secretary acts it is the action of the court of last resort; and so I say, so far as these large corporations are concerned, they are not going to avail themselves of the privilege of this bill. The big corporations that have plenty of capital could comply with the law both as decided by the Secretary of the Interior and as decided by the courts of California.

Let me say in passing that I am informed that there have been four cases in these naval reserves that have gone into the courts, and final decisions have been rendered, and the Government has not won one of those cases. It has won a number of other cases. I have read some of them here this evening, where they won on the law; and yet is there anyone who will say that in the facts of these cases that I have read there are no equities; that upon the facts in those cases, if we are going to lease this property, those men are not entitled to some consideration as long as we are going to lease the property in any event?

With reference to the position of the Department of Justice, let me say that the Department of Justice is acting throughout this matter, as it is its duty to act, as a prosecuting attorney would act. No one should assume for a moment that the views of the Department of Justice upon the various phases of this controversy are necessarily law or justice. The Department of Justice is fighting these cases to win them, just as a prosecuting attorney fights to win a case. The Department of Justice urged before the courts in the Consolidated Mutual case that the exception to President Taft's withdrawal order gave no man any rights unless he had made a discovery on the 27th day of September, 1909. The Department of Justice urged before the circuit court of appeals that although a man had complied with the law in every respect up to the 27th day of September, 1909, although he had spent the last dollar of his fortune in full compliance with law, that man had no rights whatever under the withdrawal order.

The Department of Justice has taken another position, and I want to call the attention of the Senate to Mr. Kearful's idea of fraud. Mr. Kearful before the House committee was examined at great length as to the theory of the Department of Justice and his own theory with reference to what constituted a fraud upon the Government in these cases. This question was asked him among others:

> Now, in any oil territory where, we will say, it costs a minimum of $10,000 to drill a well, under your theory of the law any man who did not have sufficient capital to drill that well would be committing a fraud upon the Government if he made a location. Is that true?
> Mr. KEARFUL. The question is not susceptible of answer in the manner in which it is put, because no man could make a location——
> Mr. LENROOT. I say initiate a claim.
> Mr. KEARFUL. If he did it with the intention of excluding other prospectors, without the intention manifested by the ability to do discovery work, I should say yes.
> Mr. LENROOT. Then let me put this other question. If a month afterwards he was successful in finding a man with capital, and he leases that claim to that man, and that man develops it, do you still believe he is guilty of fraud?
> Mr. KEARFUL. You are speaking now of the single claim of 20 acres?
> Mr. LENROOT. I am taking a group.
> Mr. KEARFUL. The group of claims is leased to a single operator?
> Mr. LENROOT. A drilling contract, the compensation to be a portion of the proceeds if discovery is made.
> Mr. KEARFUL. I think that is fraud under the law.

Let me just analyze that for a moment and see what this representative of the Department of Justice would urge before a court was a fraudulent claim. A man with a pack upon his back goes out into territory unknown to anyone as having the slightest indications of oil. He discovers a gas blowout or oil seepage. He makes a location upon the ground. He goes to the nearest city and tells some one about it and makes a contract with a man to drill that location for a percentage of the proceeds of whatever he finds. Mr. Kearful says that is a fraudulent claimant. Mr. Kearful's position is that no one but rich corporations like the Standard Oil Co., like the Honolulu Co., should be permitted to go upon the public lands at all. As he says in his testimony, it is not a poor man's game, and if a man of moderate means does put his all into an oil well and after he has spent his last dollar and does not find oil stops work for a few weeks in order to find more money, the Department of Justice says that man is guilty of fraud, that he is not entitled to any consideration at the hands of the Government.

In conclusion, Mr. President, because while there is much I should like to say further upon this bill I am not going to occupy the time of the Senate, I wish to call attention to the fact that no man or corporation will secure or is entitled to secure any relief of any kind under this bill if he has been guilty of any fraud himself or has knowledge or reasonable grounds to know of any fraud or who has not acted honestly and in good faith. All such men are excluded entirely from the bill. To say that the bill if enacted into law will give these lands to thieves and to robbers is to indict the integrity of the Secretary of the Interior, Franklin K. Lane. He needs no defense from me. I am willing upon that issue to let the Senate render its verdict without argument, except to add that upon these questions Secretary Lane gives them his personal attention, and if this bill should become a law and if any man secures a leasing permit who has been guilty of fraud, it will be because Secretary Lane knowingly, deliberately violates the laws of Congress and is in collusion with a fraudulent claimant.

Mr. PHELAN. May I ask the Senator a question before he sits down?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator has just quoted Mr. Kearful of the Department of Justice. Is he the same Mr. Kearful who made a criticism upon the administration of the Department of the Interior?

Mr. LENROOT. He is.

Mr. PHELAN. I also understood the Senator to say that in all cases brought into court the decision has been against the Government.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no. I said it had been my understanding that there had been four decisions rendered on the merits in naval reserve No. 2 and in those four cases the decision had been against the Government, and there have been any number of other cases where the decision was against the claimant and in favor of the Government.

Mr. PHELAN. But in all cases involving naval reserve No. 2 the decision sustained the action of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. LENROOT. Not all the decisions. I wish the Senator would bear in mind this distinction. Receivers have been appointed I think in every claim in naval reserve No. 2, but in all claims in naval reserve No. 2 no temporary permits were granted, so that the court in every case has granted a receivership, not usually for operation, but merely a receiver to take the money and keep it in escrow. However, I understand there have been four decisions, not final decisions by the Supreme Court, but by the district courts, upon the merits and that in those four cases the claimants have been sustained.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator quoted a decision just handed down by the Federal district court of California—Judge Bledsoe. It is the same decision, I believe, reported in the press August 29. I quote a dispatch dated Los Angeles, August 28, as follows:

> LOS ANGELES, CALIF., August 28.
> Holding that the evidence of fraud was inconclusive, Judge Benjamin F. Bledsoe, in the United States district court, dismissed to-day six consolidated suits filed by the Government against the Southern Pacific Co. and 221 other companies and individuals.
> The Government sought to have set aside patents to valuable oil lands in the San Joaquin Valley.

I have here a statement that in petroleum reserve No. 2, created December 13, 1912, out of 30,080 acres 15,360 had been patented to the Southern Pacific Railway for nearly 25 years. Do I understand that, in the judgment of the Senator, the full decision not having come to hand, one-half of that naval reserve is confirmed to the Southern Pacific Co. by that decision where it speaks of six consolidated cases and 221 other companies? If that be true and the Southern Pacific interest is one-half, what is the interest of the 221 other companies?

Mr. LENROOT. I will say that my best recollection is that there are unpatented lands within the naval reserve of between 7,000 and 8,000 acres. All the balance of the reserve is either in the Southern Pacific or in private hands, and there is some small portion of it that is vacant and has never been entered, as not believed to contain oil.

Mr. SMOOT. In order that the Senator may know just what the decision of Judge Bledsoe was, I have a telegraphic copy of the decision in full. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to read it, but ask that it may be printed in the RECORD. The suits involve 234 defendants, and the litigation directly challenges title to approximately 165,000 acres. That is an answer to the question asked by the Senator from California. If there is no objection, I should like to have the decision printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The decision referred to is as follows:

"BLEDSOE, District Judge.

"This is final hearing of the litigation considered on motion to dismiss in Two hundred and twenty-fifth Federal, page 197. The actions, six in number, consolidated upon the trial, will be considered together, as the questions presented in their substantial aspect are unitary.

"The suits seek to cancel, as for fraud, certain patents issued by the Government to the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. in pursuance of the act of Congress approved July 27, 1866, 'Granting land to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast' (14 Stat., 292), as modified by the joint resolution of Congress of June 28, 1870 (16 Stat., 382, No. 87). The litigation in its general aspect is the parallel of that considered by the court of appeals for this circuit in United States v. Southern Pacific Co. (249 Fed., 785), commonly referred to as the Elk Hills case, in the course of which opinion may be found a recital of some of the general and controlling features of the situation.

"The suits herein name no less than 234 defendants, and it is asserted by defendants that 111 other persons claim interests in the lands involved and are 'necessary parties' in consequence. The litigation directly challenges the title to approximately 165,000 acres of land in the 'oil territory' of the west side of the San Joaquin Valley extending from above Coalinga on the north to below Sunset on the south. The value of the land actually involved is alleged by the Government in its complaints to be in excess of $421,000,000. The patents in issue aggregate 16. The first, No. 20, covering some 4,000 acres, was applied for by the railroad company in 1883, and was finally issued in 1892. Suit was brought upon it in January, 1915. Patent No. 22, covering over 60,000 acres, was applied for in May, 1892, issued July 10, 1894, and suit was brought, the earliest one filed December 20, 1912. The other patents involved were applied for at various times between 1882 and 1900, and were issued at various dates between 1894 and 1902. It might be said, in passing, that the patent applied for in 1900, and the only one herein involved applied for after 1897, was issued in 1902, and covers three sections of land in the Elk Hills region, none of which as yet are shown to be oil bearing.

"During the course of the protracted hearings many hundreds of witnesses were examined in open court, and nearly 15,000 pages of testimony thus taken. The importance and magnitude of the property rights involved have at no time been lost sight of by the court. A careful consideration of the evidence and of the various contentions of the principal parties to the litigation has, of course, been given, due regard for economy both of time and of space, however, demanded that the conclusions of the court be stated with brevity.

"As is set forth in the Elk Hills decision, supra, pursuant to the terms of the railroad grant, and in consequence of certain regulations promulgated by the Department of the Interior having charge of the disposition of public lands, it was required that the railroad company in making application for the issuance of patent to its granted lands should cause its land agent, duly authorized in such behalf, to make affidavit that he had caused the lands applied for 'to be carefully examined by the agents and employees of the company as to their mineral or agricultural character, and that to the best of his knowledge and belief none of the lands returned in the list are mineral lands.' (19 L. D., 21) Jerome Madden during all of the time mentioned herein was the land agent of defendant company, the predecessor of C. W. Eberlein referred to in the Elk Hills decision, supra. It is alleged in the bills of complaint, as set out more fully in the opinion on the motion to dismiss, 225 Fed. 197, supra, that Madden made and transmitted the requisite affidavit, containing the positive statement that the lands applied for were 'no interdicted mineral or reserved lands, and are of the character contemplated by the grant.' It is then averred, at some length, that the lands now are and all times mentioned were mineral lands, without the terms of the grant; that they were so known to be by the railroad company and by Madden in particular 'long prior' to the making of the affidavit referred to; that nevertheless, in ignorance of the truth and in complete reliance upon the false representations sworn to by Madden in his affidavit, etc., the Secretary of the Interior was led to and did cause to be issued the patent, etc. It is also alleged, it may be added, that the fraud thus perpetrated was not only 'naturally self-concealing' but was in fact, through the machinations of the railroad company and its agents, actually concealed from the Government and all of its responsible officers until 1910, when certain suits were brought in this court, etc., referring, inter alia, to Burke v. Southern Pacific Company, 234 U. S., 669.

"The defendant railroad company denies with positiveness and unequivocation the intention to commit or the actual commission, or the subsequent concealment, naturally or otherwise, of any fraud in the premises in additional and specially, laches and the bar of statutes of limitations (act of Mar. 3, 1891, 26 Stat., 1093, and act of Mar. 2, 1896, 29 Stat., 42) are set up as defense.

"Stripped to the core, the claim of the Government is that the defendant company, knowing the lands were mineral and that therefore it was not entitled to them, nevertheless deliberately conceived and put into successful operation the fraudulent plan of acquiring such lands to its own use and benefit and in complete disregard of the Government's rights. The case as developed by the Government on the hearing and through the contentions of its counsel is to the effect that the "big four" of the Central and Southern Pacific companies, the original initial owners of that great unified enterprise, Stanford, Crocker, Huntington, and Hopkins, together with several lesser lights, occupying positions of responsibility and prominence, however (Towne, general manager; Madden, land agent; Kruttschnitt, vice president; etc.), were all parties to a deliberate, long-enduring, and wide-embracing scheme to acquire from the Government wrongfully vast areas lying on the west side of the San Joaquin Valley involving some of the richest oil lands that the world has ever known. That this scheme was conceived sometime in the seventies or, possibly, early eighties, and continued to flourish uninterruptedly, but all the time concealed, either naturally or through the artifices of its instigators, until its accidental discovery by the Government through the filing of the Burke suit in 1910. In other words, that, through a period of, say, 30 years, some of the most prominent, most forceful, most far-seeing men that our State has produced, were engaged in the diabolical plan of consummating one of the greatest frauds of the age, and not only that, but that during the course of the perpetration of that fraud and previous to the realization of any appreciable profit or substantial reward from its attempted consummation, practically all the original parties to the gigantic conspiracy had gone to their graves. It seems hardly within the realms of possibility that such could be the case, and I feel sure that the required proof of such an enormity by that class of evidence which commands respect and that amount of it which produces conviction (Diamond Coal & Coke Co. v. U. S., 233 U. S., 236, 239) has not been adduced herein. It is to be observed at the outset, for I conceive it to be a matter of primal importance, that the defendant railroad company was in no sense a mere self-seeking applicant for the lands in question. It occupied a status much higher than that of a mere homesteader or preemptioner. Pursuant to acceptance of a definite and far-reaching offer on the part of the Government for the construction of the railroad, it became entitled as a matter of right and not of grace to the ownership, possession, and employment of every odd section, 'not mineral' or not otherwise appropriated, on either side of its line of road, within certain stated primary and indemnity limits (Burke v. S. H. Co., 234 U. S., 669, 680). The defendant company is not therefore to be considered an object of suspicion because it applied for these particular lands. In due course it was its duty to apply for them unless they are 'mineral' or appropriated. It could not be deprived of them unless they were mineral or otherwise appropriated. Seemingly, in so far as I can determine from the record, all lands involved herein were returned by the Government surveyed as agricultural, i. e., 'nonmineral,' and in consequence there was a prima facie showing, sufficient at least to cast the burden of proof upon a possible objector, to the effect that the lands were of the sort and kind contemplated by the grant. (Tulare Oil Co. v. S. P. Co., 29 L. D., 269.)

"I advert to this situation because I think it distinguishes this case, on the facts, from many other fraud cases, and particularly from the Diamond Coal & Coke case, supra. Presumptively, all the railroad company was intending to do in making application for the lands was to become possessed of its own. No ulterior motive may be inferred from the making application or subsequent claim of the lands. The Government has relied (1) upon certain information said to have been conveyed to the parties mentioned hereinabove, or to others acting for them, to the effect that the lands were mineral lands, and (2) upon the presence of certain natural phenomena (live oil seepages, shale and oil sand outcrops, and the like), the observation of which, it strenuously asserted, could have had no other effect than to cause defendants' agents and officers to be of 'the belief that the land contained mineral deposits of such quality and in such quantity as would render their extraction profitable and justify expenditures to that end' (Diamond Coal & Coke Co., supra); that is, that the lands were 'mineral lands' as that term was known to the law.

"With respect to the information said to have been conveyed to various railroad officials regarding the mineral character of the land, without specifying the particular witnesses testifying thereto, it may be said without exception or qualification that every statement relied upon by the Government in that particular behalf is shown to have been made to an individual deceased at the time of the trial. It is as obvious as it is long established that the weakest evidence that can be offered in a court of justice is evidence of an asserted conversation had with one no longer living. The lips of the unreplying dead are unavailable for rebuttal. No skill in cross-examination can adequately serve to dissect out the true from false. The statement must perforce rest upon the bare word of the party testifying to it. And a due regard for the rights of property and value of reputation would seem inexorably to demand that before a judgment should issue upon such skeleton of fact it should be supported in corroborative circumstance by such proof at least as to make its acceptance conscionable. Such corroborative proof is not only wanting in these cases, but, on the other hand, patent and irrefutable facts point to a contrary conclusion. In the first place, circumstantial verity is lacking in some of the narratives themselves. Improbability of some occurrences as asservated confronts even the credulous mind. Inconsistency of utterance and conduct induces a rational disbelief. And on more than one occasion a positive contradiction, coming from unimpeached and apparently unimpeachable sources, serves completely to annihilate the seeming truth of the assertion. When all of the foregoing is said in this behalf, however, there still remains that which, to my mind, constitutes incontrovertible refutation of the claim that the officials and agents of the railroad company knew, at all times involved, that the lands in question were 'mineral lands'; that is, 'more valuable' for their mineral content than for their agricultural possibilities. (Barden v. Northern Pacific Railway, 154 U. S., 288, 328; Davis v. Weibbold, 139 U. S., 507, 523.) I refer to the conduct of the officials and agents themselves respecting such lands.

"If the officials of the railroad company knew that these lands were more valuable for their mineral than for their agricultural possibilities when they acquired them, as is charged by the Government, and as its evidence undoubtedly tends to show, then they were guilty of a colossal fraud, of course, and they and their successors should now be mulcted of their ill-gotten gains. To hold them possessed of such knowledge, however, and therefore guilty of such fraud, it must be found or inferred that they intended to advantage or benefit themselves. The conception and perpetration of a fraud inevitably involves an intent unlawfully to benefit from the fraud until transaction. The same self-interest which would inspire the fraud would seek material satisfaction in appropriation of its fruits. And if men handle valuable property as if it had no or but little value, it is almost proof positive that they are unacquainted with and have no suspicion of its real value.

"Both prior and subsequent to the actual acquisition of some of the most valuable of the lands patented to the railroad company in the oil belt in suit and otherwise the company in due course, with insistent effort and patient forbearance, made contracts for the sale of, and actually sold, these lands at mere grazing or cheap agricultural prices, from $2.50 in most instances to $10 an acre. One section, 17, situate above Coalinga, and containing probably the then most persuasive geological and physical indications of any lands in that neighborhood, an unusually 'stiff price' was put on the lands because the land grader's 'summer vacation was spoiled' in consequence of his having to appraise the land right after the application to purchase, and it was sold for $3.50 and $5 per acre. The witness Hart testified that he assured C. P. Huntington in New York in 1893 that 'the railroad oil lands were worth more than his entire railroad.' Yet sedulously and persistently, after it is claimed such a startling statement was made to its president, the railroad company continued to offer and sell its lands to whomsoever would buy at a mere grazing and agricultural price. Lands in the Kreyenhagen Hills, Lost Hills, and Kellmans Hills, all promising oil territory according to the geologists, were sold and held for sale without reserve.

"During all these years and to and until the great discoveries of oil in the Kern River field and in the McKittrick field in 1899, and thereafter while the railroad company was indulging in strenuous efforts to provide itself with the necessary futures—engines first with coal and the latter, beginning about 1897, with oil—the fact is that it was either disposing of, or offering to dispose of, at the merest fractional part of their value, lands actually containing the very fuel of which it was then so industriously in search. In addition, the men at the head of the Southern Pacific and its subsidiary corporations at that time, admittedly possessed of unusual business acumen, failed in a single instance, to which the court's attention has been directed, to become individually possessed of a single foot of producing or probable oil territory within the area in suit. Some of them, at least, charged with either participation in or knowledge of the conspiracy, did purchase granted lands; and it is inconceivable that if they had known or even suspected the truth with respect to the oil content of the west side lands they would not have secured some of them for their personal possession.

"Again I repeat, as demonstrative of the unsoundness of the Government's claim in this particular behalf, self-interest alone, thievish self-interest, would have prompted the perpetration of the fraud alleged. The same or a continuing self-interest would have prompted the retention of at least some substantial portion of the real estate of the thing acquired, having sold or offered generally to sell all these lands for a mere pittance, considering their 'mineral value.' It is inconceivable that the same men should have perjured themselves originally in order to accomplish their acquisition. Their conduct is more consistent with honesty of purpose and bona fides of belief than with fraud and chicanery. The whole state of the record, viewed with unprejudiced eye, fails, in my judgment, to induce the conclusion that the proof of the fraud associated is 'clear, convincing, and unambiguous.' (Colorado Coal Co. v. United States, 123 U. S., 307.) In the absence of such degree of proof, 'by that class of evidence which commands respect,' the plain and instant duty of the court is to deny the relief requested.

"At this point attention should be called to the fact that it is not the actual presence or subsequent discovery of oil in the lands in question which gives the Government the right to recover herein. Pursuant to apparently due and regular proceedings in accordance with law, the Government has heretofore granted these lands to defendant company. Though company was not entitled to receive 'mineral lands,' yet it is definitely established that a discovery of mineral in the lands after patent will not suffice even protanto to divest the railroad title. It is only when 'fraud' has been perpetrated in the acquisition of the lands that the patent may be set aside. 'When legal title did pass—and it passed unquestionably by the patent—it passed free from the contingency of future discovery of minerals' (Burke v. Southern Pacific Co., supra) 'if at that time (time of proceedings taken to secure patent) the land was not thus known to be valuable for mineral subsequent discoveries will not affect the patent.' (Diamond Coal & Coke Co., supra.)

"The Government, however, insists that the fraud complained of may arise from the assertion of that as a fact which the party did not know to be true (Pomeroy Eq. Jur., sec. 885) when he 'ought to have known' of its falsity (Bigelow on Fraud, vol. 1, p. 8) or had 'no reasonable grounds' for believing it to be true. (Southern Development Co. v. Silva, 125 U. S., 247.) It then contends that the proper study and investigation of the physical aspects of the lands in question, required in order that the affidavit of 'nonmineral' character might be made and presented, would indubitably (and therefore must) have caused the company, through its agents and investigators, to become apprised of the mineral character—'oil content'—of such lands.

"It is sufficient, with respect to what the railroad actually did learn and believe as to the mineral value of the land, to refer to what has already been said concerning its conduct. From its long-continued handling of these lands it must be held that it did not know their actual or potential value as oil lands, irrespective of the sources from which information is said to have come. But may we assert now that it 'should have known' and that because of its negligence or incredulity in this behalf the lands now may be taken from it in virtue of the established 'mineral value' of at least a part of them?

"The keystone of the entire arch of the Government's syllogistic structure is the holding of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Diamond Coal & Coke Co. case, pages 239–240, supra, to the effect that in a suit to cancel an agricultural patent for fraud it will suffice if it be made to appear 'at the time of the proceedings which resulted in the patent the land was known to be valuable for mineral; that is to say, it must appear that the known conditions at the time of those proceedings were plainly such as to engender the belief that the land contained mineral deposits of such quality and in such quantity as would render their extraction profitable and justify expenditures to that end.' The case concerned the attempt of a coal company, long engaged in the business of coal mining in the particular neighborhood in question, to acquire unlawfully and fraudulently under agricultural entries certain lands known and believed by it to be coal lands. The difference in 'mode of deposition' between coal (especially adverted to in the Diamond Coal case, p. 249, supra) and oil is not only apparent to those learned in the science of geology but has received express consideration in the Elk Hills decision, page 799, supra, in connection with that court's analysis of the Diamond Coal Co. case. In addition to what is quoted therein from the testimony of Dr. Branner, he testified in the present case that: 'We know that coal when it forms stays right where it is placed. But in the case of petroleum, no matter where it originates, it is always trying to get away from there and go somewhere else.'

"Too little attention has been paid to the important word 'plainly,' found in the declaration of the law quoted from the Diamond Coal Co. In my judgment, it is only by giving that word its appropriate emphasis and consideration that the decision does not constitute a radical departure from previous conclusions announced by the same court and referred to and relied upon therein. (Diamond Coal case, supra, p. 240.)

"If, then, we assume the true rule to be that the 'known conditions' must be such as 'plainly' to engender the 'belief' that the land contained mineral deposits of such quality and in such quantity as would render their extraction profitable and 'justify' expenditures to that end, my conclusion is that not only did the railroad officials fail to have the requisite 'belief,' but that the then 'known conditions' were not calculated and did not serve 'plainly' to engender such belief.

"It must be remembered, as already adverted to, that all these lands, except three sections lying on the flank of the Elk Hills, were acquired by patents issued in the period between July 10, 1894, and December 2, 1897. Though there was some oil produced in and about Coalinga in 1896, the real 'boom' in the fields occurred after the Kern River discovery in 1899. That discovery, marvelous in its nature, attracted great numbers of people to all 'possible oil territory,' and every 'indication,' insignificant or otherwise, as well as countless acres of outlying and 'wildcat' territory, became the subject of consideration and 'location'; i. e., the posting thereon of 'mineral location notices,' but with no precedent or concomitant 'discovery.' (See United States v. McCutcheon, 238 Fed., 575.) All this, however, it must be remembered, occurred after all the patents, except No. 111, the subject of suit A-24, had been issued by the Government.

"The truth is that, though on the west side of the San Joaquin Valley, even from the sixties, there had been occasional, sporadic, and almost without exception commercially unsuccessful efforts to secure oil, maltha, and asphaltum, yet it remained for the Kern River excitement and the consequent McKittrick discoveries in 1899 and 1900 to put the oil industry of that region upon the solid footing that it possesses to-day. Early oil men, lacking greatly in experience, in initiative, in willingness to assume unwarranted risks, clung to the outcrops and territory more or less immediately adjacent and did not go down into the 'plains,' where most of the lands involved herein and nearly all of the really 'rich oil territory' are situated. Under such circumstances, in my judgment, the action of the railroad company in making application for the legal title to lands which, in a sense at least, it was then equitably entitled to, is not to be considered as violative, consciously or unconsciously, of the law as laid down in the Diamond Coal Co. case.

"It should be observed again, for emphasis, that the railroad company was entitled, in virtue of a 'contractual' obligation (Burke v. Southern Pacific Co., supra), wholly performed as to it, to the receipt of the legal title to these lands, except such of them as might be 'mineral' or 'otherwise appropriated.' They had been returned by Government surveyors as 'nonmineral.' All proceedings taken looking to their formal acquisition by the railroad company were had and taken in due course and in accordance with the existing requirements of law as laid down by the Interior Department, and the usual publicity, by publication in newspapers and otherwise, was accorded.

"No objection to the patenting of any of these lands on the score of their mineral content was made by anybody, in so far as I can determine, save a 'blanket objection' made by one Benjamin, and passed upon, in due course, adversely to his contention by the Department of the Interior, and an objection made by the Tulare Land & Oil Co., carefully considered and allowed in part and denied in part (Tulare Oil Co. v. A. P. Co., supra). None of the lands covered by the Tulare decision, it may be said, are involved herein. It thus appears that though, with respect to the lands applied for, and awarded to the railroad company, and in suit here, the 'oil people' had notice of what was going on, yet no showing was made at the time by anybody to the effect that the lands were oil lands and not patentable. This, to my mind, is demonstrative that at the time of their acquisition the 'known conditions' were not such as 'plainly' to 'engender' the 'belief' that expenditures in search of oil therein would be 'justified.'

"It must be remembered that the controlling test is not that incautious and irresponsible individuals would be 'willing' to take a chance and explore for oil, but that the conditions 'should be such as would justify a man of ordinary prudence, not necessarily a skilled miner, in the expenditure of his time and money.' (Chrisman v. Miller, 197 U. S., 311-322.) If there were such men on the west side of the San Joaquin Valley at the time proceedings for patent were pending, so disposed with respect to lands involved in these suits, why did they not then, as they have been in great numbers since 1899-1900, actually engaged in giving practical expression to their 'belief' engendered by an observance of the 'known conditons' there is a homely proverb to the effect that 'the proof of the pudding is in the eating.' It may lack authoritativeness, but it is surely not without appositeness.

"I am not inadvertent to the fact, of course, that the mere absence either of explorative efforts at the time, or asserted objection before the Interior Department, is not conclusive herein. It is peculiarly persuasive, however; neither do I overlook the Government's repeated contention that such explorative efforts, actually being carried on, within regional or even in some cases contiguous properties, taken in connection with observable physical and geological conditions, should have sufficed to 'engender the belief' required. In the then state of the art of oil seeking, oil drilling, and oil finding, however, I am constrained to conclude that this is a fallacious assumption. We must test men's minds as to being 'justified' in the entertaining of 'beliefs' from 'known conditions' by a reference to the state of the art and the state of knowledge and experience and ability to drill for oil as the same existed prior to patent, previous to 1899, and not as these factors or any of them exist to-day.

"It is very easy, of course, for an eminent and scholarly geologist, like Dr. Branner, of Stanford University, a man of unusual ripeness and maturity in science, to say that if he had been asked in 1892, he would then have said that he felt it 'his professional duty' to his client to include as 'probable oil lands' 'warranting the expenditure of money necessary to develop them with the reasonable expectation of their yielding oil,' all lands, among others, involved herein. It is a very different matter, however, for this court now to say that such expression of opinion, coming even from such an acknowledged scientific authority, would in the then practical state of the art have 'justified'—not merely made 'willing'—men 'of ordinary prudence' in the 'expenditure of their time and money' (Chrisman v. Miller, supra) in the drilling of any particular section or tract of this land, or even at all. And yet that is what the court would have to say with respect to each and every individual Government subdivision before it could righteously and justly award the Government a decree covering such subdivision.

"The lands above referred to, lying in the Elk Hills, are subject, in the main, to the observations just indulged in. They were patented after the Kern River and McKittrick discoveries, but lie in such relation to them, and their succeeding history has been such as to justify the general conclusion reached and detailed herein above.

"Many matters of assorted moment looking to the question of the existence of actual fraud but occurring subsequent to the issuance of patent have been introduced in evidence, as, for instance, the testimony in the Elk Hills case, supra, etc. Having concluded that no fraud was committed by the railroad company in its acquisition of these lands originally, it is irrelevant now to enter into a close analysis of the conduct of some of its employees subsequent to that time. It might be suggested that the most serious challenge with respect to its good faith centers about the conduct of its land agent, Eberlein, in 1903 and 1904, and as to that the decision in the Elk Hills case, supra, seems to be opposed to any conscious wrongdoing on his part.

"Judge Van Fleet, now of this circuit and formerly of the Supreme Court of California, when upon the bench, said, in Truett v. Onderdonk (120 Calif., 581, 588):

"'The presumption is always against fraud, a presumption approximating in strength to that of innocence of crime.'

"It is my deliberate and carefully formulated opinion that such presumption has in nowise been met or overcome in these cases.

"Counsel for defendants will present and the court will sign appropriate decrees of dismissal."

Mr. PHELAN. The courts will dispose of naval reserve No. 2 and, if that judgment is affirmed by the Supreme Court, there will be no naval reserve to dispute over.

Mr. SMOOT. There are other acreages in No. 2. I have a complete statement of the acreage and how it is held, but I shall not at this time put it in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the section of the bill to which the motion now pending is directed contains a provision with relation to the naval reserve. It is my recollection that that is the only part of the bill which does refer to it.

Some days ago the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], having discussed in a general way that feature of the bill, I submitted a letter which was written to me by Mr. Phelan, the oil expert of the Shipping Board. I ought to say in this connection that a day or two theretofore I had tendered some amendments to the last section of the bill or the last section but one. While the amendments were pending Mr. Phelan called me from the Chamber and expressed some solicitude about the provision for oil for the merchant marine. Upon a suggestion from him I proposed a further amendment, which will authorize the sale of royalty oil to the Shipping Board without first offering it to competitive bids. That was the first time I had ever met Mr. Phelan and, so far as I know, the first time I ever heard of him. I suppose it was because of the brief conversation that we had upon the subject that the next day or the day after he sent me the letter which was transmitted. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] exhibited considerable solicitude about the naval reserve, and I offered it just in the line of the suggestion concerning that matter. In the letter Mr. Phelan advanced the idea that the naval reserve would be depleted to a very large extent and, to a great extent, lost or destroyed to the Government unless leases within the naval reserve were authorized or the Government itself should undertake to drain the oil from the oil reserves, advancing the idea that has now been elaborately presented to the Senate by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

I regret that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has left the Chamber. The letter was made the subject of very severe animadversion by the senior Senator from Wisconsin. Apparently he thought that it was not worthy of very serious consideration, if, indeed, it did not suggest that the integrity of the writer of the letter was open to question. His reason for the criticisms indulged in seemed to be that the writer of the letter had in the course of his career, a reasonably young man, been employed by some of the companies which had sought to secure oil lands from the Government. That fact seemed to be sufficient justification for a very severe castigation of Mr. Phelan at the hands of the Senator from Wisconsin.

I do not recall the particular companies by whom he was employed, but however that may be regarded by the Senator from Wisconsin I should dislike to condemn a man as being either wanting in integrity or credibility because he had been employed by the Standard Oil Co. or by the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. The Senator from Wisconsin submitted in that connection a letter written by Mr. Latham, of southern California, and appearing in the record, the letter being written some time in the year 1916, in which Mr. Latham took a view antagonistic to that expressed by Mr. Phelan in his letter. Mr. Latham not only wrote the letter to which the Senator invited our attention, but he testified in the hearings, and I read from his testimony at page 239 of the hearings on H. R. 406 before the Senate committee, taken in the year 1916, as follows:

Senator THOMAS. What is your profession, Mr. Latham?

Mr. LATHAM. I am a petroleum engineer and geologist.

Senator THOMAS. You have followed that profession how long?

Mr. LATHAM. I have been following it off and on for 20 years. The only thing that I can give this committee is my opinion, and you can attach as much weight to that as you wish.

The CHAIRMAN. I merely wanted to define your experience, Mr. Latham.

Senator NORRIS. That is the reason we would like to know what your experience has been.

Mr. LATHAM. I will state in so far as it is germane here that I have been for the last six years interested in these particular oil fields in California in one capacity or another along these lines.

I was originally resident geologist in the Midway Field with the Southern Pacific and the Kern Trading and Oil Co. That was at the inception of the work in this district. I have been consulting geologist for the Santa Fe Railroad for several years and until very recently I have had charge of the geological work for the Kern County Oil Protective Association, a cooperative scheme, which was originated in the oil field for the purpose of preventing damage to the oil measures by the infiltration of water. I have been, practically, in daily contact with these fields for the last six years.

So it will be observed that Mr. Latham, so highly extolled, was at one time, according to his own testimony, in the employ of the Southern Pacific Railroad Co., which from all the testimony is the leviathan among the land grabbers of the West and particularly of the oil lands of the West, as appears from abundant testimony.

So I submit to the Senator from Wisconsin that perhaps he ought to revise his views concerning the reliability of the testimony of Mr. Latham if he finds any cause for doubting the integrity or the credibility of Mr. Phelan by reason of the fact that he was employed by any of these companies. But those of us who have had some experience with mining geologists are sufficiently charitable at least to believe that the bare fact that they were employed by some of the great big mining companies is no particular reason for regarding them as anything but gentlemen. Their credibility is to be determined just as is the credibility of any other witness.

Mr. President, I offered the letter of Mr. Phelan because it came to my hand at the time, particularly to call the attenton of the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senate generally to the important fact to which he alludes, namely, that the State of California, whose title is not subject to question at all, owns school sections within these naval reserves, the title dating, of course, from the time of the admission of California into the Union, or at least from the time the lands were surveyed, so that the title of the State of California is unexceptional and these have passed by conveyance to the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. The letter of Mr. Phelan calls attention to the fact that upon those school sections oil wells are being sunk by the Standard Oil Co. and through them the field is being drained and the gas pressure is being reduced. That is only important as it calls attention to facts that have recently occurred, because, as my recollection is, there was very little testimony, if any, before the committee supporting the view expressed by Mr. Latham, formerly of the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. On the contrary, Mr. Naramore, of the Bureau of Mines, and the expert of the Geological Survey concur in the view taken that the reserve is endangered, to say the least, by these oil wells within it, the operation of which goes on continuously.

But I do not rely entirely, in respect to my judgment of the matter, upon these experts. However it may be regarded by anyone else, I attach very great importance to the testimony of Mr. A. L. Doheny to the same effect. It is well known that Mr. Doheny is one of the most extensive and one of the most successful oil prospectors and operators in the world. It appears that he has no interest whatever in any of the property within the naval reserve or in any of the withdrawal areas, and that he has no interest in any of the lands that would be patented. He does, however, own profitable and producing oil wells throughout the State of California. If he has any interest in the bill at all of an individual or personal character it would be to see the bill killed, because thus the volume of oil would be restricted and limited, if not reduced, and the value of his product would be proportionately increased. I can not believe, however, that he is influenced either one way or the other by that consideration; but he tells us, after his long experience as an oil prospector and an operator in oil, the fact is that the wells which now exist upon the reserves are continually draining the supply of oil and reducing the oil pressure, and he ventured the opinion that in 10 years the gas pressure would be so far reduced as to make it next to impossible to extract any further oil from the reserves.

In that situation of affairs, Mr. President, it occurs to me that the committee have acted wisely in providing that the wells already upon the reserves should be leased and that the President should have the authority to direct the drilling of other wells whenever, in his judgment, it became necessary to subserve the public interest. I do not believe, therefore, that those provisions of the bill are open to any serious objection.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, just a word with reference to the observations of my colleague [Mr. LENROOT] in criticism of the attitude of Mr. Kearful, the Assistant Attorney General, who has had charge of a large number of the cases which have been brought by the Department of Justice and who is the writer of the brief that I hold in my hand and from which I read when I addressed the Senate during the afternoon—the brief in the Honolulu Oil case. I do not believe, notwithstanding the excerpt from the testimony of Judge Kearful, that his opinion or that of the Department of Justice has ever been that unless oil had been discovered upon an entry the claimant or the entryman had no rights. From all that I have been able to gather as to the attitude of the Department of Justice—and that is assuredly the ground taken in this brief—it is that an entryman or one who claims any oil or mineral rights because he has filed upon a claim, must show due diligence in the prosecution of the discovery of the mineral product. If he has been able to show due diligence, I do not believe that the Department of Justice or any representative of the Department of Justice can be quoted here in any way that fairly represents their view to any other effect than that if the entryman has diligently prosecuted his investigation for the mineral products covered by his claim, he has complied with the law, whether he has discovered the mineral or not. But, Mr. President, the man who enters land and makes no improvement, conducts no operation with a view of discovering the oil or other mineral products of that land, does not comply with the law; and if he seeks to hold it by any cover of effort, such as placing material upon the land or going in search of capital to develop it, he is resorting to practices to keep others off the land without complying with the requirements the law imposes upon him. To that extent he does commit a violation of the law and is guilty of seeking to mislead others who might desire to file upon the land and diligently prosecute his investigations for oil or other mineral products.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me to ask a question of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], in charge of the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if he purposes having the Senate take a recess this evening?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I have no intention of asking the Senate to take a recess.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield for a motion?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, I should like first to conclude what I have to say, and I am going to be as brief as possible. I merely want to read from one or two decisions of the courts upon this subject. I believe they sustain the position which I think Judge Kearful has taken, both in his testimony, when it is fairly considered, and in all of the briefs and arguments which he has made in conducting the cases that the Department of Justice has instituted to protect the public rights. The court said, for instance, in the case of the Union Oil Co. against Smith, Two hundred and forty-ninth United States:

> Whatever the nature and extent of a possessory right before discovery, all authorities agree that such possession may be maintained only by continued actual occupancy by a qualified locator or his representatives engaged in persistent and diligent prosecution of work looking to the discovery of mineral.
> In the Smith case the court referred to the decisions of the California courts as the most liberal in their recognition of the extent of this inchoate right, and cited McLemore v. Express Oil Co. (158 Calif., 559), where the court said, page 563:
> "What the attempting locator has is the right to continue in possession, undisturbed by any form of hostile or clandestine entry, while he is diligently prosecuting his work to a discovery. This diligent prosecution of the work of discovery does not mean the doing of assessment work. It does not mean the pursuit of capital to prosecute the work. It does not mean any attempted holding by cabin, lumber pile, or unused derrick. It means the diligent, continuous prosecution of the work, with the expenditure of whatever money may be necessary to the end in view. Of such work defendant's grantors were not in the prosecution up to April 12, 1907. They were not only not in the actual possession of the land, as the court finds, but the evidence discloses that what they had done was no more than to attempt to hold the land under the theory that assessment work was adequate for that purpose. It is shown by the evidence that they were not only not engaged in the diligent prosecution of the work, but that they were not financially able so to prosecute it, and were either in search of capital to enable them to do so or in search of a purchaser to buy out such interest as it might be thought that they had."

From the limited examination that I could make of the antecedent claimants to these great oil companies that are the real interests given priority of rights under section 18, many of these antecedent claimants have located upon these lands not with any view of actual prosecution for oil; that they had not complied with the requirements of the law and resorted to all manner of subterfuges to keep others off; that, in fact, those entries, handled as they were by those who had filed upon the land, were fraudulent; and that they were simply holding them until they could realize, in a speculative way, out of their possessory rights by turning them over to large corporations.

Mr. President, we have not here, according to all the facts as I have been able to gather them together in the limited time that I have had since this bill has been before the Senate, a case of protecting the poor entrymen who did not have capital. Practically all of the first entrymen have sold out to great corporations. In the Salt Creek field I am informed that there is only one independent operator left; and I am advised that on Reserve No. 2 those who are there and in control at this time, and who are operating the producing wells covered by section 18, are the Standard Oil itself or affiliated with the Standard Oil, or the Dutch Shell Co., or one of the other large companies that represent French capital. These powerful monopolies can not be hidden in this discussion behind honest, worthy prospectors.

The decision which has been referred to here affecting the Southern Pacific lands is a decision of one of the inferior courts. Those cases have not been passed upon by the supreme court. I do not pretend to say what the result will be when they reach that court; but I do say that, as in many of these cases—as, for example, the case cited by my colleague, the Midway case—in connection with which he read from a decision by a lower court, which was especially tender and considerate of the original locators, when that case reached the Supreme Court of the United States the dicision of that judge, who was known in some quarters as very friendly, at least, to the oil companies, was reversed.

Mr. LENROOT. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Am I in error about that?

Mr. LENROOT. The decision in the case originally was in favor of the Government, and it has not been appealed, as I understand.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thought the Senator was reading from the Midway case.

Mr. LENROOT. One was the Midway case, but the other was the Mid-West case.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then I was in error.

Mr. President, I am not going to take issue with anybody who claims that this bill is an improvement upon any bill of the same character that has been heretofore presented; but I do say that it is not a just bill to the Government; that it is not a just bill to the public; and while I have not been able to offer amendments to cure it in all respects, according to my standards, I have offered some amendments which would impair the power of the great corporations which are, as I believe, going to receive large benefits under it. I regret to say that when an amendment was pending here that would deprive the Standard Oil and the other companies which will derive large benefits under this bill of their power to charge unreasonable prices for the products derived from these leased lands, I could not secure the support of more than 10 of the Senators upon this floor for such amendment.

I do not expect that the pending amendment offered by me or that any amendment that can be offered here to curtail the rights and powers that will be conferred upon these monopolies under this bill will meet with the approval of the Senate and will be incorporated as a part of the measure; but, nevertheless, I have offered the amendments because I believe it to be the duty of any Senator, according to his convictions, to use his best efforts to perfect the measures pending before the Senate.

I believe that section 18 should be stricken from this bill. I believe that all of the issues that are involved in section 18 should be considered, if they are to be disposed of by Congress at all, in a separate bill. I believe that the legal questions as to the trespass committed upon those public lands should go, first of all, to a court of justice; and if there are any equities to be adjusted after that which can not be reached by a court of justice, then let them come here and present their appeal to Congress for relief in a separate bill, and not seek to have it dragged through by a leasing measure or any other bill which deals with other problems.

I ask, Mr. President, for a roll call upon my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That has already been ordered. Is the discussion over? If so, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH of Montana (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], I vote "nay."

Mr. WOLCOTT (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LODGE. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], but I am released from that pair on all votes on this bill. I vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS. I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS];

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY];

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON];

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY];

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]; and

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

The roll call resulted—yeas 8, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—8.

Gronna	Kenyon	La Follette	Sheppard
Harris	Kirby	Nugent	Walsh, Mass.

NAYS—30.

Brandegee	Keyes	Norris	Thomas
Chamberlain	King	Overman	Wadsworth
Curtis	Lenroot	Phelan	Walsh, Mont.
Fall	Lodge	Pomerene	Warren
France	McKellar	Shields	Williams
Gay	McNary	Smith, S. C.	Wolcott
Jones, N. Mex.	Moses	Smoot
Jones, Wash.	Myers	Sterling

NOT VOTING—58.

Ashurst	Fletcher	McCumber	Sherman
Ball	Frelinghuysen	McLean	Simmons
Bankhead	Gerry	Martin	Smith, Ariz.
Beckham	Gore	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Hale	New	Smith, Md.
Calder	Harding	Newberry	Spencer
Capper	Harrison	Owen	Stanley
Colt	Henderson	Page	Sutherland
Culberson	Hitchcock	Penrose	Swanson
Cummins	Johnson, Calif.	Phipps	Townsend
Dial	Johnson, S. Dak.	Pittman	Trammell
Dillingham	Kellogg	Poindexter	Underwood
Edge	Kendrick	Ransdell	Watson
Elkins	Knox	Reed
Fernald	McCormick	Robinson

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] the yeas are 8 and the nays are 30. The roll call does not develop the presence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	Kenyon	Myers	Sterling
Chamberlain	Keyes	Norris	Sutherland
Curtis	King	Nugent	Thomas
Fall	Kirby	Phelan	Wadsworth
France	La Follette	Pomerene	Walsh, Mass.
Gay	Lenroot	Sheppard	Walsh, Mont.
Harris	Lodge	Shields	Warren
Jones, N. Mex.	McKellar	Smith, S. C.	Williams
Jones, Wash.	McNary	Smoot	Wolcott

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. CALDER] is detained away from Washington on account of illness. I ask to have this announcement stand for all roll calls and quorum calls for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. MOSES, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. SMITH of Georgia answered to their names when called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the order of the Senate.

After some delay, Mr. KNOX, Mr. NELSON, Mr. KENDRICK, Mr. HARRISON, Mr. TRAMMELL, and Mr. ELKINS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

After a little further delay, Mr. WATSON, Mr. PAGE, Mr. CUMMINS, and Mr. GRONNA entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Forty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The roll call that was had upon the pending amendment, which developed the fact that there was no quorum present, lacked, as I remember the numbers voting upon either side, but 2 or 3 votes of a quorum. As I recollect the roll call, it stood 8 for the amendment and 39 against it. Am I right as to the figures?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that there were 30 votes against the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that shows, Mr. President, that a new roll call would not develop any possibility of my securing the adoption of this amendment, and I think it probably shows the sentiment of the Senate with regard to it; and as it probably would be impossible upon a roll call repeated upon that amendment to develop a quorum at this hour of the day, I will, if permitted to do so under the rules, withdraw my demand for a roll call, and let the vote as made already in the record stand as the sentiment of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the demand by which the yeas and nays were ordered be withdrawn. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; the demand is withdrawn, and there will be no roll call.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield. I have some further amendments to offer, but I do not expect to demand roll calls upon those amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. Would it not be the proper thing now to have the Senate act upon the Senator's amendment? There has been no final decision. If the Chair will put the question now upon the Senator's amendment, the Senate can vote upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be the regular order, unless the Senator from Wisconsin yields to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for a vote upon the pending amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to strike out section 18 of the bill. The question is on agreeing to that amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have some other amendments which I wish to present and have a viva voce vote upon completing the record, but I have agreed to yield the floor to offer an opportunity for the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr HARRIS] to present one or two amendments which he has to present and upon which he desires a vote at this time.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 33 add the following section:

SEC. 39. That section 7 of an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, as amended, is hereby amended by adding thereto the following paragraph:

"No stockholder of any corporation or any association engaged in commerce and producing or refining petroleum, or any of the by-products thereof, shall acquire or control, directly or indirectly, the whole or any part of the stock or other share capital of any other corporation or association so engaged, when both of such corporations or associations have been created or formed in compliance with a decree or judgment of dissolution issued by a court of competent jurisdiction, or in avoidance of a prosecution previously initiated under the provisions of this act or the antitrust laws."

Any person who shall violate this section shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 and by imprisonment for not less than six months.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, a few years ago, when I was a member of the Federal Trade Commission, complaints were made all over the country about discriminations in the price of gasoline. In the Indiana territory, which is controlled by the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, they were selling gasoline at 5 cents a gallon less than in other States near by. The reason for this was that there were independents in that territory who were competing with them, and the Standard wanted to destroy them. There are about a dozen Standard Oil companies, and it was found that there was no law to prevent this discrimination. The Standard of Indiana, or any of the other Standard companies, could lower the price in their territory, and all the other Standard companies in the other sections of the country would raise the price so as to make up the loss. The Federal Trade Commission could do nothing to protect the people, because 70 per cent of the stock of all the dozen Standard companies is owned by the same people. There is no competition among the dozen Standard Oil companies. They all work as one. That is what the investigation disclosed. There is 52 per cent of the stock of all the Standard companies owned by about 16 people.

The purpose of the proposed amendment is to prevent the stockholders who own these different companies from selling their stock to the other stockholders of the Standard companies and to make the 12 companies independent as the present stockholders dispose of their stock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 33 add the following section:

SEC. 40. That section 2 of an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, as amended, is hereby amended by adding thereto the following paragraph:

"It shall be unlawful for any corporation or association engaged in commerce and producing or refining petroleum or any of the by-products thereof, either directly or indirectly, to sell or offer for sale any petroleum or by-product thereof, within the United States or any Territory thereof, or the District of Columbia, or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, at a different price than that at which the same grade or quality of petroleum or by-product thereof is sold or offered for sale by any other corporation or association so engaged when the stockholders of such corporation or association own or control 25 per cent or more of the stock or share capital of such other corporation or association, nor shall any such corporation or association discriminate in price in the same of different communities: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price between purchasers of commodities on account of differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodity sold, or that makes only due allowance for difference in the cost of selling or transportation: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall prevent corporations or associations engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers in bona fide transactions and not in restraint of trade."

Any person who shall violate this section shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000 and by imprisonment for not less than six months.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, this amendment is to prevent the Standard Oil Co. from getting around the provisions of the Clayton Act. The Clayton Act, in the way it is drawn, really protects the monopoly, the Standard Oil Co., the way the subsidiary companies are divided. This will require all the companies to sell at the same price, so that if there is an independent in one territory the Standard can not lower the price and put him out of business, and thereby eliminate competition. It is to require all the Standard companies to have the same price all over the country.

Mr. GORE. I should like to ask the Senator if the amendment is confined to petroleum and its products passing in interstate commerce?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes; it is an amendment applying to interstate commerce.

Mr. LENROOT. The language of the amendment is "engaged in commerce."

Mr. HARRIS. But in the Clayton Act the term "commerce" is described and defined to mean interstate commerce.

Mr. GORE. Does it say petroleum of the same grade and quality?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes; and its by-products.

Mr. GORE. It seems to me that petroleum of various qualities could be sold at various prices.

Mr. HARRIS. No; it says that it must be of the same grade and quality; be sold at the same price.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have one amendment to perfect the bill. I send the amendment to the desk. It is to conform to the amendment on page 16, line 4, adopted the other day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "structure," in line 12, on page 16, the last word in the line, insert "but not more than 3,200 acres."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 18, beginning with line 1, strike out all of section 19, including lines 1 to 7, inclusive, on page 19.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, in line 16, at the end of the line insert the following proviso:

And provided further, That licensees must at all times furnish their products to the United States and to the public at reasonable prices.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will just change one word in the amendment, I see no reason why it should not be adopted. Instead of "licensees" insert the word "lessees," because there are no licensees.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that is a misprint. Of course, it should be "lessees."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment as modified will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, line 16, at the end of the line insert the following proviso:

And provided further, That lessees must at all times furnish their products to the United States and to the public at reasonable prices.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, line 19, after the word "reserve," insert the following:

Which claimant would be entitled to a patent except for said withdrawal.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, line 17, strike out after the word "however" all of line 17 down to and including line 8, on page 18, and insert:

That none of the provisions of this section or of this act shall be applicable to or affect the lands or minerals included within the limits of any naval petroleum reserve.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, line 21, after the period strike out the balance of that line down to and including line 24.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I move the adoption of the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, line 3, after the word "saved," strike out all of line 3 and down to and including line 12, inclusive, the balance of the paragraph.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 29, beginning with line 17, strike out all of section 30, including lines 1 and 2, on page 30, and insert in lieu thereof the following section:

SEC. 30. That any breach of the provisions of this act, or of the lawful rules and regulations issued under authority of this act, or of the terms and conditions of the lease, shall, if established and declared by a court decree and if not cured in obedience to such decree, work a forfeiture to the United States as follows:

(a) Such breach of the prohibition hereof that no alien may own any interest in a lease hereunder shall work a forfeiture only of such interest thus owned by an alien.

(b) Such breach of the prohibition of section 26 hereof against holding leases, or interests in leases acquired hereunder, so that the aggregate combined holding of such leases or interests in leases of the respective kinds of mineral shall exceed in the aggregate an amount equivalent to the maximum number of acres allowed to any one lessee under this act shall work a forfeiture only of the interest or interests in leases acquired hereunder thus held in such violation of the conditions of said section 26.

(c) Any other such breach shall, unless cured, work a forfeiture of the lease and leasehold involved and also of the fixed improvements of the lessee thereon and directly connected therewith.

If the Secretary of the Interior shall notify the lessee or the holder of a prohibited interest in any lease that he considers there has been such a breach, and if the lessee or holder of the prohibited interest shall not cure such alleged breach within a reasonable time specified in such notice, not less than 10 days after the service thereof, the Attorney General shall, upon request of the Secretary of the Interior, bring proceedings against the lessee in the name of the United States, by bill in equity, for forfeiture of the forbidden interest or interests, or of the lease and leasehold and fixed improvements of the lessee directly connected therewith, as the case may be, and for such other relief as may be appropriate; and if the court shall find that such breach has been committed and has not been cured, it shall decree (1) the interest thus illegally owned by an alien, or (2) the ownership interest in a lease acquired hereunder, which, combined with ownership interest in another lease or other leases acquired hereunder, creates for one party an aggregate interest in more than the maximum number of acres allowed hereby, or (3) the lease and the leasehold, together with the fixed improvements thereof (each case as it corresponds, respectively, to cases (a), (b), and (c), identified above in this section), forfeited to the United States, unless on or before a date stated in any such decree the breach be cured by action, payment, and cessation of action, as required by the decree; and failing such action, payment, and cessation of action within the time specified in the decree, the Secretary of the Interior shall forthwith, in cases (1) and (2) provided directly above in this section, take possession in the name of the United States of the interest or interests declared forfeit by the decree and dispose of it or them to a qualified party or parties, and in case (3) enter upon and assume full control of said leasehold and said fixed improvements, and in case (3) he shall lease said forfeited leasehold to another qualified lessee by advertisement and bidding on the basis of a bonus to be paid above the same royalty, rentals, terms, and conditions provided for in the forfeited lease, securing through such new leasing as high a cash bonus representing the value of the leasehold, including the fixed improvements thereof, as practicable: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior, upon disposal, or lease, to a qualified party as above required shall, after deducting the costs of suit and sale, pay over the balance of the sales price in cases (1) and (2) and the balance of the bonus in case (3): And provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed to preclude the United States or any lessee or owner of an interest in a lease hereunder from instituting and prosecuting to a conclusion any other court action otherwise lawfully permissible, or taking any other lawful course or steps to enforce and protect their respective interests and rights with respect to any lease issued hereunder.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have two or three short amendments upon which votes have been had in the Committee of the Whole, I understand, and I shall offer them when the bill is in the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk as a substitute for the pending bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Utah will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a substitute for the bill the following:

That the public lands, property of the United States, within the several States, which have not been acquired or reserved for the public or special uses of the Government of the United States, together with all rights, jurisdiction, privileges, and sovereignty appertaining thereto, or heretofore exercised or enjoyed by the Government of the United States with respect thereto, are hereby ceded, granted, and confirmed severally to the particular States within the territorial boundaries of which such unreserved public lands may severally lie and be situated, upon the condition, however, that no State shall grant any of said land to corporations or grant to exceed 2,500 acres to any one person: Provided, That if any State shall make any grant prohibited by this act, or if any corporation, association, person, or combination of persons shall come into possession of to exceed 2,500 acres of said lands in contravention of this act, such lands acquired shall revert to the United States.

SEC. 2. That there is excepted from this grant all particular tracts of land which have been entered pursuant to law and for which the rights of entrymen or claimants may have been initiated, vested, or accrued. Upon the relinquishment, however, of the right of the claimant or entryman to any such lands, the same shall be subject to the operation of the grant made by this act.

SEC. 3. That the grant made by this act shall take effect as to the lands within any particular State when the legislature of such State shall by resolution accept the grant made by this act and shall deposit such resolution with the Secretary of the Interior. Resolutions of acceptance shall be made within four years after the date of the approval of this act.

Upon the receipt of a resolution of acceptance from a particular State the Secretary of the Interior shall deliver to such State such maps, records, books, and documents, or certified copies thereof, as may be necessary or convenient for the enjoyment, control, use, administration, or disposition of such lands.

SEC. 4. That the grant hereby made shall be subject to the right of holders of outstanding land script, heretofore issued by the United States, to locate such lands in satisfaction of such script; but such locations shall be made before the lands herein granted shall pass to private proprietors.

SEC. 5. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to Alaska or to the Hawaiian or Philippine Islands.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I can not bring myself to support the pending measure. I believe the time has come to settle the public-land question and to settle it in an effective and rational manner. The substitute which I have offered will accomplish, if it becomes a law, this greatly to be desired result. The cession by the Federal Government to the States of the land of the public domain within their borders as provided in the substitute which I have offered will settle this question which has proven so vexatious for many years. The lateness of the hour precludes that full and complete discussion of the bill now before us which fastens the leasing system upon the Nation which its importance demands, nor will time permit me to analyze the substitute which I have offered and to point out in detail the benefits which I insist will be derived if it shall be enacted into law.

Senators who have spoken upon the pending measure, as well as those who discussed the bill containing substantially the same provisions at the last session of Congress, have presented widely divergent views. I remember that when this leasing system was under discussion during the preceding session of Congress a number of Senators who announced their purpose to support it expressed their disapproval of any Federal leasing policy. I think a number of Senators who have announced their purpose to support the pending bill are dissatisfied with its provisions but feel impelled to support it because of their inability to secure, as they believe, wiser and saner and better legislation. There has been some opposition to the bill based upon entirely different grounds. It has been contended vigorously by some that this measure is too liberal to the general public and does not reserve sufficient power in the General Government to deal with the lands which are to be leased. It would seem, therefore, that the bill, which has occupied the Senate for some time, suits but few and is unsatisfactory to many. Doubtless it will pass the Senate and possibly receive the approval of the House, and yet I am constrained to believe that it will prove to be imperfect, unwise, and injurious legislation.

Mr. President, the pending measure is the apotheosis of iconoclasm. It exhibits no respect for past legislation or the well-conceived and highly beneficial mining system under which we have operated for more than half a century. It is doubtful whether the American people appreciate the provisions of this bill or the radical departure which it announces from existing policies. It can not be successfully maintained that a hateful landlordism exercised by a government is without precedent; therefore opponents of this bill do not justify their opposition to it upon the ground that legislation of this character is an untried experiment. If time permitted, it could be demonstrated that governmental control not only of mines and mining properties, but of other matters relating to the activities and relations of the people, was common in nations of antiquity as well as in medieval and modern times. But I respectfully submit that such control, whether exercised with strong hand or by an oppressive bureaucracy or in a generous and benevolent way, was productive of evil to the state and was a disadvantage to the people. There has been in all governments and in all ages a struggle between the forces that sought for social justice, individual growth and progress, and emancipation from tyrannous forms of government—whether they found expression in unlimited monarchies, in oligarchies, or in despotic, paternalistic, and bureaucratic systems—and the crystallized and reactionary forms of human creation. Perhaps no forms of government have been more hateful, more oppressive, more benumbing in their effects than those in which bureaus and officialdom and myriads of governmental parasites and functionaries swarmed throughout the land to harass and oppress the people and to eat up their substance. Certainly no more wasteful or costly form of government has ever been devised than one which is dominated by bureaucrats.

The governing forces of the world have often adopted various methods of maintaining authority and subjecting the masses to their selfish and oppressive policies. As indicated, a favorite form of government has involved the ownership or the control of property by the government, and has rested upon the concept that the people were blind instruments to be used and fashioned as rulers and leaders willed. History furnishes examples of governments adopting paternalistic policies and treating the people as tenants. It is an unnatural relation to superimpose upon a people where the government becomes a landlord and the people become tenants. The legitimate functions of government do not lead it into the fields of landlordism. The progressive forces of democracy which have upon a hundred battle fields fought for liberty look with disfavor upon bureaucracy and governmental landlordism in republics as well as in other forms of government. It is an axiom now, as it has been in the past, that that government is best which governs least. There is a fallacious belief in the land to-day that the form of government is determined by the label which it wears, and that the pronouncement that a nation is a democracy—a government of the people—is a sufficient assurance that it performs that sacred task in the world. These generalizations may be deemed irrelevant to the discussion of the pending bill, and yet an analysis of the measure and a consideration of the vital change which it makes in existing law have led me to submit these observations. There is a persistent movement in our country to-day to strengthen the hands of the Federal Government and to vest in it the ownership not only of public utilities but substantially all forms of property, and commit to it the control of economic and industrial forces which, in my opinion, if liberty and progress are to be realized, must be within the hands of the people themselves. It has been paradoxical to me that, with the open pages of the past and the knowledge that liberty and political and economic freedom have been realized only through the development of a strong individualism and a rational competitive system, there should be those who would reverse the ship of progress and turn it back upon a dark and perilous course. There can be dangers in democracies as well as in monarchies. A tyrannous paternalism, a hateful landlordism, a baneful bureaucracy may lift their heads in a representative democracy and undermine the foundations upon which the most enlightened governments rest.

This Republic suffers from bureaucratic influences. The States themselves are creating thousands of unnecessary offices and taxing the people to support an army of unnecessary employees. The hand of the county, the municipality, the State, and the National Government is encountered everywhere. Conflicts in jurisdictions bring discord and contention. Commissions, agencies, governmental instrumentalities, departments, bureaus, so numerous as to be unnamed, jostle one another in every corner of our land. Ordinances, regulations, statutes, executive proclamations and decrees fill uncounted and almost uncountable volumes. They are as unknown to the people in many instances as the decrees of the Roman Emperor, which were posted so secretly and in such inconspicuous places as to be beyond the power of the people to ascertain. Every local evil or supposed evil calls for regulations and rules and orders and ordinances and statutes and an army of new officials. Bureaus and agencies and departments and commissions and legislative and executive instrumentalities are provided to promulgate more orders and more regulations and to bring confusion and discord to communities and a despotic paternalism to individuals and to States. Many assume that the day has dawned in which functionaries and bureaus and executive flunkies and functionaries rule and govern the land. One of the great Commonwealths of this Nation, as I am advised, has organized more than a hundred and fifty commissions and State agencies for the administration of the laws of the State, and the Federal Government is fast surpassing the record of the State referred to. We are creating Federal organizations and agencies and bureaus and executive instrumentalities not by the scores but, indeed, by the hundreds. We are creating Federal positions, to be filled by people drawn from useful and gainful employment, not by the thousands but by the tens of thousands. And as this vast army of employees is strengthened in its numbers its voice becomes more powerful in making demands upon the Federal Government. This bill which we are now considering augments the authority and power of executive agencies, and will call for the organization of more bureaus or instrumentalities and, of course, demand the creation of hundreds, if not thousands, of additional positions to be filled by the constantly growing army that seeks life positions in the service of the Government. The machinery which this bill, if enacted into law, will require can not fully be apprehended, but I venture the prediction that there will be provided numerous agencies and departmental machinery of immense proportions and additional employees who will be numbered by the thousands.

Let me say, in passing, that there must be retrenchment in the Government and determined efforts made to practice economies in the administration of the forces of the Government. We have become drunken as the result of the war with the expenditures made by our Government. We have, during the past two years, been so occupied in building governmental machinery and creating Federal agencies and providing for the demands of the war that we have not been able as yet to withdraw our eyes from the picture which is passing and to visualize the conditions of the present. There must be economy, and still more economy. The insidious efforts so constantly made to project the Government into fields of activity not within its legitimate sphere of influence should be opposed with vigor and with patriotic service. Frenzied and hysterical pleas are being made and will doubtless be continued for Federal intervention within the States and to secure Federal aid in matters of a purely domestic and private character. Persistent efforts are being made to pervert the functions of the Government and to constitute it an overlord with respect to matters and concerns that have no relation whatever to the functions and powers of the Federal Government. We marshaled our armies to defeat an autocratic power that had been builded upon the ruins of individualism. The German Government had become a militaristic power and a paternalistic government under which the lives and the services of the people contributed to the power of the State. An efficient government undoubtedly was developed, but the individual was submerged and his efforts ministered only to the aggrandizement of the power of the State. There are those in our midst who seek the development of an omnipotent bureaucracy and paternalistic government whose eyes would peer into every home and whose powerful hands would clutch each individual.

This bill increases the power of the Federal Government. It constitutes it a landlord in dealing with the public domain. It increases the governmental machinery and, as stated, will add thousands to the numberless employees of the Government. It denies the right of American citizens to ever acquire title to any of the deposits of coal, phosphate, sodium, oil, oil shale, or gas lands found upon the public domain of the United States. It places these mineral deposits in the hands of a department and provides for machinery, agencies, and employees to control such deposits and determine the manner of their development. Discretion, which has no limits, and which may be exercised in an arbitrary and tyrannous way, is given to the Secretary of the Interior—which means, of course, that it is conferred upon the satellites and officials and employees and agents and inspectors who will constitute a part of this vast Federal machine. Not only the lands of the character referred to which have been withdrawn from public entry, but all lands containing deposits of the minerals mentioned, are to be forever withdrawn from entry or sale by the Government. The Federal Government is to retain title to millions and tens of millions of acres of land within a few States of the Union—States lying west of the Mississippi River and known as the public-land States. Fifty to eighty per cent of the lands within these States are still owned by the Federal Government, and the efforts of individuals who in good faith have sought to acquire title have been futile in consequence of Executive orders and the interposition of obstacles by executive branches of the Government. These public-land States have been impoverished and their development retarded by the unjust and indeed tyrannous policy pursued by the Government. A campaign covering years has been prosecuted with the utmost vigor by those who sought to prevent the development of the West and to establish an obnoxious system of landlordism with respect to the public lands of the United States. Falsehoods and misrepresentations of the most glaring character have been resorted to in order to inflame the public mind against the West and to create a sentiment in favor of the indefensible bureaucratic system which it is now sought to impose upon the West.

Under the guise of conservation a most vicious and mendacious propaganda has been carried on. Representations have been made that the remaining public lands within the States referred to contain inexhaustible resources, the conservation of which is indispensable to national progress and the perpetuity of the Government. The press and magazines have been filled with the most lurid and fantastic tales respecting the gold and silver and other precious-metal deposits within the public-land States, as well as deposits of coal, phosphate, sodium, oil, and other nonmetalliferous minerals. The most vivid imaginations have been drawn upon to furnish stories of the manner in which the people of the West have robbed the Government and despoiled it of its enormous treasures.

This propaganda has been highly successful and has resulted in the dissemination of the view that the public lands must no longer be free for development, and that the laws under which title in the past had been obtained must be modified or repealed and a system of leasing undertaken by the Federal Government. Any propaganda calculated to present the truth with respect to economic, industrial, political, or governmental problems should be welcomed by the American people; but efforts made, no matter by whom, which conceal the truth or reveal only a portion of the truth, and particularly where they are directed by mischievous charletans or political demagogues, call for condemnation. But the campaign referred to, it is said by some who formerly opposed the leasing system but who are now constrained to support this bill, has so influenced the public mind that legislation of the character embraced in this bill becomes necessary, because no other is possible. I am not persuaded that this view is correct. I believe that ultimately the American people would see the justice and wisdom of a policy transferring to the States the public lands within their borders and would ask for legislation to accomplish that result; but, of course, if this bill shall pass, the National Government is thrust into the States and becomes and assumes the duties of a landed proprietor. The plan which I insist is a wise one may not be carried into effect for many years and until the folly and injustice of the leasing system has become apparent to the people.

One of the visible manifestations of the propaganda to prevent the development of the West was the withdrawal by Executive order of millions of acres of lands containing deposits of coal, phosphate, sodium, oil, oil shale, and gas. For years these lands have been locked up by Executive orders, and legislation for their repeal has not been enacted. The contention is further made that no legislation is possible that will open to entry the mineral deposits embraced within the Executive withdrawal orders. In my opinion, the Executive orders were improvidently issued; indeed in common with practically all lawyers I regarded the acts of withdrawal as arbitrary and in contravention of law.

Mr. President, I assert with the utmost confidence that an examination of the legislation enacted by Congress following the discovery of gold in California, and culminating in the act of 1872, furnishes convincing proof that it was the intention of Congress to throw open to private entry the mineral lands belonging to the United States. The debates attending the passage of the act of 1866 and the act of 1872 establish beyond controversy that Congress believed the welfare of the country would be best served by the development of the public lands of the United States and the opening of the same freely to those who in good faith entered thereon. It is equally clear that the best thought of the Nation approved of a liberal and generous policy in dealing with the nonmineral lands the legal title to which was in the United States. The able statesmen who dealt with the public lands of the United States from an early period in our history to the time of the passage of the homestead, preemption, desert, and enlarged homestead acts had before them the records and experiences of governments where illiberal and restrictive policies had been pursued in the granting of title to individuals, and particularly where a system involving leasing and landlordism had been employed.

With the experiences of the past before them they deliberately enacted laws under which American citizens could obtain title to agricultural and grazing lands without difficulty and at a price that the poorest individual could meet. So also laws were enacted which provided an easy method of obtaining title to the mineral lands of the United States. Not only local courts but Federal courts, including the Supreme Court of the United States, have over and over again spoken in the highest terms of praise concerning the wise and liberal legislation enacted by Congress, and have pointed out the beneficent results that have attended the same. There were some statesmen who advocated a policy in disposing of the public lands that would yield a revenue to the Government. Senator Ewing, of Ohio, proposed a system of seigniorage, the product of the mines going to the Government, from which a portion would then be returned to the miner. But as stated, after full examination of the entire subject and with the history of the past before them, a plan was devised dealing with the mineral lands which I submit was wise and has been of the utmost importance and advantage to the entire people.

Senator Benton, as early as the Thirty-first Congress, as I recall, contended that the Government ought not to undertake to make a revenue out of the mines. He further stated—

> That the United States ought to content herself with getting the wealth out of the bowels of the earth itself, which is now lying so useless; that she ought to content herself with receiving what will pay the expenses of the administration of such a system, and that system ought to be just as simple as it can be made and at the same time preserve order among the miners.

He asserted that he did not believe in the Nation working mines and then added:

> I believe in individuals managing things of this kind, but not nations. I believe the true treasure of every government is the affections of the people, and that the true riches of every nation is the people first and the wealth afterwards that flows from that industry. * * * I therefore wholly object to the whole idea of deriving revenue from these mines. I am in favor of getting what revenue we do get from the gold mines through the secretions of commerce, with no superintendence over the man as to what he digs and no accountability of the digger for what he gets; with nobody to stand over him and say how much he gets and no one to call him to account and tell him what he gets.

The Senator then referred to the experience that our Government had passed through in its attempts to lease mines and then added:

> Have we forgotten the lead mines and salt springs we reserved in Missouri and Illinois? And have we forgotten that when we acquired these countries and heard of the salt springs and lead mines there we were inflamed with the idea of the United States deriving revenue from boiling salt water and digging lead mines? Under that excitement these salt springs and these lead mines were reserved to be leased. What was the result of it? It turned out that the Federal Government was never made for the purpose of boiling salt water or digging lead.

Let me add, Mr. President, that the Federal Government has not changed in its functions or powers since then. If it was not its function or its duty to engage in mining operations then, manifestly it is not its duty now; and if paternalism was obnoxious to our form of government then, it is equally obnoxious now.

Senator Benton proceeds and describes his first legislative work as an endeavor to free Missouri from the incumbrance of the "landlordship" of the United States over the lead mines and salt springs which was harassing the people. He further states:

> I was then joined by some of the fathers of the Republic—by such men as Macon—went against the whole idea of the Government working the mines and making money out of it. We succeeded. The system was broken down in Missouri. The salt springs were given to the State. The lead mines, which had been reserved for lease, were thrown into market and sold, as other public lands, at $1.25 per acre.

He then refers to the discovery of lead mines in the upper Mississippi and continues:

> Our imaginations were inflamed again with the belief that we were to make a great deal of money by leasing out these lead mines. This scheme was adopted. I voted against it. * * * I told the Senate then, as it happened to lead mines of the State of Missouri, so it would happen to the lead mines of upper Mississippi; that this system would be harassing to the people and cramping industry would end with bringing the United States in debt. That turned out to be the fact, for one of the last messages sent to us by President Polk was to recommend the breaking of this system. He showed the amounts requisite to keep up the system, which were enormous, and he recommended the abolition of the system.

Senator Seward, during the discussion, stated that he had voted against a former proposition of Senator Ewing which contemplated seigniorage and revenue to the Government from the operation of the mines, and then said, in substance, that in his view in order to bring to the general public the largest possible acquisition of national wealth from the mineral lands of the United States a liberal policy of obtaining title was necessary.

Mr. President, if time permitted, I should like to read from a message of President Polk, in which he reviews the mineral leasing system and points out its failures and the unwisdom of perpetuating it. He strongly recommended its repeal, and Congress responded to his recommendations. I have also before me the message of President Fillmore, in which he treats of the question of leasing certain of the mineral lands of the United States. He states that after investigation he reached the conclusion that such a policy was unwise and improper. I shall not take the time of the Senate to further call its attention to the strong statements made by two of the Executives of our Government. Let me, however, urge that their experiences and their observations and their final recommendations should receive the most serious attention of the Senate when it is called upon to deal with a similar question at this time. If the leasing system proved so unfortunate and its unwisdom was so emphatically established as to call for the condemnation of Presidents who were familiar with the subject, we ought to hesitate to again fasten upon the Nation a policy which was discredited and which they condemned.

Senator Felch, of Michigan, discussed the question with great ability, and I desire to read a few paragraphs from his able address:

> In the first place, we reserved the lands which had been sold by prior governments, but we have since abolished that system, because it was found impossible to manage these mines. We have lead mines in Missouri and Wisconsin and Illinois, and we commenced upon a system * * * first by granting permits to work these mines and then by reserving to the Government the right of mining where the title to the land was sold.

Senators will recall that the present bill provides a system of permits. The mineral lands covered by this bill may be worked only by making application to the Secretary of the Interior and obtaining a permit for such purpose. It is a revival of a system discredited by experience and condemned by publicists and statesmen in many lands. In each of these instances we have found it necessary to abolish this system, because it has been found impracticable to carry it out and unprofitable to the Government.

When the discovery of the copper mines was made on Lake Superior we reserved to ourselves the right of working them, and that right was afterwards abandoned, because it was supposed to be a right held in derogation of the right of the State and also because it was building up a leasing system and placing a tenantry upon these lands and holding them from local taxation, compelling the authorities of the State to preserve order among these tenants, while not an acre of these lands was taxed to pay for the expenses incurred by the State. In the year 1845 the matter underwent an investigation in the Land Office and in Congress.

Senators in recent years have repeatedly denounced the policy under which millions of acres of public domain were withdrawn from entry. It not only prevents settlement and the legitimate and natural growth of the public-land States, but it subjected the States to unnatural and extraordinary burdens. They had to police the public domain and discharge the responsibilities devolving upon them as sovereign States, while denied the benefits of these unoccupied lands. They were forced to assume the burdens resulting from protecting and policing them. And it must not be forgotten that these lands could not be taxed and the burdens resting upon the inhabitants of the States were and still are, of course, greatly augmented. Those were some of the reasons which appealed to the statesmen in the period when Senator Felch was in the Senate, and led to their repudiation of the principle and policy of Federal leasing and Federal landlordism; they deemed such a policy repugnant to our form of government and in contravention of the rights and the powers of the States.

Senator Felch proceeds:

The agents were all dismissed except one, and a recommendation has been made that he should be dismissed also. In all these cases everything shows that we have never made anything under the mining system and that it is one which must be abandoned.

Senator Felch further contended with great ability for the freedom of entry upon the mineral lands of the Government, and opposed the leasing or any other system which would create additional governmental machinery for the purpose of enforcing the same.

Senator Sherman of Ohio, during the discussion of the mining law of 1866 (Cong. Globe, 39th Cong., p. 3236), stated that it was in the interest of the United States—to get rid of the mineral lands of the United States, to give them into the hands of private individuals, to give them the title by patents in the ordinary way, so that the United States will be divested of all proprietary right over the mines.

He further declared that Benton, Clay, and many of the most eminent statesmen of America held that the title to mineral lands "is of no benefit to the United States. From time to time the principle of disposing of mineral lands, salt mines, iron mines, etc., has been adopted."

He argued that this policy was best for the Nation and tended to the development of the country and to the establishment of fixed and permanent settlements.

A proposition was submitted to the Senate on July 14, 1866, by which the Secretary of the Interior was to be authorized to lease certain saline lands containing mineral springs. The scheme was promptly condemned by Senators and the evils which would result from a leasing policy clearly pointed out. Senator Grimes in discussing the matter (Cong. Globe, 39th Cong., p. 3805) says:

This Government never has and it never ought to become the landlord of a portion of the people of this country. That is not the relation that is encouraged by any of the laws of our States to any considerable extent, and it should not be encouraged by the Government of the United States.

The true liberty, understand, in a republican government is that, so far as possible, every man shall be the owner of his own soil, the owner of his own tools, the owner of his own labor and his own machinery. * * * But so long as you undertake to maintain the relation of landlord and tenant to the persons who are going to carry on these salting works, so long they will remain in an undeveloped state, and the country will never realize a tenth part of the advantage from the salt springs that we would realize if they were conducted by private enterprise alone. That is the experience of this Government; it has been from its foundation; it is the experience of every Government on the face of the earth. All such enterprises as these should be carried on by private energy and by private means, and so long as you allow the man who conducts it to be the owner of the property, so long he will be willing to invest more and more means in the appliances that may be necessary to conduct his business to a successful result.

Senator Conness in opposing the proposition to lease stated that the leasing system was founded upon the monarchical idea and that the "most valuable things belong to the sovereign." He declared that the highest character of ownership resulted when title was in an American citizen. He further says:

The whole system seems to me to be wrong. You are going to institute in one of your departments a power to lease and let a part of the public property to your own citizens, and no such lease, the bill provides, shall be for a longer period than 25 years, and then during the 25 years the lease is to be subjected to readjustment every 5 years by "disinterested referees."

The Interior Department or the Land Office is to appoint referees every five years. Where shall they go? Shall they act in regard to a piece of property that they know nothing about except as they get information from the Land Office, the information coming through a bureau that perhaps knows nothing about it? It appears to me to be very small business for this Government to engage in. It is especially provided, it will be observed, that this bill shall not apply to the section of the country from which I came. We are not to be made tenants. For one, I am very much obliged to the committee for releasing us from such a vassalage.

I wish the committee would release from the vassalage of this bill the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent.

If the saline lands and the mineral springs belonging to the Government are to be leased, why not lease the gold and silver mines? They are of infinitely greater value; they attract the attention of mankind to a greater extent and concentrate the effort of man and the capital that man can bring to the development of natural resources to a greater extent than these more ordinary classes of property.

Following the settlement of California, as I have indicated, the question of dealing with the mineral lands of the United States again challenged the attention of Congress. However, for a number of years there was no legislation, and those who went upon the public domain, in the main, adopted rules and regulations for their protection, and the local courts recognized their validity. Under these regulations property rights were protected, and a system was developed which became the basis of legislative enactment by Western States and Territories and ultimately by the Congress of the United States. Senator Stewart, speaking of these rules and regulations, states that they "challenge the admiration of all who investigate them." These regulations were thoroughly democratic in their character, guarding against every effort of monopoly, and requiring continued work and occupation in good faith to constitute a valid possession. There were no royalties to be paid the Government, no Federal officials, agents, inspectors, no bureaus and offensive espionage by the Government.

The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Jennison v. Kirk (98 U. S., 456), speaking of this situation, said:

In every district which they occupied they framed certain rules for their government. * * * They all recognized discovery followed by possession as the foundation of the possessor's title, and development by working as the condition of its retention. And they were so framed as to secure to all comers within practicable limits absolute equality of rights and privilege of working the mines. Nothing but such equality would have been tolerated by the miners, who were emphatically the lawmakers as respects mining upon the public lands. * * * During the 18 years from 1848 to 1866 the regulations and customs of miners as enforced and molded by the courts and sanctioned by the legislature of the State, constituted the law governing property in mines and in water on the public mineral lands.

I referred a few moments ago to the law of Congress enacted in 1866. This act provides:

That the mineral lands of the public domain, both surveyed and unsurveyed, are hereby declared to be free and open to exploration and occupation by all citizens of the United States, subject to such regulations as may be prescribed by law, and subject to the local customs and rules of miners in the several mining districts so far as the same may not be in conflict with the laws of the United States.

The Supreme Court in the case of Atchison v. Peterson (20 Wall., 512) refers to the occupation of the public lands, and states that "the Government assented thereto and encouraged their free and unrestricted use."

The court further declares in the case of Erhardt v. Boaro (113 U. S., 535) that:

In all the legislation, whether of Congress or of State or Territory, and by all mining regulations and rules, discovery and appropriation are recognized as the sources of title to mining claims, and development by working as the continued ownership until patent is obtained.

Hon. Caleb B. Smith, Secretary of the Interior, in his annual report for 1861, referred to the valuable mineral lands of the United States and combated the view that the occupants thereof should have the free development of their claims. He contended that the lands belonged to the whole people and that the occupants "should pay a reasonable amount as a consideration for the advantages enjoyed."

In 1865, in his report to Congress, the Secretary stated:

Individual proprietorship, it is conceded, would stimulate the development of coal fields, petroleum, deposits of iron, lead, and of other gross metals, and mineral formations. There can therefore be no sufficient reason for withholding such mineral lands from market. Congress has not legislated with a view to securing an income from the product of the precious metals from the public domain. It is estimated that two or three hundred thousand able-bodied men are engaged in such mining operations on the public lands, without authority of law, who pay nothing to the Government for the privilege or for the permanent possession of property worth, in many instances, millions to the claimant.

The existing financial condition of the Nation obviously requires that all our national resources and the product of every industrial pursuit should contribute to the payment of the public debt. The wisdom of Congress must decide whether the public interest would be better promoted by a sale in fee of these mineral lands or by raising a revenue from their annual product.

It will be seen that Secretary Smith desired to obtain revenue from the mineral lands of the United States in order to meet the obligations of the Government incurred as the result of the Civil War, but notwithstanding his appeals as well as the appeals of others that a leasing system or a royalty system should be adopted, Congress refused to depart from the established policy of dealing with the public mineral lands.

The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Ivanhoe Mining Co. v. Consolidated Mining Co. (102 U. S., 167) declared that under the law of 1866 title to mineral lands might be acquired from the Government at nominal prices, and that under such law "the idea of a royalty in the product of the mines was forever relinquished."

The bill now before us for consideration is a repudiation of the utterances of the Supreme Court in the case just referred to.

I have referred to the statements made by Benton and others concerning the leasing measures enacted by Congress at an early day, dealing with the lead deposits and other mineral lands of the United States. The enforcement of these leasing statutes was attended with unsatisfactory results. The people were averse to the supervision provided in the leases and controversies frequently arose, and to execute the laws and the regulations promulgated pursuant thereto a multitude of employees and Federal officials was required. This provoked criticism and of course resulted in great expense. Lessees hesitated to make the improvements that were necessary to properly develop the demised premises. The tenure was insecure and precarious and contingent upon the observance of terms imposed by the Government and enforced by inspectors and officials whose sympathies were with the Government as against the lessees. This situation retarded the development of the lands held by the lessees and culminated in the forfeiture of many leases. It was demonstrated then as it has been wherever a governmental leasing system with respect to mineral lands has been adopted that production entirely ceased or was greatly diminished to the disadvantage of the lessee and the public.

It is possible that a policy looking to the administration of the public lands for the purpose of producing a revenue might be more successful in a highly centralized or despotic government, although, as I have stated, the results from the adoption of a leasing system by the Government or attempts upon the part of the Government to handle its agricultural or mineral lands by means of a tenant system has proven unsuccessful. It has not only failed to return revenues commensurate with the cost but led to conflicts between the Government and its agents and the people directly and indirectly connected with the leases.

Let me submit in passing that such a policy is not suited to our form of government and never can be successful. No State, Mr. President, attempted to assert because of its sovereign powers the doctrine of jura regalia which was a part of the common law. The States entertained the view that the mineral lands should pass into the hands of private individuals under a system that would lead to their development and which did not impose obstacles and impediments thereto. The accepted view was that the products of the mines would make for the benefit of all. The Committee on the Public Lands of the House in January, 1828, pursuant to a resolution calling for an inquiry "into the expedience of repealing such laws of Congress which prohibit the sale of lands in Missouri which contained or are supposed to contain lead mines," reported in effect that the leasing policy or a policy in which the title was retained in the Government had not increased the output, and that veins which had been worked were abandoned by those who were seeking their development. The committee further stated that—> so long as those who work the mines have only a limited and temporary interest in them and are under the necessity of receiving an immediate remuneration from the capital vested in and the labor bestowed upon their mining operations the ore will remain in its natural bed and never be drawn forth to mingle with and increase the aggregate mass of national wealth until subjected to the unimpeded action of exclusive individual interest.

> There is another view of the subject which the committee believe is entitled to great consideration. If all these (mining lands) are to be occupied by tenants of the Government, there would be created a numerous band of dependents, who, however they may affect the General Government, can not but be viewed by the local authorities with distrust and jealousy. A population thus dependent upon the Federal Government and its officers for the continuance of their vocations must of necessity be unsettled and fluctuating, and the product of their temporary and irregular labors will afford a limited compensation for the exclusion from so large a portion of the States of a more settled, permanent, and useful class of citizens. Believing that the laws prohibiting the sale of public lands in Missouri which contain lead mines should be repealed, the committee report a bill.

Following the discovery of America, the Spanish monarchs believed that through the administration by the Government of the mineral lands in America the Spanish treasury would be replenished and a golden stream would flow to Spain to compensate her for her expenditures in the New World. Mr. Fremont has stated that with all the machinery of the Spanish monarchy Spain never received in any one year to exceed $60,000 in royalties. Concessions were made containing the minutest reservations, and documents were signed by representatives of the Crown which were the equivalent of leases, containing provisions with respect to the obligations upon the lessee and the supervisory power of the Crown; yet with these clear and definite provisions no benefits came to Spain. It must not be forgotten that Spain, a despotic nation, with her mighty military forces, was in a position to enforce the terms of the concessions and leases given by her.

Gamboa, the Spanish historian, points out the imperfections of the leasing and royalty system as well as the injustices and wrongs which resulted therefrom. So oppressive had become the system that Mexico, when she emancipated herself from Spain, had practically ceased mineral production. In order to revive the industry, Mexico promptly abolished all taxes and royalties provided by the Spanish law, and miners were relieved from personal contributions as well as from military service, and a reward of $25,000 was decreed to be paid to each of the first four operators who would produce a given amount of quicksilver.

The leasing system, in which the Government was the lessor, has always proven odious. We tolerate individuals as landlords but resent governmental landlordism. Let me say in passing that the efforts by the States to lease mineral lands owned by them have not been attended with unqualified success. But it must be conceded that the States could more readily and perhaps in a more satisfactory manner enforce a leasing system. There is a wide difference between a local State landlord and a national authority 3,000 miles distant.

In Senate Document No. 482, published during the Sixty-third Congress, may be found an article by Mr. Thomas P. McDonald on the leasing of coal mines. He concedes that the leasing system is a radical departure from the past policy of our Government. Drawing attention to the leases of school lands in the State of Colorado, he states that during a period of 12 years only 13 coal mines were under lease. That the average production of the leased properties for the year 1912 was 485,971 tons, while the total production of the State for the same year was 10,157,383 tons. In conclusion he says that—

> After 12 years' experience in leasing coal lands Colorado has just one coal mine of commercial importance under operation under lease from the State.

He further states that Montana has a law authorizing the leasing of State lands with a royalty of only 10 cents per ton, and that only eight leases have been given, and that in 1912 the total production from these leased properties was 26,668 tons. The same year, however, Montana produced more than 3,000,000 tons of coal.

In the year 1909 there were mined by the owners of coal lands within the United States 334,669,298 tons. The owners also leased adjoining lands from which were produced the same year 42,929,197 tons. During the same year, though there were numerous lessees throughout the United States, the total output from properties operated by them was only 82,943,651 tons. This would seem to indicate that even where there is no supervision by the Government, where the leases are between individuals, the production from leased properties is unsatisfactory. And the reason of this must be obvious to all thinking people. The highest results are found when the mines and genius and enterprise of the individuals find a free field for their activities. The great achievements in our country in every branch of industry and commerce have resulted from the opportunities given for individual initiative and development. The worker of to-day becomes the proprietor of the morrow.

Senators will remember that ingenious and eloquent pleas were made in support of a proposition to lease the coal lands of Alaska. The demands of the Pacific coast as well as of the Orient for coal were well known, and it was earnestly contended that the Executive order of 1906 which locked up the coal and oil lands of Alaska should be modified. As stated, a leasing bill was passed under which those who have insisted that the Government should adopt this system of landlordism promised a demonstration of the wisdom and benefits of the leasing policy. The result has been very disappointing to the advocates of such system. The report of the Secretary of the Interior for the year ending June 30, 1917, establishes the infirmities of the plan as it was administered in Alaska. The part referred to is as follows:

> The statement that the people of Alaska have borne more handicaps than any other people who have pioneered new, undeveloped territory, at least on the North American Continent, has been so often made that it has become trite. Nevertheless it is true. If the best portions of the far West had been reserved, if the pioneers had been forbidden to make use of those natural resources which they found at hand, and penalized if they attempted to use them, is it reasonable to suppose that the Middle West and the far West would have produced many great Commonwealths within a comparatively short time?
> Conservation, which is defined as the act of preserving, maintaining, supporting, or protecting, is, no doubt, sound in principle; but conservation as applied to Alaska, while it has preserved coal, oil, and timber, has largely estopped development along these lines. The coal lands of Alaska were reserved by Executive order in 1906, and the oil lands some years later, and there has been no general development of either coal or oil resources. Coal is mined to-day only on a small scale and oil development is at a standstill. The need of coal such as is found in Alaska is apparent all over the Pacific coast, yet the production is limited and confined to but one section of the Territory. The same is true of oil. There is no doubt that the coal areas of Alaska are capable of supplying sufficient quantities of coal for all domestic and industrial purposes of the Pacific coast regions were they developed commercially, and if the oil lands of the Territory could be properly developed they would largely add to the supply of gasoline.

This system of landlordism—of bureaucracy—as I have stated, was urged by some at the time the law of 1866 was enacted. As I remember, there was no advocacy of it when the law of May, 1872, was passed. The act last referred to declared "that all mineral deposits in land belonging to the United States are hereby open to exploration and purchase, and the lands in which they are found to occupation and purchase."

I need only point to the West in demonstration of the truth of the statement that the liberal policy adopted by our Government with respect to its agricultural and mineral lands has been of immeasurable advantage to this Nation. The greater portion of the territory acquired under the Louisiana Purchase, and that which was subsequently ceded to the United States by the treaty of Guadaloupe Hidalgo, was regarded as of but little value. Webster and other great statesmen characterized this great domain as worthless deserts and alkali plains and forbidding mountains. But virile, courageous men and women from the East struck boldly into these deserts and waste places and mountain fastnesses, and with the intrepid spirit which has guided the Anglo-Saxon race they laid the foundations of cities and Commonwealths.

The homestead, desert, and preemption acts enabled them to acquire agricultural lands. They constructed dams and built canals and turned the streams from canyons and mountain sides upon the baked and parched earth and into the sterile and desert valleys. Fruits and all kinds of agricultural crops were produced and towns and cities were builded and community life established. These brave and courageous pioneers carried with them the laws and customs and civilization of the States from which they came; they established law and order and the American system of jurisprudence and prepared peoples for the responsibilities of statehood. They located upon mineral lands and poured into the channels of trade gold and silver, copper and lead, and the other metals and minerals found therein. They opened up coal mines from which their local and domestic needs were supplied. The chapter of our Nation's history devoted to the West and to its achievements is a glorious one and will ever be read with pride and satisfaction by patriotic Americans.

Who can successfully challenge the wisdom of the legislation enacted by the Congress of the United States which dealt with the public lands, agricultural and mineral? And yet there are some who seek to create the impression that the policy was wrong and was dictated by those who sought monopoly and to serve selfish ends. There is no monopoly of land in these great States of which I speak. The people own the lands—the farms, the ranches, and many of the mines.

In later years some copper properties and other mineral grounds have passed into the hands of large corporations. This was brought about principally because of the great cost incident to the development of the properties. Unproductive properties and mines which not only paid no dividends but resulted in enormous losses to their owners became profitable only when millions were expended to construct railroads, to improve mills and other reduction works, and to operate them upon a scale which permitted improved economies. This required large capital and called for the investment of millions. However, there is competition among the various mining properties of the character referred to, and for years lead was sold upon the market for prices that resulted in closing down many mines. The same is true of copper, silver, and many other properties in the West.

I think, generally speaking, it may be said that there is less of monopoly or of great holdings in agricultural and mineral lands in the West than in other parts of our country.

I believe that a repressive policy, a hateful leasing, bureaucratic policy, would have still found the West in solitude and sterility. It is a fallacy to suppose that the products of the mines are monopolized or held or enjoyed only by a few. Like the blood that circulates freely throughout the system, so the mineral wealth that comes from mountain and valley, fructifies the entire Nation and benefits the entire world. The copper and the lead, the iron and the coal, all these minerals dug from the earth, can not be monopolized; they must go out into the world and add to the common stock of the people's possessions.

The Senator from Wisconsin has repeatedly stated in the address which he has just concluded that the coal lands of the United States are controlled by monopolies, and he expressed opposition to the pending measure upon the ground that it will be favorable to a monopoly of the minerals referred to therein. I am inclined to agree with the Senator that there is a monopoly of the anthracite coal mines in the United States. The area in which anthracite coal is found is so restricted that its acquisition by a few individuals or corporations was a comparatively easy task. I am advised, however, that these lands lying in Pennsylvania were acquired many years ago for agricultural purposes, and the anthracite deposits were not known and their value not appreciated when the title to the lands passed to private individuals. The bituminous coal deposits of the United States, however, are very extensive and are found in many States of the Union. A monopoly of this character of coal has been impossible. My opinion is that bituminous coal has been sold at prices much less in the United States than any other country in the world. For instance, in 1911 New Zealand produced 2,066,073 tons of coal. This was sold at the mines for more than $2 per ton. The output of coal in Nova Scotia in 1910 was 6,208,244 tons, and the price at the mines was $2.01 per ton. In Illinois, in 1911, there were mined 53,679,118 tons, which were sold at the mine for $1.11 per ton. The output of coal mined in Indiana for the same year sold at the mine at $1.08 per ton, and Pennsylvania production was sold at $1.01 per ton. The output of the Ohio mines brought $1.03 at the mine; and West Virginia's output was sold for 90 cents at the mine.

Mr. McDonald states that in Australia, New Zealand, and Nova Scotia "the price of coal at the pit mouth during the past 20 years has ranged from $1.75 to $2.25 per ton, while in our great bituminous coal districts the price of coal at pit mouth has ranged from 90 cents to $1.11 per ton." From these figures it is apparent that notwithstanding the higher costs of labor in the United States, coal was sold much cheaper than in any other coal-producing countries of the world. The fact is that there was the most active competition between the coal operators, and the price of coal was such that in many instances but little, if any, profits were made.

Mr. President, monopolies and trusts and conspiracies in restraint of trade are hateful to the American people, and if the statutes of the States and the Federal Government are insufficient to deal with these evils, additional measures should speedily be enacted. Most of the States have broad, comprehensive antitrust statutes, and if enforced would prove effectual against the rapacities of some of the monopolistic corporations operating in this country. Unfortunately, these statutes have not always been invoked against trusts and illegal combinations. A few States have vigorously enforced their laws against monopolies and trusts, and the results have been most salutary. The Sherman antitrust law has proven a powerful weapon against monopolies, and the Federal Trade Commission possesses power to point out monopolistic evils and to correct the same.

Mr. President, it is unfortunately true that there are monopolies and combinations in restraint of trade existing in the United States. Some of them secretly and in devious ways attempt to evade the law, while others defy its provisions. Our economic theory rests upon the proposition that there shall be competition. When manufacturers combine to increase prices or when monopolies are formed to interrupt the natural and normal processes of business and trade and commerce, the criminal statutes of the land should be invoked and the offenders should receive condign punishment.

There is no question but what during the war there were unpatriotic people who sought to make profit out of the situation. They robbed and plundered our Allies and they robbed and plundered their own Government. In my opinion, the high prices in some commodities are in part attributable to the selfish, callous, and wicked course followed by some of the producers and manufacturers and organizations in our country. I believe that there are some corporations and individuals who are profiting now by raising the prices of food products to heights that are wholly unjustifiable. They are taking advantage of conditions and are despoiling the people.

It is to be hoped that those who administer the revenue laws of the States and of the Nation will lay their hands upon these individuals and corporations and see that they pay the taxes demanded by the law. I am convinced that efforts are made by some corporations to escape excess-profits taxes and legitimate burdens placed upon them by the Government. The profiteer and monopolist, the man or the corporation that seeks to impose upon the people, should be haled into the courts and dealt with in a stern and relentless manner.

I have stated that the wise and liberal policy adopted by the Government in dealing with its agricultural and mineral lands has not produced the evils of which complaint is made. The agricultural lands that have been acquired since the homestead and preemption and desert entry acts were enacted are in the hands of the people. Monopolies and trusts do not own them. Farmers and stock growers possess these lands and have their homes thereon. Those who acquired the lands were pioneers or the children of the sturdy and courageous Americans who sought fortune in the wild and unpropitious surroundings of the West. The history of the development of the mineral lands upon the public domain is full of dramatic interest. Thousands of brave adventuresome men went into the mountain ravines and the desert wastes and searched for the mineral wealth hidden from mortal ken. Many of them gave their lives in the quest for wealth, and their bodies sleep in forgotten spots or their bleached bones are found upon the mountain sides or in the parched valleys that know no life. The men of the West believed that the public lands should be free to those who were willing to enter thereon and develop them. A leasing system would have rested upon the West like the hand of death. A leasing system controlled by a bureaucracy 3,000 miles away would have killed the initiative, the fighting, sporting spirit of the American people who went into the West, and it would have condemned to solitude the great empire within which are what is known as the public-land States. There are some who oppose this bill because they deem it too favorable to lessees. There are others who under the banner of conservation would have locked up all public lands and over the door placed a legend forbidding entrance therein.

Mr. President, the title to the public lands is held by the Federal Government in trust for the people. The Government's title is that of a trustee only, and the lands should go to the people and should be placed within the reach of the people. It was never the intention of the fathers of this Republic that the Federal Government should be a vast proprietor and that the people should be its servants and tenants.

It was stated in the Supreme Court, in the case of Pollard's Lessee v. Hogan (13 How., 212), that—

> The United States never held any municipal sovereignty, jurisdiction, or right of soil in and to the territory of which Alabama or any of the new States were formed, except for temporary purposes, and to execute the trusts created by the acts of the Virginia and Georgia Legislatures, and the deeds of cession executed by them to the United States, and the trust created by the treaty with the French Republic of the 30th of April, 1803, ceding Louisiana. * * *
> When Alabama was admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States she succeeded to all the rights of sovereignty, jurisdiction, and eminent domain which Georgia possessed at the date of the cession, except so far as this right was diminished by the public lands remaining in the possession and under the control of the United States for the temporary purposes provided for in the deed of cession and the legislative act connected with it. Nothing remained to the United States, according to the terms of the agreement, but the public lands. And if an express stipulation had been inserted in the agreement granting the municipal right of sovereignty and eminent domain to the United States, such stipulation would have been void and inoperative, because the United States have no constitutional capacity to exercise municipal jurisdiction, sovereignty, or eminent domain within the limits of a State or elsewhere, except in the cases in which it is expressly granted.

In the case of Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S., 46) the court states that—> the Government of the United States is one of enumerated powers; that it has no inherent powers of sovereignty; that the enumeration of powers granted is to be found in the Constitution of the United States and in that alone; that all powers not granted are reserved to the people. While Congress has general legislative jurisdiction over the Territories and may control the flow of waters in their streams, it has no power to control a like flow within the limits of a State except to preserve or improve the navigability of the stream; that the full control over those waters is vested in the State.

I respectfully submit that it was not contemplated by the founders of this Government that the Federal Government should exercise proprietary rights and control over lands within the States except such as were needed for governmental purposes. As stated in the Pollard's lessee case just referred to, the United States never held "municipal sovereignty, jurisdiction, or right of soil except for temporary purposes and to execute a trust." It is true Alabama was organized from territory ceded by the State of Georgia, but the Supreme Court states that even if there had been stipulations in the grant under which the municipal right of sovereignty and eminent domain were conferred upon the United States, such stipulation would have been "void and inoperative."

Under our form of government the United States has no municipal jurisdiction or sovereignty within the limits of a State. It was not designed that the Federal Government should hold lands for an indefinite period or in perpetuity as a proprietor and lease them at will and pleasure to those who were willing to enter thereon as tenants, and such a policy, I submit, is at variance with the spirit and genius of our institutions and of our form of government. There was no attempt when the Constitution was formed to deprive the States of jurisdiction or control over the lands within their borders. It is true that a number of the States by various grants conveyed large areas of territory out of which other States were carved by the revolutionary government, but such was done in trust for the inhabitants of the ceded territory and with the understanding that the States formed should be admitted into the Union on the same footing as the 13 original States. Those who lived within the thirteen original States were unwilling to convey to the Federal Government the territory within the boundaries which they fixed and prescribed for their respective States. They reserved to the States themselves the right to control and dispose of the unoccupied and public lands found therein. They were unwilling that the Federal Government should come into the States and exercise municipal and sovereign authority and power with respect to the public lands or the domestic affairs of the people. They believed that to have two sovereignties operating within the States in the manner proposed by the bill now before us would cause friction and tend to alienate the affections of the people from the parent Government as well as establish a system that would be hostile to the best interests of the States and the welfare and development of the people therein. They appreciated that if the Federal Government owned as a proprietor unoccupied lands within the States it would feel constrained to enact criminal statutes for the purpose of protecting the lands and would set up a system of government which might come in conflict with the government of the States or at least result in controversies and be provocative of ill feeling and resentments. They were unwilling that the United States should have proprietary interest within the States and be empowered to dispose of such lands in any manner that it saw fit. And there is no question but what they understood that the States that were to be constructed from the lands ceded or from lands that might subsequently be acquired should possess the same authority, control, and ownership over the public lands found therein when admitted into the Union. They did not understand that the Federal Government, being a Government of enumerated and limited power, should exercise municipal authority or sovereignty over the lands within the States.

President Jackson, in a message to Congress, December 4, 1833, uses this language:

> By the facts here collected from the early history of our Republic it appears that the subject of the public lands entered into the elements of its institutions. It was only upon condition that those lands should be considered as common property, to be disposed of for the benefit of the United States, that some of the States agreed to come into a "perpetual union." The States claiming those lands acceded to those views and transferred their claims to the United States upon certain specific conditions, and on those conditions the grants were accepted. These solemn compacts, invited by Congress in a resolution declaring the purposes to which the proceeds of these lands should be applied, originating before the Constitution and forming the basis on which it was made, bound the United States to a particular course of policy in relation to them by ties as strong as can be invented to secure the faith of nations.
> The Constitution did not delegate to Congress the power to abrogate these compacts. On the contrary, by declaring that "nothing in it shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States or of any particular State," it virtually provides that these compacts and the rights they secure shall remain untouched by the legislative power, which shall only make all needful rules and regulations for carrying them into effect. All beyond this would seem to be an assumption of undelegated power.

Section 3, Article IV, of the Constitution of the United States contains this language:

> Nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States or of any particular State.

I submit that this language means that the obligation rested upon the Federal Government to enforce the conditions contained in the grants made by the various States and that the territory within such grants was to be disposed of in the organization of new States, which should have the same rights and the same sovereignty as the original 13 States. This view is supported by the statement of John Randolph, who said:

> Congress has pledged the public faith to new States that they would be admitted on equal terms. They never would or ought to accede on any other.

The Federal Government's duties are primarily with respect to the external affairs of the Nation. I repeat, it was not contemplated that they should within the States assume the municipal sovereignty of the State or the proprietary interest of a landlord. In the famous Gibbons-Ogden case Chief Justice Marshall expresses this view in the following language:

> The genius and character of the whole Government seems to be that its action is to be applied to all external concerns of the Nation and to those internal concerns which affect the States generally, but not to those which are completely within a particular State, which do not affect other States, and with which it is not necessary to interfere for the purpose of executing some of the general powers of government.

The same view, I think, is expressed by Mr. Madison in No. 18 of the Federalist. His language is as follows:

> The local or municipal authorities form distinct and independent portions of the supremacy, no more subject within their respective spheres to the general authority than the general authority is subject to them within its own sphere. In this relation, then, the proposed government can not be deemed a national one, since its jurisdiction extends to certain enumerated objects only and leaves to the several States a residuary and inviolable sovereignty over all other objects.

And in his paper No. 45 he states his views as follows:

> The powers delegated by the proposed Constitution to the Federal Government are few and defined. Those which are to remain in the State governments are numerous and indefinite. The former will be exercised principally on external objects, as war, peace, negotiation, and foreign commerce, with which last the power of taxation will, for the most part, be connected. The powers reserved to the several States will extend to all the objects which in the ordinary course of affairs concern the lives, liberties, and properties of the people and the internal order, improvement, and prosperity of the State.

I contend that the Constitution limits the exercise of the power of the Federal Government with respect to lands within the States to those tracts which are used exclusively for governmental purposes.

Justice Brewer in the case of Kansas against Colorado seems to approve this view in the following language:

> While arid lands are to be found mainly, if not only, in the Western and newer States, yet the powers of the National Government within the limits of those States are the same, no greater and no less, than those within the limits of the original 13.

If that language means anything it means that when new States were formed, when they were carved out of lands acquired by treaty or otherwise and admitted into the Union, they were to enjoy the same privileges and immunities and rights of sovereignty as were enjoyed by the original 13 States. This bill denies the application of that principle and is a repudiation of a doctrine sanctified by usage and having the approval of the fathers, as well as of the Supreme Court and other judicial tribunals of the United States.

It is conceded that Congress has "power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States." Under this grant of power, contained in section 3 of article 4 of the Constitution, the Federal Government has the power to organize Territories and to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the public domain therein. I contend, however, that the language of this grant contemplates a disposition of the property—that is, a grant or sale—so that legal title to the same shall pass from the United States. A proper interpretation of this constitutional provision, I respectfully insist, does not warrant the retention in perpetuity by the Federal Government of the public domain. As the Supreme Court states in the Pollard's lessee case, to which I have referred, that the United States held the naked legal title in trust for the inhabitants of the State of Alabama, so I insist that the United States now holds the legal title to the public domain in trust for the people of the United States. The power to dispose of or make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States contemplates that it shall be disposed of to American citizens, in order that they may establish homes thereon or utilize the same for their good and for the welfare of all the people. The Supreme Court in the case of Martin v. Waddell (41 U. S., 410) indirectly supports this view: This language is employed by the court:

> For when the revolution took place the people of each State became themselves sovereign; and in that character hold the absolute right to all their navigable waters, and the soils under them, for their own common use, subject only to the rights since surrendered by the Constitution to the General Government.

It is indicated in the case of Hardin v. Jordan (140 U. S., 381) that the Federal Government's authority within the States is limited; that its jurisdiction does not extend to municipal and sovereign control or the control of the domestic and internal affairs of the States. Notwithstanding the power of Congress over interstate commerce, the title to the beds of the streams is in the States, and such lands are subject to State regulation and control, though in the exercise thereof there must not be interference with public navigation and commerce. The title and dominion in tide waters rests in the States, and as stated by the Supreme Court in Shively v. Bowlby (152 U. S., 1):

> Grants by Congress of portions of the public lands within a Territory to settlers thereon, though bordering on or bounded by navigable waters, convey, of their own force, no title or right below high-water mark, and do not impair the title and dominion of the future State when created, but leave the question of the use of the shores by the owners of uplands to the sovereign control of each State, subject only to the rights vested by the Constitution in the United States.

The States have the right to determine, notwithstanding the common law with reference to the rights of the lower riparian proprietors, that a different rule or doctrine shall prevail. Accordingly legislation has been upheld which recognized appropriation as the source of title to waters; and the Supreme Court stated, in the case of Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S., 46), that while—

> Congress has joint legislative jurisdiction over the Territories and may control the flow of waters in their streams, it has no power to control a like flow within the limits of a State, except to repair and improve the navigability of the stream; that the full control over those waters is subject to the exception named, vested in the State.

My contention is that if the Federal Government has no control over the streams except as it relates to their navigability, and holds them, together with the beds of the streams, in trust until States are formed, then when States are formed its power and duties with respect to the lands are limited to making regulations for the disposition of the lands to private persons.

In other words, it must fulfill the trust and pass the naked legal title to American citizens, to be devoted by them to private ends and for the general welfare of the country. And new States upon their admission into the Union are endowed with streams and the control of the same as the older ones. That doctrine has been announced very forcefully by the Supreme Court in the case of Scott v. Lattig (227 U. S., 229).

I wish to emphasize the proposition that—

> In interpreting the Constitution it must never be forgotten that the Nation is made up of States, to which are intrusted the powers of local government. And to them and to the people the powers not expressly delegated to the National Government are reserved. * * * The power of the State to regulate their purely internal affairs by such laws as seem wise to the local authority is inherent and has never been surrendered to the General Government. (Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U. S., 251.)

Mr. President, it is purely an internal affair to provide for the control and government of the territory within the boundaries of States. It would seem to be an abridgement of the rights of the States for the Federal Government to hold as a proprietor millions of acres of mineral and agricultural lands and to prevent their alienation. The irregularity and injustice of such a course is more strongly emphasized when the United States announces that such lands shall not be alienated but held by the Government for an indefinite period notwithstanding the needs of the people, and treats the matter as though not only the legal but the equitable title was in the Federal Government, and that its authority should extend to the establishment of a leasing system and to the enactment of administrative laws and criminal regulations and statutes under which the Federal Government would thrust into the States, there to assert municipal and sovereign powers. A policy of this kind, I insist, is repugnant to our theory of government and in contravention of the spirit if not the letter of the Constitution, and will tend to confusion and discord and will increase the irritation and resentment between the officials of the State and the Federal Government and between the residents of the States and the United States. It seems to me that upon the admission of a new State into the Union ipso facto it has such jurisdiction and interest over all territory within its borders as is essential to the exercise of its sovereign powers and its proper governmental functions, upon an equal footing with the original States. As I have indicated, when the Federal Government was formed, the unoccupied public lands within the 13 States were not conveyed to the United States. An examination of the records of that period indicates that the iden prevailed that it was not the function of the Federal Government to become a proprietor or to hold in perpetuity large areas of land which were available for use and occupation by the citizens of the United States.

The view was universally held that the control of the lands within the States was within the functions and powers of the States, that such control was a domestic affair and was within the police powers of the States. Concerning national matters the Federal Government was supreme. In dealing with the internal affairs of the States they were supreme. And so, the 13 original States disposed of the unoccupied lands within their respective boundaries under laws and rules and regulations emanating from the people. Can there be any question as to the wisdom of this policy? Who is bold enough to challenge the policy so adopted? Under it the States grew and prospered. The unoccupied lands were disposed of to the children of the founders of the Republic and to the millions of persons who left the shores of Europe to seek homes and liberty under the flag and the Government of this Nation. Upon the sale of the lands by the States, they passed into the hands of individuals. Homes were built thereon, improvements were made, and taxable property came into existence. The property which the States sold was not lost. Soon the State was receiving in the form of annual revenues more than the property was formerly worth. New communities sprang into life, manufacturing centers were developed, railroads were constructed, and the States grew rich and powerful, and prosperity came to the people and the welfare of all was promoted. It may be true that some of the States did not exercise the highest wisdom in parting with the lands, and yet their policy encouraged the settlement and development of the States, and has been, in my opinion, justified and vindicated. I think it can be said, however, that they exercised greater wisdom and made a more provident disposition of their lands than did the Federal Government.

At various times during the early part of the last century, politicians and statesmen sought to fasten upon the United States a policy in dealing with the public lands under which it was insisted enormous revenues would be realized. During the days when Henry Clay was a powerful figure in the Republic, the platform of a political party contained as its principal pronouncement a declaration that the public lands should be sold and the proceeds divided among the States. For two or more decades there were political controversies as to the manner in which the public lands of the United States should be held and disposed of.

The minds of many were inflamed with the thought that the hundreds of millions of acres of public domain would be a perennial fountain of revenue for the Federal Government and a great source of wealth to the States then constituting the Union. There were some statesmen of note who advocated a course that they conceived would bring profit to the Government in the handling of the public lands. There were other statesmen who believed that the wisest policy and the one sanctioned by the letter and spirit of the Constitution consisted in disposing of the lands to the people under the most liberal and generous terms. Doubtless the policy of the National Government was in part influenced by the policy pursued by the various States who owned unoccupied lands within their borders. As stated, the Government claimed no ownership of the lands within the 13 original States, or did it claim any public lands in Vermont, Kentucky, Maine, West Virginia, Tennessee, or Texas. These States disposed of the mineral lands in the main in the same manner as agricultural lands were disposed of. New York and Texas enacted mining codes, under which the mineral lands therein were disposed of, and some of the States enacted police regulations with respect to coal mining. Alabama, Kansas, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, and Wisconsin under various acts of Congress were exempted from the operation of Federal mining statutes, and Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio were not subject to the general mineral statutes of the United States, for the reason that substantially all of the lands within their borders owned by the Government had been disposed of before the enactment of the mining laws of the United States.

Mr. President, if this measure shall be enacted into law I am constrained to think that it will inflame the appetites of the school of conservatists who have wrought such incalculable harm to the West, as well as to the country, to demand legislation withdrawing the metalliferous mines from public entry. Indeed, I have heard suggestions made that the Government should hold in perpetuity not only the nonmetalliferous but the metalliferous deposits and repeal all laws permitting the acquisition of title by individuals.

The most extravagant and unfounded statements are made relative to the inexhaustible mineral wealth supposed to exist in the public lands of the Government. I have had letters written by individuals who were brought within the influence of the propaganda of these frenzied conservatists, in which it was demanded that the Federal Government repeal all laws permitting the alienation of the public domain, and that it engage in mining operations and produce sufficient wealth to pay the national debt and to meet the current expenses of the Government. The absurdity of this proposition is apparent to any person who knows the West and has had experience in mining activities. I venture the assertion that if the Government should attempt mining operations, millions of dollars would be required from the Public Treasury to meet the annual deficits. These persons who are making these demands utterly misconceive the functions of the Government and are woefully ignorant of or utterly indifferent to the failures attendant upon governmental operation of undertakings or enterprises which come within the purview of private endeavor. It may be surprising to some of these persons to know that in some of the Western States, notwithstanding millions of dollars have been expended in attempts to discover oil, no producing well has been found. In my own State, for at least 30 years, efforts have been made to find oil fields, but notwithstanding tens of thousands of claims were located and perhaps millions of dollars expended, no producing oil well has been found.

Mineral deposits are found by prospectors, and where one successful mine is developed a thousand prove failures. It has been stated repeatedly that more money has been expended in mining operations upon the public domain or land acquired from the United States than has been taken from all of the mines discovered.

This bill, if it becomes a law, will discourage prospecting, and to that extent discourage the production of the minerals named in the bill. There can be no question but that if the law permitting the exploration of the public domain for metalliferous minerals were repealed and a leasing system substituted it would result in a complete cessation of mining operations except as to those properties already being worked.

I sincerely believe that the best way of dealing with the public lands now remaining is to cede them to the States. I have called attention to the manner in which Texas and other States handled the public lands within their borders. In my opinion, the States are far more competent to control and make disposition of the public domain than is the Federal Government. The various statutes enacted by Congress, liberal as they have been, have not always proved satisfactory either to the Government or to the people. Conditions have arisen in some sections that were not paralleled in other public-land States. The result, therefore, has been that injustices have occurred because of the attempt by uniform legislation to deal with the public lands.

As I recall, the area of continental United States, excluding Alaska, is about 2,000,000,000 acres of land. This vast area has been disposed of except, approximately, 400,000,000 acres. On July 1, 1917, there were, exclusive of Alaska, 225,000,000 acres of remaining unappropriated and unreserved public lands. There were on the same date 151 national forests, embracing 175,951,266 acres. The withdrawals, as nearly as I can ascertain, are as follows:

	Acres.
Oil	6,500,000
Phosphate	2,700,000
Oil shale	3,500,000
Coal	43,700,000

The lands withdrawn by the Government in some States amount to from 50 to 80 per cent of the entire area. The policy of the Government in preventing the sale of these withdrawn lands is disastrous to the States. In those States in which the Federal Government owns no lands, substantially all of the land is subject to taxation. The burden resting upon the taxpayer is therefore made lighter; but where the great bulk of the land within a State is owned by the Federal Government, the burdens resulting from the maintenance of the State government are very onerous. I submit that the policy now being pursued under which these vast areas are withheld from private entry is a selfish and unwise as well as an un-American policy. It is at variance with the history of the past and in contravention of the liberal and enlightened views which have guided the Federal Government in dealing with the public-land question.

The progress and the devolpment of the West are hindered by this unwise and destructive course. I can appreciate the reason why western Senators, as well as many of the people living in the public-land States, have been brought to the support of this bill. It does not meet their views nor appeal to their judgment. They are giving a reluctant assent to its passage because they regard it as preferable to the continuance of this intolerable policy which locks up the West and dooms public-land States to a condition which interferes with material growth and development. They appreciate the evils of a Federal leasing system, and some, I have no doubt, are convinced that the leasing policy will soon demonstrate its unsuitableness, furnish convincing proof that it is not compatible with our form of government. In the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to which I have just referred the commissioner refers to the erroneous notions as to the character of the public lands. He states:

> Many people seem to believe that great areas of these lands are virgin prairie grass lands like Kansas, Nebraska, or the Dakotas, all ready for the plow and the immediate production of wheat for our allies and ourselves, or, if situated in the arid regions, that water is readily available for reclamation. The fact is that with some exceptions hereinafter referred to the great bulk of this 225,000,000 acres is essentially a grazing proposition. Speaking generally, the crop lands are gone into private ownership. Increased land values and the constant demand for more lands, coupled with liberal laws, have resulted in the absorption of practically the entire remaining farm lands suitable for crop production. Of course there are exceptions to this. This is a big country; not infrequently we have been restoring limited areas of ceded Indian lands or areas that have been withheld from entry in aid of irrigation projects or something of that sort which are quite desirable. But the general situation is what must be kept in mind. During recent years we have patented from 10,000,000 to 14,000,000 acres a year. As long ago as 1909 Congress recognized that the "dry farming" period had come and provided for 320-acre homestead entries; most of the homestead business since that time has been under that act. It has accomplished wonders in some sections. Great areas in Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, and Idaho, which only a few years ago were open cattle range, now support prosperous farming communities. They are producing much grain, and as a rule more meat than when these sections were open cattle range. This activity has resulted in the taking up of practically all the good crop lands. Congress recognized this when it passed the grazing homestead act allowing 640-acre entries of grazing lands, and the homestead business from now on will be about nine-tenths grazing homesteads.
> Under the enlarged homestead (320-acre) act, a reduction of area of cultivation is allowable under certain rules and regulations where cultivation is impracticable; the law requires the cultivation of only one-eighth of the area, yet hundreds of such applications have been allowed after careful examination of the lands by special agents so that there could be no question as to the facts. Would these men and women undergo the necessary hardships to secure a home on lands so rough, mountainous, or arid that cultivation of an eighth is impossible or impracticable if there were plenty of level, fertile farm lands available? The question answers itself. The point we desire to make clear, and which the public should understand, is that, generally speaking, the remaining public lands are not farm lands in the ordinary sense of crop production at all. This does not mean that these lands are not useful, for they support a great portion of the meat and wool production of the country and are carrying their full capacity of cattle and sheep. There are large areas of privately owned dry farm lands and considerable areas of irrigable lands in the western States that are not being cultivated up to the limit.

I will not read further from this report, Mr. President. It is very illuminating and is a complete condemnation of the leasing system. The commissioner, however, makes one observation to which I wish to call attention. He says:

> Nevada has more public lands than any other State; yet we venture the statement that one can find more waste land—land not being put to its best use—within 50 miles of Washington than could be found in the whole State of Nevada.

Instead of all these millions of acres of land being of great value, the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office indicates that a considerable portion of the same has but little value.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Where are the lands we hear so much about as being available for the soldiers? Are they on the public domain?

Mr. KING. Answering the Senator from Texas, I wish to say that within some of the valleys of the West and upon some of the sagebrush plains and in some of the so-called deserts can be found very rich land. It requires irrigation in order to reclaim the land and make it productive. To irrigate the land necessitates the construction of large irrigation systems, some of which cost from $5,000,000 to $25,000,000. But, Mr. President, I wish to say that there are millions of acres of land within the public domain which can be reclaimed and made highly productive. When reclaimed they will sustain hundreds of thousands of people.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Lands that are still part of the public domain?

Mr. KING. Yes, Mr. President; these lands are still a part of the public domain. There is still water available for storage, and if impounded and taken into these lands homes will be found for tens of thousands of families. While the lands are of but little value now, when redeemed and reclaimed they become of great value and produce better agricultural crops than much of the fertile land of the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys.

This report of the commissioner confirms my statements as to the character of the agricultural lands owned by the Government. It will cost the United States very much more to administer these lands and to dispose of them than will ever be realized. The receipts of the General Land Office for the fiscal year 1918 derived from all sources amounted to $5,431,827.66 and the expenditures for the same period aggregated $5,611,611.42. The receipts derived from the national forests for the same fiscal year were $3,574,930.07, and the cost of operating the Forest Service was over $4,000,000.

Notwithstanding the fact that the area of the public domain is diminished, the costs of administering the departments and agencies which have the control of the same are increasing. I have seen some figures indicating it has cost the United States a million and a half dollars per annum since the founding of the Government to meet the expenses incident to handling the public lands of the United States. The proceeds derived from the sale of the public lands have been considerably less than the receipts. Additional agencies and bureaus are being created to deal with the remaining lands owned by the Government. I make the prediction that if this bill shall pass, hundreds and, indeed, thousands of employees will be added to the Government rolls and hundreds of thousands of dollars and perhaps millions will be called for to be met by burdensome taxes laid upon the backs of the people.

I have received numerous complaints as to the increase in the number of employees of the Federal Government and the rapidly increasing expenditures of the various governmental departments. The Bureau of Mines, which was a modest organization a few years ago, spent $1,201,897 during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918. There is a mania in the executive departments of the Government to multiply positions and to increase the officials and agents of the Government.

I have made a somewhat careful study of the expenses resulting from the normal operations of our Government, and I do not hesitate to state that extravagance even to the extent of profligacy characterizes many of the departments, bureaus, and executive agencies of the Government. Inefficiency exists upon the part of the personnel in some executive agencies and incompetency is found in some of the bureaus and departments. There is not that keen and conscientious regard for the public weal that should exist upon the part of public servants. There is too much of a disposition to regard the Government as a generous and careless father whose duty it is to give employment to all and to secure but little, if any, returns for the compensation paid. There should be an awakening in the departments and governmental agencies and a higher regard for the duties and obligations resting upon those holding public positions.

Mr. President, there is the same misapprehension as to the value of the mineral lands of the United States as exists with respect to the nonmineral lands within the public domain. Millions of acres of nonmineral lands in the State of Nevada are practically valueless. The same can be said of tens of millions of acres of nonmineral lands in other States of the West. It is true there are coal lands containing billions of tons of bituminous coal. There are limited fields in which oil may be found. The phosphate and sodium lands are not extensive. The public would reap far greater results from the development of these lands than would the locators. Notwithstanding the extensive coal measures there has been no coal monopoly in the West, and the opening of the coal lands to private entry under the prices fixed for their sale would result in the purchase of but a limited number of acres and would in no wise conduce to the creation of a monopoly.

Mr. President, in my opinion the best interests of the West as well as the entire Nation would be served by a cession of the 400,000,000 acres of land now owned by the Government within the public-land States to the States in which they are found. Many statesmen have favored this view. Mr. Calhoun not only favored but prepared a plan for the cession of all public lands to the States.

The States are in a condition to administer this trust, and they can do so, in my opinion, in a far more satisfactory manner than can the Federal Government. A Federal landlordism is obnoxious in the extreme. The States, being nearer the people, can lease lands, if the leasing system is found imperative, with far less expense and with more satisfactory results than can the Federal Government under a bureaucracy that is situated 3,000 miles away. The States understand the problems therein better than officials in Washington can possibly understand them. They can meet local conditions in a manner far more satisfactory to the people than can bureaus and officials who occupy the "seats of the mighty" in Washington. They can administer the public lands at an expense far less than will be incurred in this work by the Federal Government, and the expenses that will result will be met by the people of the States and not become a charge upon the Treasury of the United States. Mr. President, we should now deal with the public lands of the United States in a rational and in a final effective manner.

When I had the honor to serve in the House of Representatives a number of years ago, I introduced a bill providing for a cession of the public lands to the States. I had much encouragement and leaders of both political parties expressed themselves in hearty sympathy with the measure. I offered a similar bill during the last Congress and introduced it again at the beginning of the present session of Congress. With a few modifications I am proposing it as a substitute for the pending bill. Mr. President, under my substitute all of the public lands which have not been acquired or reserved for the public or special uses of the Government of the United States are granted to the particular States within the territorial boundaries of which they are situated. It leaves to the States to whom the cession is made the power and authority to make disposition of the same. I have, however, in deference to the opinions of some who favor the general principle of granting the public lands to the States, added a condition to the grant. This condition is to the effect that the States shall not dispose of the lands so granted to corporations, nor shall they grant to any one person more than 2,500 acres. A violation of these conditions results in a reversion of the land so granted by the States to the individual or the corporation to the Federal Government. Personally I would be willing to leave the entire matter of disposing of the lands ceded to the States. I have confidence in the people, and in their honesty, and in their ability to handle all property owned by the States.

As I have heretofore observed, the States have handled the public lands owned by them in as provident and wise a manner as has the Federal Government. The people within the States will be interested in the public lands owned by the States. They will regard such lands as a part of their own inheritance and patrimony and will exercise a supervisory care over their officials to the end that the land may be properly protected and the interests of the public guarded. The States can control the mineral lands, if the leasing system shall be deemed proper, far better than can the Federal Government. If grants or sales of lands so granted to them are made, the legislatures of the various States and the people thereof can provide such safeguards as may be regarded for the interest of all. This plan, Mr. President, is not an experiment—it is not a new policy, and many of the States have owned all of the lands within their borders and then disposed of them, and their administration of the public lands has in the main been satisfactory. It has the approval of the people of the West and in my opinion will find support among the thinking people throughout the land. On the 19th of last month there was a conference of the governors of the States held in Salt Lake City, Utah. The question of ceding the public lands to the States was there discussed and considered at great length. At the conclusion of the discussion the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

Whereas the Government records show that the public-land States contain 225,000,000 acres of unreserved and unappropriated public lands; and

Whereas the reservations and exemptions from taxation of such large bodies of land in the respective States by the Federal Government severely cripples the said States in their efforts toward such development of the natural resources and internal improvements; and

Whereas the public-land States are now facing more important reconstruction and development than ever in their history, and believing that the individual States can more economically handle the public lands within their respective boundaries to the greater beneficial advantage to the people: We, therefore,

Resolve, That it is the sense of this convention that Congress be respectfully urged and requested to cede all unsurveyed public lands without any mineral or other reservation to the States wherein the same are, respectively, situated.

Let us make this cession to the States. It will relieve the Federal Government of burdens and cares and responsibilities. It will make for the development and progress of the West and promote the general welfare of all the people of our land. Mr. President, it would be a gracious act and at the same time a wise and statesmanlike policy if the General Government should now withdraw its proprietary interests in the public domain and execute the trust which has devolved upon it and transfer the legal title to the public lands to the States within which the same are situate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, offered by the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

The amendment, in the nature of a substitute, was rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on account of certain changes made in section 17, I desire to offer several amendments to conform to the changes made in that section.

On page 31, line 2, after the word "sales," I move to insert the word "bonuses."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 31, line 2, after the word "sales," it is proposed to insert the word "bonuses" with a comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. On line 6 of the same page, before the word "royalties," I move to insert "bonuses."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. On line 10, after the word "such," I move to insert the word "bonuses."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I do not expect to take up more than a moment. I move to amend the bill by striking out the word "twenty," in line 23 of page 14, and substituting therefor the word "ten."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 23, it is proposed to strike out the word "twenty," before the word "years," and to insert in lieu thereof the word "ten," so as to read:

Leases shall be for a period of 10 years—

And so forth.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I move to strike out, then, all of lines 24 and 25 on page 14, and lines 1, 2, and 3 on page 15.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota.

The SECRETARY. In section 17, after the word "years" at the end of line 23, it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the section, in the following words, "with the preferential right in the lessee to renew the same for successive periods of 10 years upon such reasonable terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, unless otherwise provided by law at the time of the expiration of such periods."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, before the bill is reported to the Senate, I desire to submit for the RECORD a statement furnished by the Geological Survey showing the acreage of lands subject to disposition under the bill, so far as they have been withdrawn. The table shows the aggregate acreage withdrawn and which will be subject to disposition under the bill to be about 50,000,000. Of that 50,000,000 acres, about 40,426,000 are coal lands, 6,758,000 oil lands, and 2,724,000 phosphate lands. Of these, there are in the State of Montana 10,610,126 acres of coal lands, 1,351,891 acres of oil lands, and 287,883 acres of phosphate lands.

These facts, considering that these lands have been withdrawn from all sorts of entry for years, will in a measure explain the interest which I have exhibited in this bill.

I ask that this statement be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 25, after the word "cents," it is proposed to strike out the words "nor more than"; and on page 5, line 1, it is proposed to strike out the first two words, "20 cents," or to strike out the words "nor more than 20 cents."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I do not desire at this time to discuss the amendment. It has been somewhat debated while the bill was in Committee of the Whole, but I desire to have a vote on it in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer the further amendment which I now send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, line 25, after the word "lease," it is proposed to strike out the word "thereon"; and on the same page, line 25, after the word "States," it is proposed to insert "of one-fourth thereof, to be selected by legal subdivisions."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer another amendment and move its adoption. I send a copy of it to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, line 2, after the words "per centum," it is proposed to strike out "nor more than 25 per centum."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I now offer another amendment and move its adoption. I send a copy of it to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 20, lines 4 and 5, after the words "per centum," it is proposed to strike out the words "nor more than 25 per centum."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I have an amendment on the desk which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment of the Senator from California.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, at the end of line 7, it is proposed to insert:

The President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to place an embargo against the exportation of oil, whether produced under the provisions of this act or otherwise.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the condition which suggests the necessity of an amendment of that kind grows out of the fact that the United States is consuming more oil than it produces. I have here a letter from an authoritative source, Mr. E. L. Doheny, who writes on another subject, but includes this information in his letter:

We now produce nearly 70 per cent of the world's production of petroleum and consume more than 75 per cent. Our oil fields are nearly all discovered, those discovered are practically all well developed, and many of them are nearly exhausted. A study of the oil geology of the world brings the conviction that the United States will depend, within 10 years, upon foreign-produced petroleum for more than 50 per cent of its consumption; also a study of the increase of petroleum consumption, through the development of its use for motor engines and in other ways, also causes the belief that the United States will double its requirements within the same period and that it will require more than 50 per cent of its supply from foreign sources.

The other day the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] introduced in the RECORD—August 25—a statement by Mr. E. Mackay Edgar, of a distinguished London mercantile house, and among other things he says, after visiting this country and with the trained mind of a business man making careful observations:

Again, America is reaching the end of some of her most valuable raw materials and natural resources. Already she is importing oil for her own consumption; she will soon be importing copper—perhaps even wheat. Her "magnates" are rightly and shrewdly looking ahead and scouring the world for reserves of basic metals and minerals that will make good their own dwindling supplies; but wherever they turn they find that British enterprise has been before them. We hold many of these essential key positions in our own hands. Even if they do not lie inside the British Empire, they are controlled by British capital. America one of these days—and not very distant days, either—will have to come to us for the oil, copper, and, perhaps, the iron ore she needs, just as she has come to us for wool. That is why I, for one, am not greatly disturbed by America's competition.

That is the opinion of a keen observer, but it is borne out by the report of the Bureau of Mines of the Government of the United States that there is a drain already upon our natural resources, and we have already consumed 40 per cent of all our oil, whereas we have consumed only 1 per cent of our coal. Under the existing law, which is the act of May 10, 1872, no foreigner, nor anyone except a citizen of the United States, or one who has declared his intention to become a citizen, has a right to locate on a mineral claim upon the public domain. When the pending bill was reported from the committee it contained substantially the same provision which is now in the existing law, namely, that no foreigner could under this act own any stock under any lease or participate in the location of any claim upon the public domain, but in Committee of the Whole that was amended to permit a foreigner, under this act, to go upon the public domain just like a citizen and acquire certain rights to our mineral resources, with this addition, which was added in Committee of the Whole, that it was subject to the power of the President to take over the plant, and of the Secretary of the Interior to take over the oil, in the discretion of the President or the Secretary of the Interior, as the case might be. But it is a departure from the established law and should have some justification. The established and existing law to-day does not permit a foreigner to go upon the public domain, whereas the law which has just come out of the Committee of the Whole into the Senate permits him, conditional, however, upon the President and Secretary of the Interior having the right in one case to take the plant and in the other to take the oil.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. PHELAN. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not think the Senator stated that quite correctly. An alien can not acquire a lease under the law. The provision the Senator refers to relates only to stock ownership, but the lessee must be a citizen of the United States.

Mr. PHELAN. The exact language of the amendment as it stands now in the perfected bill is that:

No alien shall by stock ownership or otherwise own any interest in a lease acquired under the provisions of this act except with the specific provision in such lease authorizing the President—

And so forth. That is correct.

Mr. LENROOT. But the lessee can not be an alien.

Mr. PHELAN. I do not understand the distinction.

Mr. PITTMAN. I call attention to the fact that section 1 contains this provision:

Except as herein provided, shall be subject to disposition in the form and manner provided by this act to citizens of the United States, or to any association of such persons, or to any corporation organized under the laws of the United States.

That is in the first section of the bill.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator contends that foreigners are barred under the perfected bill from acquiring any interest in any lease.

Mr. PITTMAN. I interpret it that way.

Mr. PHELAN. I do not think that is the interpretation of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. No; no alien can become a lessee, but an alien may own stock in a corporation that is a citizen of the United States under the provisions the Senator refers to.

Mr. PHELAN. It is substantially the same thing. The foreigner in his proper person can not become the owner of a lease, but he can incorporate himself and become the owner of the lease. That is tweedledum and tweedledee, and it is the same vice that exists in many States. In the State of California no alien ineligible to citizenship can own agricultural land, but he organizes a corporation and enjoys full possession of the land, which, of course, is an error on the part of the lawmakers. They should have barred them also from participating as owner through the medium of a corporation.

I am not commenting upon what has already been done in perfecting that particular section giving the President power to take over the property and the Secretary to take over the oil in their discretion, but I want it to apply to the oil wells owned now in the United States of America in order to deter foreigners from seeking to acquire oil property. My proposed amendment, which has just been read by the Secretary, provides in this language:

The President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to place an embargo against the exportation of oil, whether produced under the provisions of this act or otherwise.

What would be the effect of that? It would have the effect of deterring foreigners, or, as the case may be, provided the State laws are effective, foreign corporations from acquiring existing wells.

I have shown you that we have consumed 40 per cent of our oil resources, and that we are consuming more now than we produce, and I will show you, from the record if necessary, that particularly a British corporation, the Royal Dutch Shell, is acquiring existing wells throughout the country in Oklahoma and Texas, and I have more particular knowledge of California; and there is nothing to prevent them, except a lack of money, from acquiring all our oil properties; and the matter of money is of small importance to Great Britain at this time.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, is not that what prevents all of us from getting them—lack of money?

Mr. PHELAN. But the Senator is not in the unique and unusual position in which I find Great Britain. Great Britain now owes the United States, at the last report which I observed, something like $4,000,000,000, and I think we are generously extending credit from time to time. I find in the RECORD of October 21 the following:

One of the leading New York papers has drawn attention to the fact that, whereas England is borrowing immense amounts of money in the United States, their money market is easy as compared with money conditions in this country. In this way England is able to build up its industries in preparation for the severe competition which is bound to follow after the war.

An example of this is that the English Parliament recently voted £2,000,000 in advance to dyestuff makers in England, while England is borrowing money here.

While England is borrowing money here, the very thing we are doing, trying to encourage by tariff, special levy, and otherwise, our dyestuffs, England is using the money that we loan for the purpose of throttling that industry so far as we are concerned and establishing independent and competitive plants in London.

Another is the fact that the London Water Co. notes, which sold here—on about a 7 per cent basis, and are now maturing, have been replaced in London on a 3½ per cent basis, due to the easy money market in England as compared with the high rates which United States industries must pay in this country.

That is, in the United States—

In other words, England has taken our money, and that liberated hers, and with hers she is investing in these corporations which will be in competition with ours, and she has had the indecent enterprise, I might say—I rather commend her financial prowess and foresight—of taking our own money and buying our own oil wells and putting us in the position of a nation having an insufficient supply, because that oil is exported for English uses, industrial, naval, and martitime, throughout the world. It reminds me very much of Byron's lines:

So the struck eagle, stretch'd upon the plain,
No more through rolling clouds to soar again,
View'd his own feather on the fatal dart,
And wing'd the shaft that quiver'd in his heart,
Keen were his pangs, but keener far to feel,
He nursed the pinion that impelled the steel.

We are contributing to our own undoing, and that which appealed to our generosity after the war is used for the purpose of diminishing our own natural resources.

Therefore there should be no objection, since we have given the President power in the case of these leased lands to protect the country against the exportation of it, because it means nothing else; at the same time give the President the power to forbid in emergencies or in his discretion, let us say, to foreigners to export the natural resources of our country so necessary for its industrial life, so necessary for the maintenance of its merchant marine and its Navy.

I can not see where the objection lies, and certainly it will not stir any retaliation anywhere, because Mexico is the only oil land which we look upon for an auxiliary supply, and there is there a vast production, and there the logic of the situation and the economic necessity will never lead that Government to put a ban upon exports. It is the life of the country to sell its oil, and no matter what action we may take which in no way interferes in practice with Mexico's nationals, that supply shall be utilized for foreign consumption. But here is a surprising development.

Mr. Doheny, who is an American, as well as a Mexican, oil producer, recently went to London and organized a marketing company with these same Englishmen who are buying, let us say, the California and the Texas wells, so that not only will they own our supply but they will control the Mexican supply owned by American citizens, as in the great Tampico district, owned very largely by Mr. Doheny, who, I believe, is the president of the Mexican Petroleum, which, among other property, owns the great gusher giving out 300,000 barrels a day, and which is about the total output of all California. There they have one well with a capacity of 300,000 barrels a day! But Mr. Doheny, not finding any encouragement in this country, has gone to England, and now has half the supply, because the company is organized on the basis of equal distribution and equal profit, and has given to England that supply which we have looked upon with covetous eye. Mr. Doheny has not tied up all his property in Mexico in this matter, but the danger is none the less real.

So, as the gentleman quoted said in his interview, wherever we go we find that Great Britain is just ahead of us! If I thought for a moment that such a provision as I offer would in any way lead to retaliation, which I can not conceive, I would not for a moment propose it; but I think by adopting the amendment we will deter or discourage the foreign companies—you see it is not a prohibition; it discourages them—from acquiring American properties, because no foreign company, certainly no nation dealing in the oil supply as Great Britain, as a nation, is doing, would acquire wells where she would not have the power in case of necessity to export it for her own uses.

This marketing company was organized by the Englishmen and Mr. Doheny; and I ask permission that the account of it be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TO MARKET OIL ABROAD—PAPERS FOR BRITISH MEXICAN PETROLEUM CO. FILED.

Following the receipt of cable messages from London, it was announced in the financial district yesterday that articles of incorporation of the British Mexican Petroleum Co., which came into being following a prolonged visit of E. L. Doheny, head of the Pan-American Petroleum Co. in England recently, were filed July 15. The new company will have an initial paid-up capital of £2,000,000 and will function as the marketing company for Mexican petroleum products in the Eastern Hemisphere.

It is planned for the new company to own a fleet of tank steamers and to have large tank farms at the important European shipping ports for the bunkering of vessels with fuel oil. It is also planned to construct refineries for the handling of crude oil from the Mexican Petroleum Co. Half of the capital has been subscribed by British interests and the remainder by the Pan American Petroleum Co. The contract with the Mexican Petroleum Co. runs for a period of 20 years and requires an annual purchase from the Mexican company of several millions of barrels of oil and gasoline.

Organizers and directors of the new company are Lord Pirrie, William Weir, Sir Thomas Royden, Sir Peter McClelland, Sir James T. Currie, J. R. Morton, E. L. Doheny, H. G. Wylie, E. L. Doheny, jr., J. M. Danziger, Elisha Walker, and L. P. Sheldon. Sir Alexander McGuire and W. A. White will act as alternates for the American directors residing away from Great Britain.

Lord Pierre, who is chairman of the new company, is the head of the shipbuilding firm of Harland & Wolff and a director of the International Mercantile Marine Co. William Weir is head of the firm of Andrew Weir & Co., and is a large owner and operator of ships. E. L. Doheny is president and H. G. Wylie a vice president of the Mexican oil supplying companies. The former is vice chairman and the latter managing director of the British-Mexican Petroleum Co. Sir Thomas Royden is deputy chairman of the Cunard Steamship Co. Sir Peter McClelland is the senior partner of Duncan, Fox & Co. Sir James Currie is a director of the United Baltic Corporation, and will be executive director of the new company. Elisha Walker is a partner of William Salomon & Co., New York, and L. P. Sheldon is a partner of Salomon & Co., London, which firms have acted as bankers for both the Mexican Petroleum and Pan American companies.

Mr. PHELAN. If there is any objection on the score of retaliation I should like to hear it; but I warn the Senators that this is an opportunity to take advantage through the arm of the Federal Government—the only weapon we have—to impose an embargo. We can not deny a foreigner to acquire property such as oil wells in this country by an act of Congress. There is no such power in Congress. The States may within their jurisdiction control the ownership of land and the minerals on private property by corporations, but not the Federal Government. So our only power is by such an amendment as I propose—to discourage foreigners by forbidding them the full, complete, and exclusive ownership of their property, because we would give to the President the right to impose an embargo. We are warned of this, with which I shall close, by the pious sentiment in the parable:

"Then shall the kingdom of heaven be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom.

"And five of them were wise, and five were foolish.

"They that were foolish took their lamps, and took no oil with them:

"But the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps.

"While the bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept.

"And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him.

"Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps.

"And the foolish said unto the wise, Give us of your oil; for our lamps are gone out.

"But the wise answered, saying, Not so; lest there be not enough for us and you: but go ye rather to them that sell, and buy for yourselves.

"And while they went to buy, the bridegroom came; and they that were ready went in with him to the marriage; and the door was shut."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN].

On a division the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. On page 25, line 5, insert the following:

And provided further, That every permit and lease shall reserve to the Secretary of the Interior the right to limit the original issue of capital stock by the permittee to an amount corresponding at par value to the cash actually subscribed and paid therefor, computing as such cash a reasonable compensation for labor and money expended and risk incurred in prospecting and development work by the permittee and others associated with him, and shall also reserve to the Secretary the right to limit subsequent issues of capital stock to such amounts as he may deem compatible with the interests of the public.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

[Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it. The noes have it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I ask for a division.

On a division the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, in view of the fact that this amendment proposes to protect the people of the country against stock-watering, and unscrupulous permittees, and licensees using the authority of the Government to expand capitalization, I feel it my duty to ask for a roll call.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is too late now for the Senator to ask for a roll call. The amendment was first rejected on a viva voce vote. Then the Senator arose and asked for a division. That was granted, and the amendment was again rejected. It is now too late to have a yea and nay vote.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Then, Mr. President, if the chairman of the committee raises that objection, I shall not press the request, but I am sure it will be an added reason why some Members of the Senate should vote against this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is in the Senate and still open to amendment.

Mr. KIRBY. I offer the amendment which I sent to the desk as a substitute for the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Arkansas will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

The President of the United States is hereby authorized to mine and develop coal, oil, and gas in any lands belonging to the United States, and to operate the mines and wells under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of the Interior when in his discretion the public exigency may require that it shall be done.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, the lands involved in this legislation have long been reserved from exploitation by individuals and by corporations, and the need is now greater for the reservation and conservation of oil and coal for the use of the Government than it has been in our history heretofore. We have already exhausted over 40 per cent of our indicated oil resources. We must always have enough coal and enough oil with which to operate our Navy. We believe we ought to establish a merchant marine that will take care of the commerce of the United States, and we know that we must have coal and oil in order to do that.

I believe the merchant marine ought to be operated by the United States Government. We have builded ships, and we are building them now. The ocean is there, and it never needs repair. We have fought this war for the freedom of the seas, and, whether it has been guaranteed or not, the fact remains that the United States of America has said that the submarine can not be used against the shipping of neutral nations; that has been the demand by this Government of ours, and it has been determined by a victorious war. That settles the question of international law. We are entitled to the freedom of the seas. We need this coal and we need this oil to take care of the conditions that will develop, and I say now is the time to preserve them. This is all that is left.

The question is becoming more and more acute. The oil interests are behind the insistent and persistent propaganda for a war with Mexico; that is the motive which is at the bottom of it all. There is an organized and persistent propaganda and demand for war with Mexico. It has grown largely out of the oil interests down there. I do not think we should have a war with Mexico. There is less excuse for it now than there has been heretofore; but the propaganda is being urged all the time. I think it is time we should consider the Government's interests. Let us save and preserve these lands and until the time comes when it will be necessary to use them. My amendment merely proposes to give the President the authority to mine and to use the coal and oil when the emergency arises therefor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am going to read just two or three paragraphs from the September issue of a magazine which is called Reconstruction.

WHAT IT COSTS US TO LET OIL BUSINESS BE PRIVATELY OWNED.

Nearly every great fortune in the United States is based upon private ownership and development of some natural resources of the country. In five years after the dissolution of the Standard Oil Co., the companies included in the Standard Oil combination, distributed in cash $407,491,626; in stock at par value $207,200,000; and subscription rights at par to the value of $40,900,000; a total of $655,000,000, while the total capitalization of these companies on April 15, 1912, was only $276,916,754.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue gives some interesting information as to the profits made by oil companies for 1916, which are the last figures of the bureau available. This was before profiteering in the name of patriotism became quite the most profitable profession in America for a little group of undemocratic Americans. In that year, corporations developing oil, gas, and salt wells had a net income of $236,795,209; during the same year, corporations extracting coal had a net income of $121,082,830; those extracting copper had a net income of $271,087,120. During the same year, corporations extracting gold, silver and other precious metals had a net income of only $14,907,086.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue also reports in 1916 the average net income of 2,554 mine owners and operators was $45,140. Eleven mine owners and operators had a net income in 1916 of over $1,000,000; 10 had a net income of over $1,500,000; and several a net income of over $6,000,000. The total net income of corporations extracting minerals was in 1916, $798,883,349.

These figures show clearly why American financiers are so anxious to be allowed to grab the people's natural resources. They show equally clearly why Congress should refuse to turn over the people's resources for the enrichment of the few and the impoverishment of the many.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY. I ask for a division.

The question being put, on a division the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I had expected to address the Senate on the bill, but on account of the lateness of the hour and because of the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has covered the ground, I shall merely ask permission to insert in the record a statement by Mark L. Requa, former oil director of the Fuel Administration, and a statement by James N. Gillett, former governor of California, explaining very tersely the condition existing in naval reserve No. 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statements referred to are as follows:

NEW YORK CITY, July 30, 1919.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have noted with interest and considerable satisfaction the resolution introduced by Senator POINDEXTER on the subject of prices of oil in California. May I ask if you will send me a copy of the resolution as passed?

From the statement published in the New York papers this morning I quote as follows:

"Inasmuch as the Pacific coast, through its California oil fields, produces more oil than it consumes, there is no excuse for the coast prices exceeding Atlantic or Gulf prices."

This is presumed to be quoting Senator POINDEXTER. Nothing could more clearly prove the desirability for an unbiased statement of the truth than this quotation, if correct. As a matter of fact, during the war the California prices for oil were the lowest in the United States, and storage was being drawn upon to an alarming degree and is still below a reasonable reserve.

The reason that oil can be sold at New Orleans for 80 cents is because of the Mexican oil fields, with which the United States producers can not compete in the matter of cheap costs. The average production per well per day in the United States is about 4¼ barrels; 5,000, 10,000, 50,000, and 100,000 barrels per well per day is possible in Mexico. There is no well in the United States upon a par with the great well of the Mexican Petroleum, which is analogous to a water pipe with the faucet on the end of it—you open the faucet a little farther as you want more fluid. This one well has produced over 100,000,000 barrels, and is still going, apparently, as strong as ever.

The oil producers upon the Atlantic seaboard must make their money out of some other part of the barrel than the fuel oil, because of this competition from Mexico. In California a very large percentage of the oil is sold direct for fuel without any refining. If Mexico was as close to California as it is to New Orleans the same prices for oil would prevail, but, incidentally, the oil producers of California would be facing bankruptcy.

The statement that the oil consumers of the coast are required to pay $1.85 per barrel is true if the point of delivery is Puget Sound. Assuming a heating value of 3½ barrels of oil equivalent to a ton of coal would bring the price of the coal to $6.47. If Senator POINDEXTER's Washington coal mines can produce and market coal at a price sufficiently attractive they will take the business as against fuel oil, of course; but that they are not doing this is evidenced by the fact that fuel oil still commands the market.

It is also entirely easy to demonstrate that the producers of fuel oil in years past in California have not made a profit commensurate with their risk and over many years made absolutely no profit at all.

I am writing this letter for your own information, although I have no objection to your making any use of it you may desire. I am interested only in seeing the whole truth stated; and in order to do this, the Federal Trade Commission must do something more than make a mere accounting investigation into the situation. It requires a review of the entire oil problem of the Pacific coast and a determination of some of the fundamentals that go beyond the mere question of figures, although even these in themselves will if intelligently presented show the problem in a satisfactory light.

Very truly, yours, M. L. REQUA.

FACTS CONCERNING NAVAL PETROLEUM RESERVE NO. 2.

Naval petroleum reserve No. 2 was created December 13, 1912. It contains 30,080 acres—15,360 of which have been patented to the Southern Pacific Railroad for nearly 25 years, 3,520 acres have been patented to others, 7,040 acres were located or filed on under the placer mining laws prior to January 1, 1909, and the rest is vacant land.

In the spring and summer of 1909 a number of oil companies were in possession of said mineral locations and were busily engaged in doing necessary work leading to the discovery of oil. Some were building roads, some were building cabins and derricks and doing such work as was necessary to prepare the land for drilling, and on one or two of the claims drilling was in actual progress.

While this work was being done, the President of the United States, on September 27, 1909, withdrew from entry 3,040,000 acres of supposed petroleum lands in California and Wyoming, which included the above-mentioned lands. This order stated that it was made "in aid of future legislation," and it contained the following provision: "All locations or claims existing and valid on this date may proceed to entry in the usual manner."

There were then about 20 companies and individuals operating on the lands within naval reserve No. 2. A statement filed by Commander Wright, of the Navy, and published in the hearings on S. 3521 before the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate, shows that prior to the date of the withdrawal order the oil claimants on lands which had been located in naval reserve No. 2 had spent $100,000 in development work in the discovery of oil, and had spent $160,000 in work where no oil had been discovered.

Mr. Louis Titus, who is largely interested in the reserve, and who knows what work was being done before the land was withdrawn from entry and where it was performed, filed a statement with the Naval Affairs Committee giving an estimate of the amount expended in different sections prior to the withdrawal order, which is as follows:

Section 20	$46,000
Section 22	4,000
Section 26	11,000
Section 28	22,000
Section 34	6,000
Section 2	8,800
Section 12	2,000
Section 18	27,000
Section 32	3,000
	129,800

This does not include work done on lands claimed by the Honolulu Consolidated Oil Co., which, according to Commissioner Talman of the General Land Office in a letter to Secretary Lane bearing date April 12, 1916, amounted to more than $100,000 prior to the withdrawal order.

About 13 companies have continued their work and are now in possession of their claims, while others, who were on barren lands, after spending large sums of money, have abandoned theirs. No objection whatever was made by the Government to these companies holding their claims, and they were permitted to continue with their work and develop a very fine and well-equipped oil field.

On December 13, 1912, the date of the creation of naval reserve No. 2, they had expended about $10,000,000 in development work alone, to say nothing of the large sums paid for their lands. The Associated Oil Co. paid for its land $1,770,000. Following is a list of expenditures prepared by Commander Wright, of the Navy, showing expenditures made by the several companies therein mentioned up to December 13, 1912, the date on which naval reserve No. 2 was created, which statement was submitted to the Naval Committee of the Senate when S. 3521 was pending before it:

Honolulu Consolidated	$1,310,000
Standard Oil Co	1,300,000
Associated Oil Co	1,320,000
Union Oil Co	400,000
General Petroleum	350,000
St. Helen's	210,000
Boston Pacific	225,000
North American	750,000
Consolidated Mutual	450,000
California Amalgamated	125,000
Caribou Oil Co	150,000
Record Oil Co	200,000
United Oil Co	210,000
Midland Oil Co	70,000
	7,070,000

This is nearly $3,000,000 short of what was actually expended, but we will, for the sake of this statement, assume that it is correct.

Now, after the reserve was created, December 13, 1912, nothing was done by the Government to prevent these companies from drilling more wells, expending more money, and extracting the oil and selling it until October 25, 1915, when an action was commenced against the North American Co. Before the end of the year five more suits were started. One suit was commenced in September, 1916, against the Pioneer Midway Oil Co., and in 1917, over five years after the reserve was created, 23 more were commenced, so that to-day every company operating within the reserve has been sued. Four decisions have been rendered in the district court so far, and all have been in favor of the claimants. The decision in favor of the North American Oil Co. has been sustained by the United States circuit court of appeals.

All the suits have been based on the following allegations, to wit: "No discovery prior to withdrawal, hence no valid location. Not a bona fide occupant, and not in diligent prosecution of work at date of withdrawal. No discovery work initiated prior to withdrawal." In some of the cases, those based on what are known as the McMurtry locations, a charge of dummy entrymen is made.

The order creating naval reserve No. 2 contained the following provision: "Subject to valid existing rights." The circuit court of appeals and the district courts hold that it was not necessary that a discovery of oil or gas should have been made prior to September 27, 1909, the date of the withdrawal order, in order to constitute a valid claim, and this is now conceded by the Government. So the first ground set forth by the Government fails.

The other ground, that "no discovery work was initiated prior to withdrawal," must also fail. Commander Wright, in the statement above referred to, admitted that these companies had expended $260,000 prior to the withdrawal order. If that money was not spent in initiating "discovery work," then what was it spent for?

As to the claim that diligent work was not done, it is only necessary to call attention to the fact that in the three years preceding the creation of the naval reserve the claimants operating therein expended $7,070,000 in the development of their claims, as appears by Commander Wright's statement, whereas, as a matter of fact, they spent about $10,000,000.

The charge of dummy entrymen is based upon the locations made by one McMurtry, acting as the attorney in fact for some New York locators. The United States district court, Judge Bean sitting, a few weeks ago rendered a most carefully considered decision, in which he holds that the McMurtry locations are valid locations; that the locators were not dummy locators; and that the defendants who succeeded to their interests are bona fide claimants. He thereupon dismissed the action.

THE RESERVE CAN NOT BE MADE A PERMANENT ONE.

There are between 330 and 350 producing oil and gas wells in the reserve. Nearly one-third of the oil has already been extracted. These wells can not be plugged and abandoned, but must continue to flow.

The oil sands having been tapped, the only safe and sensible thing to do is to extract the oil expeditiously and under the best methods known to the business while the gas pressure continues. Every geologist and every oil man of experience who is acquainted with and personally knows the conditions now existing in the reserve says that the reserve can not be made a future reserve for the use of the Navy, and that it is only valuable for present use. This opinion was given by Mr. Doheny, one of the most experienced oil producers in the world, and by Mr. Williams and Mr. Naramore, geologists in the Bureau of Mines, and by Mr. Wolfe, a geologist, who has been employed by the Navy Department to examine and make a report on the reserve. These opinions were given to the Committee on Public Lands, and all of these gentlemen are personally familiar with conditions existing in the reserve.

In a report concerning the reserve filed with the committee of the House at the request of Mr. FERRIS, Mr. Wolfe says: "If only the present well openings continued to produce and no more wells were drilled in the future, it is probable these present wells would in their life extract 30 per cent of the original oil content; and if this course of action or policy were adopted, it is also certain that all of the 70 per cent remaining would not, because of the depletion of the gas reserves needed to expel the oil, be extractable in the future."

If the reserve can not be made a permanent one, then it is evident that the only thing to do is to extract the oil to the best advantage so as to save the most of it.

The oil companies are in possession; were there before the land was withdrawn and had expended, according to the Navy's own statement, $7,070,000 before the naval reserve was created. They have all the equipment and facilities necessary to carry on the work of getting all of the oil in their respective claims. They are not going to surrender their claims and lose the millions they have invested without appealing to the highest court in the land, and to do this it will take a number of years.

If a lease to the land is given to them, upon their paying a fair back royalty for oil already produced and a reasonable royalty for future production, they can then go forward with their work, save their investments, extract the oil, and in this way the Navy can get its share and probably as much as it would receive if it was to take over the properties and operate them.

These companies all have acted in the very best of faith. They are free from any fraud or wrongdoing, and if they lose all they have expended it will be upon a mere technicality of the law and not because they knowingly sought to evade any law. They went upon the land prior to any withdrawal thereof and were unmolested in their holdings for six years or more, during which time, with the full knowledge of the Government, they expended millions of dollars in developing the property now claimed by the Navy and which it is now asserted they are holding as willful trespassers.

If any oil claimants on withdrawn lands are entitled to relief, those operating in naval reserve No. 2 certainly are, and the relief granted should be equal to that given to claimants who are upon lands without the reserve.

JAMES N. GILLETT.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, just one sentence with regard to a matter which I do not think has been referred to in the debate. There is nothing in this bill to prevent the President from creating as many naval reserves as he sees fit out of the 3,000,000 acres that will be subject to disposition under this bill, the only condition being that existing wells within any naval reserve he may create may, under certain conditions, be leased.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the Senator who has just addressed the Senate if there is any provision in this bill that restricts a permittee or a licensee from getting a license or a lease or a permit from the Government, capitalizing it for millions and billions of dollars and fleecing the general public?

Mr. LENROOT. There is no such provision in the bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. And, Mr. President, there is no Federal law covering the oil wells in Texas or in Pennsylvania, or in any other State, where the land is in private ownership. It seems to me that some of the gentlemen who have suddenly become so much interested in wildcat schemes would spend their time to better advantage looking after the 99 per cent who are fleecing the public and who live in their own neighborhoods, rather than the possible 1 per cent who are actual miners.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I do not know to whom the Senator refers, but lest his remarks might by implication be construed to mean that I have neglected my public duty, I desire to say that this is the first bill of this character upon which I have been called to vote in the Senate. I am not concerned about whether we have erred in the past, but I do not propose to vote to give the sanction of the United States Government to permittees and licensees to use the authority and name of this Government to fleece the people of the United States.

Whatever justification a private individual may have, there can not be any justification for the use of the name of the United States Government. Furthermore, every private individual who gets a permit has got to be honest, or no bank and no individual will loan him money, but without a restriction upon capitalization men can incorporate and be absolutely dishonest and fleece the general public. The partnership that secures a permit and the individual who secures a permit have got to deal honestly with the Government and honestly with the people, but to a group of men the door is thrown wide open to incorporate for any amount of money they desire without any restriction or limitation. I for one think that the general public, regardless of those who reap the benefit under this bill, are entitled to be protected. When the United States Government grants a permit or a license it has a right to say, "We insist upon your being honest in your capitalization and being honest in your dealings with the general public."

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, all of the inspiration to honesty has apparently been aroused in an effort to defeat this bill. It has all been aroused apparently in an effort to prevent the prospectors out upon the desert from pursuing their ordinary vocation. The odium that it is being attempted to heap upon this bill has that purpose. The effort is being made to prevent the lands from being leased and developed. As a matter of fact, wildcat companies that are dealing in oil are organized and exist in the East. The Senator's State is full of them, although the blue-sky laws of Massachusetts could stop it, as they could have stopped it when he was governor of that State. It is the same way with the other eastern States. If Senators are anxious to stop speculation in wildcat stocks, go to the source of the evil, but do not attempt to stop production in this country under the guise and excuse of attempting to stop speculation in stocks.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I must insist upon the rule that a Senator can not speak more than twice upon any one question in debate on the same day. I have not even suggested the application of the rule in the past; but it is now 25 minutes of 11 o'clock; we have been here nearly 12 hours, and really I feel obliged to ask the Senator from Massachusetts to desist from saying anything further.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I shall cheerfully comply with the request, simply commenting upon the fact that the request is in keeping with some of the general conduct which has characterized the treatment and handling of the bill in the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is casting an aspersion on the Senator from Utah having the bill in charge. I will withdraw the request, and the Senator may speak as long and as many times as he desires.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is too late to withdraw it. The Senator made his attempt to restrict me, and it is not necessary for him to withdraw it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I will assume the responsibility of asking for the enforcement of the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed and read the third time?

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. KENYON. On that question I ask for a division.

On a division the bill was passed.

ENFORCEMENT OF PROHIBITION.

Mr. STERLING. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 6810, being calendar No. 129, known as the prohibition bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I do not care to proceed further with the bill to-night, it being understood that it will be the unfinished business.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Has the Chair laid the bill before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; the Chair has laid the bill before the Senate, and it is now the unfinished business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 10 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, September 4, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, September 3, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. William Couden, late chaplain of the Second Division, American forces in Germany, delivered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, like one who offers grace before meat, we give Thee our praise this morning as once more we awaken to view the richness of life. For the beauty of the earth and its seasons; for the lessons of the past and the thoughts of great and noble men; for books, music, and art; for human kindness, charity, and fellowship; for our country, our friends, our homes, our loves, our laughter, and the innocence of little children; for consolation for sorrow, courage in defeat, regret for mistakes, the moving power of high ideal, and the spurring of conscience; for the means of grace and the hope of glory; and for to-day's work and responsibilities and opportunities—we thank Thee, O Wonderful Giver. Help us to accept all in such a spirit of love and sacrifice, joy, and service united, as did Jesus, Thy best gift of all and our Redeemer, whose life comes to us through the changing centuries and above the world's confusions and janglings like low but persistent and ever audible harmony swept on celestial harp strings. May we become attuned to unison with Him in thanksgiving and faithfulness: and so win our triumph and rest and eternal peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ALMON, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for five days on account of important business matters.

AMENDMENT TO FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

The SPEAKER. To-day is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the roll of committees.

Mr. PLATT (when the Committee on Banking and Currency was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 2395.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 2395) amending section 25 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the act approved September 7, 1916.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 25 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the act approved September 7, 1916, be further amended by striking out the period at the end of the third paragraph thereof and adding in lieu thereof the following: ", or until January 1, 1921, without regard to the amount of its capital and surplus, to invest an amount not exceeding in the aggregate 5 per cent of its paid-in capital and surplus in the stock of one or more corporations chartered or incorporated under the laws of the United States, or of any State thereof, and regardless of its location, principally engaged in such phases of international or foreign financial operations as may be necessary to facilitate the export of goods, wares, or merchandise from the United States or any of its dependencies or insular possessions to any foreign country: Provided, however, That in no event shall the total investments authorized by this section by any one national bank exceed 10 per cent of its capital and surplus."

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause on page 1, down to and including line 10 on page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That section 25 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal-reserve act, as amended by the act approved September 7, 1916, be further amended by the addition of the following paragraph at the end of subparagraph 2 of the first paragraph, after the word 'possessions':

"'Until January 1, 1921, any national banking association, without regard to the amount of its capital and surplus, may file application with the Federal Reserve Board for permission, upon such conditions and under such regulations as may be prescribed by said board, to invest an amount not exceeding in the aggregate 5 per cent of its paid-in capital and surplus in the stock of one or more corporations chartered or incorporated under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof and, regardless of its location, principally engaged in such phases of international or foreign financial operations as may be necessary to facilitate the export of goods, wares, or merchandise from the United States or any of its dependencies or insular possessions to any foreign country: Provided, however, That in no event shall the total investments authorized by this section by any one national bank exceed 10 per cent of its capital and surplus.'

"SEC. 2. That paragraph 2 of said section be amended by adding after the word 'banking,' in line 3, the words 'or financial,' so that the sentence will read: 'Such application shall specify the name and capital of the banking association filing it, the powers applied for, and the place or places where the banking or financial operations proposed are to be carried on.'

"SEC. 3. That paragraph 3 of said section be amended by striking out the words 'subparagraph 2 of the first paragraph of this section' and inserting in lieu thereof the word 'above,' so that the paragraph will read:

"'Every national banking association operating foreign branches shall be required to furnish information concerning the condition of such branches to the Comptroller of the Currency upon demand, and every member bank investing in the capital stock of banks or corporations described above shall be required to furnish information concerning the condition of such banks or corporations to the Federal Reserve Board upon demand, and the Federal Reserve Board may order special examinations of the said branches, banks, or corporations at such time or times as it may deem best.'"

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Should not this bill be on the Union Calendar?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman point out the reason why?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It provides for the examination of these banks, and that certainly would cost some money, according to the usual order of things, and if it does require money then it should go on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Does it require additional examination to what is now made?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is what it says, I think, in the last section.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the bill involves any expenditure of Federal money in any way. At the time the bill was introduced it was on the Union Calendar and it was decided to put it on the House Calendar.

Mr. DOWELL. The last clause of the bill provides for a special examination.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman know of any case where anything was ever done by anybody for the United States Government that did not take money and a good deal of it?

Mr. DOWELL. I am just calling attention to the fact that the gentleman is correct in his statement that it does call for a special examination.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not think there is any question about it.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the chairman if it is not in the present law?

The SPEAKER. Is that in the law now?

Mr. PLATT. It is in the law now. This bill permits the national banking associations to subscribe to the stock of certain financial corporations which are rather more than banks; that is, to extend long-time credit instead of short-time credit, like the peoples' savings banks. They are to be examined, but that is in the law now in regard to all similar institutions.

Mr. WINGO. If the Chair will permit, I do not think the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] understood the question of the Chair. The present law does not provide that, because this is a new situation. The bill simply authorizes national banks to subscribe to the stock of corporations that are to be authorized to take care of our foreign trade; to take care of the rehabilitation of Europe. Those corporations must submit to the regulations of the Federal Reserve Board, and the last paragraph provides authority for the board to make special examinations of those branches, banks, and corporations. So it is no new provision. I have no interest in it one way or the other.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is disposed to think that it does require a charge, although it may not be large. The Chair will order it changed from the House Calendar to the Union Calendar.

Mr. PLATT. The national banks pay for those examinations. It makes no charge on the Federal Treasury one way or the other. The expenses of the comptroller's office are assessed on the banks themselves.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. WINGO. There is no law, though, requiring these new corporations to be examined. It says "branches, banks, or corporations." I see what is in the mind of the Chair. I am inclined to think that this cost would not come out of the Federal Treasury, because the National Reserve Board issues semiannually an estimate budget of expenses and assesses upon the Federal reserve banks the expenses of the board. I do not recall who pays the expenses of examiners. Possibly the gentleman from New York may suggest. I am inclined to think the banks pay the expense of that.

Mr. PLATT. The banks do, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WINGO. I am inclined to think that even if these corporations were not required to pay the cost of these examiners themselves, the cost of examinations would come within the class of expenditures for which the Federal Reserve Board may make an assessment on the banks.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. There is a question whether the Federal Reserve Board or the Comptroller of the Currency or the Secretary of the Treasury would pay any of the expense incurred under this provision, or the national banks, because the examination is not of the national banks but the examination is of the corporations to be formed under this provision, and I doubt very much whether there is any authority under these circumstances for anybody to assess an assessment for such an examination on the national banks. If there is any assessment, it will probably be on the corporations, and it is a very serious question whether or not there is any power to do that.

Mr. PLATT. May I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this is an amendment to section 25 of the Federal reserve act, which provides for the establishment of branch banks in foreign countries, and also provides, where a bank is not large enough to have a foreign branch bank of its own, that several banks may group together and take stock in a foreign bank, and those banks all come under the regular banking clause, so that the examinations are paid for by themselves. No charge is made on the Federal Treasury for it, and these corporations are of the same kind and subject to the same laws and subject to section 25 of the Federal reserve act, so that I can not see how any charge may be made on the Federal Treasury for the examinations. They are really banking corporations, except that a longer term of credit is extended to them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it does not make any particular difference which way the Chair decides; and, as the Chair is in doubt as to the question of fact, the Chair will decide that it does involve a charge on the National Treasury, and therefore the House will automatically resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

Mr. PHELAN. I would like to know, Mr. Speaker, if there is to be any time for general debate?

The SPEAKER. The rule provides that there shall be two hours of general debate.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 2395, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 2395, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2395) amending section 25 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the act approved September 7, 1916.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule there are two hours of general debate, one hour for those in favor of the bill and one hour for those opposed to the bill. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] for one hour.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman from New York that he ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. PLATT. Yes; Mr. Chairman, I make that request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, if those Members who are interested in this bill will get House Report No. 109, the report of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House, instead of the Senate report, they will find the bill fully explained. The bill had been previously reported to the House as H. R. 6806, but it was afterwards passed in the Senate in somewhat different form.

The purpose of this bill is to finance foreign trade. As everybody knows, we have been sending great quantities of foodstuffs, agricultural machinery, and so forth, to foreign countries, and at the present time we are engaged in foreign trade of that kind and in shipping also machinery, so that foreign factories may be recquipped, those which were destroyed or used for war purposes, for manufacturing munitions, so that they can get on their feet and get ready to resume their normal trade, and be able to trade with us in such a way that we can get back some of the money that they owe us. Unless these foreign countries are put on their feet, so that they can go on with the manufacturing, the farming, and the industries generally which they carried on before the war, we can never hope to recover, it seems to me, the great sums of money that we have loaned them during the war.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Was this a unanimous report by the committee?

Mr. PLATT. My recollection is that it was.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Did the committee have any hearings on those points in this bill with reference to the financial condition of these parties that were expected to get these loans?

Mr. PLATT. We have had members of the Federal Reserve Board before us advocating and explaining the bill, but we had no hearings calling in any outsiders. The conditions are known to everybody, and it was not necessary to go into any elaborate hearings to know the condition in which Europe is. The people have not the money to pay for what we want to sell them and what they must have.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Perhaps there might be a difference of opinion as to the conditions. Of course, there is no question about the difficulty of European nations making payment.

Mr. PLATT. That is the point.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. When I was abroad I was very forcibly impressed with the idea that those nations were for the most part practically bankrupt, possibly with the exception of England, and I see where one very prominent Englishman has asserted that England is bankrupt, and it occurs to me that there might be a very grave question about our ever getting back anything that we have loaned to those countries or getting payment for those things that we sold to them on credit. Were those questions considered by the committee?

Mr. PLATT. Those questions were considered; and the purpose of this bill is to provide for the formation of institutions which can take long-time credits, take bonds or mortgages, for instance, on the factories to which machinery is to be sold. Our foreign trade at the present time is being financed on short-time credits, on bills of exchange, which ought not to be renewable, and which can not safely be renewed after the goods pledged for their security are sold. The time must come when they must be converted into longer-time credits.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. ANDERSON. There is nothing in this bill, is there, which restricts investments in commercial corporations as distinguished from financial and banking corporations?

Mr. PLATT. I do not know that I understand the gentleman.

Mr. ANDERSON. Is there anything in this bill which restricts the investments provided for to the purchase of capital stock in financial corporations as distinguished from commercial corporations?

Mr. PLATT. Oh, yes; these corporations must come under all the restrictions of section 25 of the Federal reserve act. They are strictly financial corporations, banking corporations practically, excepting that they can extend longer-time credit than the ordinary banks or foreign branch banks can extend.

Mr. ANDERSON. The bill itself does not make that clear. Perhaps it should be read in connection with the section to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. PLATT. It should be read in connection with section 25 of the Federal reserve act.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. TREADWAY. At the bottom of page 2 I find this provision:

And, regardless of its location, principally engaged in such phases of international or foreign financial operations as may be necessary to facilitate the export of goods, wares, or merchandise from the United States or any of its dependencies or insular possessions to any foreign country.

May I ask if that is all new law, if there is anything in the Federal reserve act similar to this, or does it supplement the Federal reserve act? My inquiry is directed to this thought: You are providing funds with which to allow goods, wares, and merchandise to be exported from the United States to foreign countries and paid for through this loan. I am wondering if we have not about reached the limit of sending money abroad, if it is not about time to use our capital here at home, and in that way have sufficient capital for carrying on the affairs of this Nation without the continued inflation of the currency. It looks to me that just such movements as this one have a tendency toward currency inflation, which is certainly one of the things that we are contending against at the present time.

Mr. PLATT. This is a question whether we shall continue to sell goods abroad. It does not inflate the currency to sell our surplus goods abroad. It is a question whether we shall provide a long enough time credit so that the goods can be paid for. If we do not do that, we have got to stop sending goods abroad to a considerable extent. If the gentleman will permit me, large corporations like the United States Steel Corporation or the Baldwin Locomotive Works are able to extend their own credits. I have an article here stating that the Baldwin Locomotive Works have recently sold a number of locomotives to Roumania, I believe, on credits extending through several years. They are able to do that. They have the capital and the credit at home to take care of those things so that they can do it, but smaller institutions are not able to extend such long-time credits. They must borrow from the banks on short-time paper, and unless that paper can be renewed and extended over a term of years they will be thrown out and only the larger concerns will be able to sell goods abroad at all.

Mr. TREADWAY. I sympathize with the desire to care for the smaller manufacturer, but nevertheless is it not a fact that in the extension of credit into a long time for payment we are acknowledging the inability of dealers in foreign countries to make such payments as would be required of purchasers right here at home? In other words, we recognize that the business people in those countries are naturally very hard pressed for money, but we are going through this method to extend to them more credits than good business would warrant extending to our own people here. That is my criticism of legislation of this kind. We have had it before. We have had it from the committee of which I am a member—the Committee on Ways and Means—and probably we will continue to have it; but is it not a tendency toward giving to foreign customers loans and credits that are not good business and would not be granted to our customers in our own country?

Mr. PLATT. The corporations which it is contemplated to form under this act are to be under strict control of the Federal Reserve Board. There will not be any credit extended that is not good credit, and the same kind of credit that would be extended in this country. We have cooperative investment associations in this country. They have them in the gentleman's State of Massachusetts. They are called savings banks. They take mortgages and extend credits over terms of years. That is not a perfect illustration, but is somewhat the sort of a corporation that this act contemplates.

Now, I want to say, too, that these corporations might be formed without the passage of this act. Manufacturers and merchants and exporters might find the capital without it, but this act gives national banks the right to subscribe a limited amount, and thereby puts the corporation under the control of the Federal Reserve Board, under the restrictions of section 25 of the Federal reserve act.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. HUSTED. What is the reason for securing this capital from the national banks instead of having it supplied by the Government through a corporation similar to the War Finance Corporation?

Mr. PLATT. The War Finance Corporation is not expected to last forever, and ought not to go much further, and the national banks are already under the control of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. HUSTED. We have always protected the investments of national banks very carefully and have prohibited national banks investing in stocks. It seems to me very unwise, unless some excellent reason is given, to permit our national bank securities, which we have so carefully safeguarded, to be invested in the stocks of corporations that are going to make loans in European countries.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman knows that the original Federal reserve act allows banks having a capital of $1,000,000 or more to establish branches. There were only two or three banks large enough to establish foreign branches, the chief one being the National City Bank of New York, which has now many foreign branches. These branches are a branch of the National City Bank and no other bank has any interest in them. Finding that no other banks could do very much in this line, we amended the law in 1916 by the act of September 7, allowing cooperation between smaller national banks in establishing branches or banks engaged in foreign banking. That is to say, several banks were allowed to get together and subscribe for stock in foreign banks but incorporated in America. They were not allowed to subscribe more than 10 per cent of their capital and surplus. Now, we are proposing to enlarge the system a little bit further by allowing them to subscribe to the stock of corporations which are not limited to short-time paper. They are still practically banking corporations but somewhat in the line of savings banks or farm-loan banks. They are to take longer-time paper than the branch national bank can ordinarily take. It is an extension of the authority given in the act by the amendment to section 25, passed in 1916.

These corporations are brought under all the restrictions of section 25, which provide, for instance:

> Before any national bank shall be permitted to purchase stock in any such corporation the said corporation shall enter into an agreement or undertaking with the Federal Reserve Board to restrict its operations or conduct its business in such manner or under such limitations and restrictions as the said board may prescribe for the place or places wherein such business is to be conducted. If at any time the Federal Reserve Board shall ascertain that the regulations prescribed by it are not being complied with, said board is hereby authorized and empowered to institute an investigation of the matter and to send for persons and papers, subpœna witnesses, and administer oaths in order to satisfy itself as to the actual nature of the transactions referred to. Should such investigation result in establishing the failure of the corporation in question, or of the national bank or banks which may be stockholders therein, to comply with the regulations laid down by the said Federal Reserve Board, such national banks may be required to dispose of stock holdings in the said corporation upon reasonable notice.

These corporations are brought under complete regulation by the Federal Reserve Board through the fact that the national banks are allowed to subscribe. But if a national bank has subscribed 10 per cent already of its capital and surplus to a banking corporation in a foreign country, it can not subscribe any more. This bill does not increase the limit. It allows them to subscribe 5 per cent out of the previous limit of 10 per cent, and if some bank has already subscribed 5 per cent to a stock of a foreign bank under section 25, it can not subscribe for another 10 per cent; it can only subscribe to the extent of 5 per cent to the corporations contemplated in this bill.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. KINKAID. Is there any limitation as to how long a time these loans can be made for?

Mr. PLATT. Not under the act itself; that is left to the discretion of the corporations making the loans or the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. KINKAID. Is there not a limitation on how long a time our national banks may loan on real estate mortgages here in the United States?

Mr. PLATT. They are not allowed to loan money on real estate mortgages at all.

Mr. KINKAID. Yes, they are on farming land.

Mr. PLATT. Yes, on farms.

Mr. KINKAID. They are not allowed to take a mortgage on city property at all, but here in Europe these corporations would be allowed to loan on what—manufactories, or what is it?

Mr. PLATT. I do not know that I can describe exactly what they expect to do, but they expect to take bonds of manufacturing and railroad corporations.

Mr. KINKAID. Bonds?

Mr. PLATT. Or mortgages. The securities would have to be approved by the Federal Reserve Board, and knowing the board as I do, I think there is no question but that the security which would be taken would be ample.

Mr. KINKAID. I too have great respect for the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. PHELAN. Will the gentleman from New York yield for a suggestion?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. PHELAN. Will the gentleman point out the fact that the national banks are not loaning any money under the provisions of this bill? They are taking a certain amount of money if they wish to do it and investing it in stock of a corporation, and the corporation in which they invest the money does the loaning.

Mr. KINKAID. I think that is very plain. I so understand it.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman permit another suggestion?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. WINGO. If the gentleman will turn to the top of page 3 he will see that these concerns are to be principally engaged in such trade or international financial operations as may be necessary to facilitate the export of goods, wares, and merchandise from the United States.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is not a limitation. It is in addition to the usual function.

Mr. WINGO. I did not say it was a limitation. The gentleman is talking about taking mortgages on lands in Europe. That is not the object of the creation of these corporations.

Mr. PLATT. It is to facilitate or finance foreign trade—export trade, primarily, but also, indirectly, import trade.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. I think the Government ought to assist these nations of Great Britain, France, and Italy to get on their feet, and the Government ought to do it on humanitarian grounds.

Mr. PLATT. This is not a Government proposition. This is to get away from having the Government do it.

Mr. HUSTED. I know, but I think the Government should do it, should extend them credit, and should do it on humanitarian grounds and on business grounds, in order to secure the payment of the obligations that we hold of those countries; but what I object to is having the national banks of the United States interested, directly or indirectly, in loans, whether made directly or by a corporation in which they hold stock, that an individual would not want to make. These are not first-class loans.

Mr. PLATT. Oh, yes; they are. We can trust these bankers to look out for themselves. They are just exactly such loans as the Baldwin Locomotive Works is making now.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. ELSTON. Do I understand that the main purpose and benefit of this act is to facilitate, as stated on page 3, the export of goods, wares, and merchandise from the United States?

Mr. PLATT. From the United States.

Mr. ELSTON. I think the gentleman himself and others in this Chamber have emphasized the fact that there is too much of that kind of thing now, that the debt of foreign countries to this country is increasing by leaps and bounds, and that some method must be found to reduce the tremendous debts accruing to us by reason of an overplus of exports, and that we must find some method to encourage the importations into this country of foreign products to pay that debt, which can not be paid in money. Another alternative would be to encourage the investment in other countries of American capital.

Mr. PLATT. That is exactly what this bill does.

Mr. ELSTON. How does it do it, when it facilitates the greater export of goods from this country, and in that way increases the debt of the foreign countries to this country, making it still more impossible for them to liquidate the debts?

Mr. PLATT. Locomotives and machinery, and so forth, are being sold to Europe to enable their railroads, farms, and factories to get started, so that they can produce something to sell to us. By taking the securities of their industries as collateral we shall be investing American capital in foreign countries.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman stated in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] that the War Finance Corporation had no such powers as were given by this bill for the purpose of financing European credits. That is true with reference to the War Finance Corporation as it was originally created, but if the gentleman will refresh his recollection he will remember that late in the last session we enlarged the powers of the War Finance Corporation so that it could finance these transactions and could use hundreds of millions, I have forgotten the exact amount, for that purpose. Does the gentleman know whether that credit has been exhausted?

Mr. PLATT. What I said in answer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] was that the War Finance Corporation was not expected to last forever. It is expected to wind up its affairs as rapidly as it can, not to extend new credits.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Why would it not be better for the War Finance Corporation to keep on than to use this plan?

Mr. PLATT. I do not think so. It is not under the same restrictions that this is.

Mr. PHELAN. And the Government is interested in the War Finance Corporation, and there is a good reason why the Government ought to keep out of this business. We are forming ways and means whereby private capital can take care of the situation.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am inclined to think that there is good reason for both the public and individuals getting out of this.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Will the gentleman indicate to me how it is determined and by whom it is decided whether a foreign financial operation is necessary or is not necessary to facilitate the export of goods?

Mr. PLATT. I think that is a matter that could be easily determined.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. By whom?

Mr. PLATT. Suppose a foreign railroad needs a lot of locomotives, and has not the money to pay for them, but we can take the bonds of those railroads and put them into this foreign corporation and actually become the owners of the mortgage on the railroad. The directors of the new corporation, or Federal Reserve Board, can readily determine whether that is a legitimate paying operation or not.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Then I understand the Federal Reserve Board passes on the question of whether the particular financial operation is or is not necessary to facilitate export trade?

Mr. PLATT. Oh, I think they would do that by general regulation, not by passing on each particular transaction.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. It is a different question in each case, is it not?

Mr. PLATT. These corporations will be conducted by business men as branch banking corporations are, or any other banking corporation, and they will not extend credit where there is not good security or where they are not reasonably sure to get their money back with interest. I expect they will be well managed.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I do.

Mr. DUNBAR. Primarily from what source comes the request for the introduction of this bill? Who is interested?

Mr. PLATT. The suggestion comes from many business interests and directly from the Federal Reserve Board and the advisory committee of bankers.

Mr. DUNBAR. And the purpose is to finance export trade?

Mr. PLATT. That is one of the chief purposes.

Mr. DUNBAR. Now, if this is such good business why are the country national banks to be solicited to subscribe 5 or 10 per cent of their capital stock and surplus in such an adventure? If it is a good business proposition why should not financiers throughout the country become interested and finance our foreign trade? It does not seem to me that the directors of small national banks throughout our country should be solicited, and by reason of the position occupied by directors in the Federal reserve banks why should such moral pressure be brought upon them, as in all probability will be, to subscribe for funds to finance foreign trade?

Mr. PLATT. Well, the average bank director knows pretty well how to take care of himself and of his bank and how to invest his money and the bank's money so as to bring in the largest return. So I do not think that there is the slightest danger in that matter. I may say I do not think it is expected that national banks will furnish the chief part of this capital. I think it is expected that manufacturers and financiers will subscribe more than banks do, and I believe that some movement has been made already toward establishing such corporations as these, but by allowing national banks to subscribe what is really a small amount for the average bank, not above 5 per cent of its capital and surplus, you bring the whole thing under control, so that it can be carefully scrutinized and regulated in a conservative business way by the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. ROSE. The fear of the gentleman from Indiana who preceded me seems to be that these different banks will be solicited to subscribe money. Now, I think this bill carefully provides for that situation, because it leaves it open to them of their own free will to make the obligation, and therefore there is nothing in this bill that indicates the small bank of the country will be solicited to subscribe its money for the extension of foreign trade.

Mr. PLATT. I do not think there is. They have to ask permission to subscribe.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I do.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I understood the gentleman to state that this bill is intended to enable the banks to finance these corporations. It looks to me like a proposition to have the banks become owners, not advancers of credit but owners, of corporations engaged in the export business. Now, if that be true, does not the gentleman think that violates our general notion about the business that banks ought to be engaged in? I would like to have the gentleman's opinion on that point.

Mr. PLATT. These are corporations which are to loan money, but they are not industrial but financial or banking corporations designed to loan money for longer terms and on a different class of security than national banks are allowed to loan on, or branches of national banks.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. JUUL. I do not care to discuss that phase, but I wanted to say that the unfortunate part of legislating in this way is that here we are asked to add to other pieces of legislation that are not before us. We start, in line 15, by saying, after the word "possessions," there shall be added so and so. Now, the members of the Committee on Banking and Currency have had that preceding piece of legislation before them and know exactly what that provides. Now, we are to put an appendix on the legislation, and we have not the former legislation before us; we are putting the story on the house; we see the former story, but we do not see the house.

Mr. PLATT. I shall be glad to explain again just what the section means.

Mr. JUUL. But out in my State we used to have set forth in any new legislation we wanted to enact the legislation that we sought to amend. Now, here you come with a few lines, and those few lines practically opening up the entire matter of national banking and granting vast addditional powers, and the legislation sought to be amended is not before us at all.

Mr. PLATT. It does not strike out anything from the present law. It simply adds a paragraph.

Mr. JUUL. It adds a paragraph permitting national banks to loan to the extent of 5 or 10 per cent, according to this legislation.

Mr. PLATT. Not to loan, but to subscribe to the stock.

Mr. JUUL. To subscribe to the stock of corporations——

Mr. PLATT. Engaging in the financing of foreign trade.

Mr. JUUL. The exportation principle?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. JUUL. It would have been a much more intelligent bill to vote for if the foundation we are adding this to showed in the bill.

Mr. PLATT. There is something in the contention of my friend from Illinois, but to have repeated all of section 25 would have involved the printing of several pages of a law to which this simply adds a paragraph. I have already explained the section amended and have read the essential part of it. This bill does not strike out anything except what is clearly shown in sections 2 and 3. It says there what words are stricken out and what are added.

Mr. JUUL. If I understand the bill correctly, it is not the aim of the bill that each item of loan should be submitted to the Federal Board. The idea is that the Federal Board should create a set of rules under which subscriptions may be made? Is that correct?

Mr. PLATT. General regulations under which these financing corporations are to do their business.

Mr. JUUL. And after the rules have been made each bank would be permitted, after it had made its application, after 1921, to negotiate individually for anything it wanted to negotiate for?

Mr. PLATT. Each one of these corporations, within the regulations?

Mr. JUUL. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. PLATT. I will yield.

Mr. KINKAID. Assuming that the rates of interest to be paid by the European borrowers must necessarily be lower than the interest rates in the United States which these national banks would impose, then what is the business inducement to our national banks in the United States to invest in these corporations to do business in Europe and receive interest at a lower rate than they can secure here in the United States?

Mr. PLATT. Well, I do not believe the gentleman can assume that would necessarily be the case. Interest rates in England, in spite of war and everything else, I think, are lower than they are here at the present time, but I do not believe that is true of the rest of Europe.

Mr. BRAND. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. BRAND. Among other things, this bill will enable the business concerns and institutions in this country to sell to the people in Europe products raised and manufactured by our people who at present have no market for the same here.

Mr. KINKAID. And must the national banks pay for that?

Mr. BRAND. The national banks are not going to make a loan directly.

Mr. PLATT. They are permitted to subscribe to the stock of a corporation which engages in a banking business, but extending longer credit than ordinary banks can.

Mr. KINKAID. Is not their compensation the interest they receive?

Mr. PLATT. The interest they receive on the stock. These corporations may pay 10 per cent or 20 per cent, for all we know. I presume they will all be conducted in such a way as to earn money as our other institutions do.

Mr. KINKAID. They are not the kind of concerns to take deposits; they would not be permitted to accept them. How will they make anything except by straight interest on the loan?

Mr. PLATT. They will use their capital and sell securities.

Mr. KINKAID. They can not accept deposits and thus become enabled to loan several times the amount of their capital stock. If they could have five times as many deposits as capital invested they might double or quadruple their interest.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. PLATT. I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, a member of the committee.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. The national banks of this country are allowed at the present time to invest certain amounts of their money in securities which they carry.

Mr. PLATT. Bonds.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. Bonds of all kinds. This bill is to allow them to also invest a certain amount of their money in this particular corporation. It is to give the banks the privilege of investing here.

Mr. PLATT. These corporations are to make long-time loans on the same class of securities, I presume, as banks now ordinarily make demand loans on.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman allow me to make an inquiry there? He stated that our present national banks were allowed under the law to make certain investments of so much of their bank assets and securities. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether a national bank is authorized to invest any more in securities than it is in notes of their customers? Can it not invest in those to just as large an extent as it can in securities?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; or more.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. They invest more in notes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. A man can invest as much in notes as in securities.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. This is a bank. The banks are allowed to invest a certain amount of money in bonds.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And as much in notes.

Mr. BROOKS of Pennsylvania. And this permits them to invest in these corporations.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It establishes a branch bank in a foreign country. Is not that branch bank subject to the banking laws of that country where it is established, and must it not be governed by such banking laws as that government provides, irrespective of what our laws provide?

Mr. PLATT. I can not fully answer that question. It must be incorporated in America. I presume that when a branch bank is established in a foreign country it must come under the laws of that country.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Thank you. I wanted to bring that out.

Mr. RICKETTS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. I understand the gentleman to say that the national banks now are allowed to invest their assets in securities and railroad bonds?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; in bonds.

Mr. RICKETTS. Under the Federal banking law?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. RICKETTS. But they are prevented under the Federal law from investing in stock?

Mr. PLATT. Yes. That is the reason why this legislation is necessary.

Mr. RICKETTS. If this bill should become a law, would it not tie this country up with Europe to that extent?

Mr. PLATT. Up to 5 per cent of capital and surplus of subscribing banks, a small amount in most cases.

Mr. RICKETTS. Would it not tie up our banks with the credit of Europe?

Mr. PLATT. It would associate them to that extent.

Mr. RICKETTS. And the only income they could receive from that would be a straight income at 6 per cent?

Mr. PLATT. I do not know what the income would be. I do not think that has been discussed. I understand that the War Finance Corporation has made money.

Mr. RICKETTS. In the event these corporations should not be successful and should not turn out to be profitable enterprises, then the banks of this country would lose the 5 per cent, what they would subscribe for this stock; and do not the banking institutions of this country take that risk when we authorize them to subscribe for this stock under this legislation?

Mr. PLATT. It would authorize them to take a risk. But if we are to continue to sell goods to Europe we must take some risk. There is some risk in all trade.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit an interruption——

Mr. PLATT. Yes; I yield to my friend from Massachusetts, former chairman of the committee.

Mr. PHELAN. We are permitting the national banks to take a risk which they ought not to take to-day. This trade has got to be financed. It has got to be done. The way it is done now is by the banks loaning on what appears on the face to be short-time credits and renewing them from time to time without any assurance that they can renew them unless there is agreement to that effect, so that the banks to-day have many obligations of foreign countries in the wrong kind of form. The purpose of this legislation is to have a fixed investment and to raise money in this country from men who want to invest their money and take those investments, and thus help those people across the water who want to trade with us.

Mr. PLATT. That is exactly it.

Mr. RICKETTS. Why not have these private corporations make these advances of money without involving the banks?

Mr. PHELAN. It is hard to get individuals started on this kind of thing on a large scale. The big financiers of the country have realized that they need it, and they do not seem to be able to get the money from private individuals. They can get it from banks because banks are great aggregations of capital. The banks realize that this is essential, and that is the reason why we are permitting them to do it under this act.

Mr. RICKETTS. I understand the gentleman means to convey the idea that when the banks subscribe for this stock, that subscription would induce the private people of this country who have money to subscribe for the stock.

Mr. PHELAN. I did not mean to say that, but I think undoubtedly that is so. But individuals have not done it. It is doubtful whether they will do it to the extent necessary, and therefore we are giving the banks the power to do it.

Mr. PLATT. I do not know whether that is true, that the individuals have not done it.

Mr. PHELAN. I say to the extent that it is necessary.

Mr. PLATT. I think it has been started, and the money is ready to come forward as soon as this kind of business is given the proper status with the proper authority. Even if the banks do not subscribe for this stock to any large extent, it will put these organizations engaged in financing our export trade under supervision of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I understood the gentleman from New York to say, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. RICKETTS], that in some way the money of the banks of this country would be tied up with European credits. How can that occur under this bill, which provides that the money of American banks may be invested in the stock of one or more corporations chartered under the laws of the United States or any State thereof? They are not permitted to invest their assets in any foreign corporation.

Mr. PLATT. No. That is true.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. How, then, would their money be tied up with foreign interests?

Mr. PLATT. Of course, they are to make loans on foreign securities. That is all that I meant by that. They are to take foreign securities, perhaps railroad stocks and bonds, or industrial bonds, or securities of one kind or another that will originate with foreign countries. The corporations contemplated in this bill are to be incorporated in this country.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But the corporations themselves might have foreign assets. Is not that the idea?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; that is what they are for.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman explain to the committee how this corporation is to be financed, aside from this investment? It must be incorporated in the United States, and it must be either by money of citizens of the United States or of foreigners, but it must be a corporation under the control of the United States?

Mr. PLATT. Exactly.

Mr. DOWELL. Now, who is to invest the money in this, aside from the 5 per cent that is authorized of the national banks?

Mr. PLATT. Oh, I think there are a considerable number of manufacturers and exporters who themselves would take stock in such a corporation for the purpose of having it formed and being able to obtain good credits on which to sell their goods. They can not take the risk of selling their goods on short-term credits which they may not be able to renew more than once or twice.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it the purpose of foreign citizens to incorporate under the laws of the United States in order to get this investment of the national banks?

Mr. PLATT. Oh, no; not of foreign citizens; American citizens.

Mr. DOWELL. This does not provide who it may be.

Mr. PLATT. No. I suppose anybody's money is good, but they are American institutions, not foreign institutions.

Mr. DOWELL. But it may be the money of foreign banks or foreign citizens, except the 5 per cent provided in this bill?

Mr. PLATT. I suppose that is a remote possibility. The main point is that the foreign people have not any capital, and we are trying to make it a little easier for them to purchase our goods and give us good security, so that our manufacturers and farmers will not lose their money when they sell goods for export.

Mr. DOWELL. But if it is the purpose of foreigners to get money, this will be an inducement for them to incorporate in a State in the United States, and therefore they will be able to secure this investment of the national banks. Is not that true?

Mr. PLATT. I would not put it that way. It is very unlikely that any foreign money would be invested in these corporations. Does the gentleman mean the money of foreigners living in this country?

Mr. DOWELL. No. As I understood the gentleman, this is to assist the business men of foreign countries to secure money with which to purchase goods.

Mr. PLATT. You can put it that way—to secure credit on which to purchase goods.

Mr. DOWELL. They are interested in securing the credit.

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. I take it they are sufficiently interested to incorporate in the United States or in a State in the United States in order to secure the benefits under this bill of the assistance of the national banks. Is that true?

Mr. PLATT. I can think of the possibility that some of them might invest in these securities; but if they get the credit which this corporation is expected to extend to them, they can use their money to much better advantage in manufacturing in their own country than they could in investing in this corporation, which probably will not give as large returns as they could get at home by engaging in the business of manufacturing.

Mr. DOWELL. Then your position is that it will be American citizens who will incorporate?

Mr. PLATT. I think it will be chiefly a matter of cooperation between American financiers, bankers, and manufacturers to furnish the capital which can be used to make loans on long-time foreign purchases.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. If the gentleman will yield, the purpose of this bill is not to furnish capital for foreigners, but to encourage our own trade with foreign countries.

Mr. PLATT. That is true.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. And it was stated before our committee that in getting up local organizations in this country for the purpose of assisting in the encouragement of our foreign trade, when they would go into a community to sell stock in such an organization, the bank in that community could not under the law take any of the stock, and people would ask, "If this is a good thing why does not the bank take stock in it?" The reply would be, "The Government will not permit the bank to do so." Then the most natural question would be, "Why will not the Government permit the bank to take stock?" That being the situation, they ask that the law be amended so that national banks may be permitted to invest in the stock of these organizations to the amount of 5 per cent of their capital, in order to encourage the people to organize these corporations to promote our foreign trade. Now, the Federal Reserve Board proposed this bill and it has their approval. It simply allows our banks, if they want to, under restrictions provided by the Federal Reserve Board, for a certain set period, to subscribe up to 5 per cent of their capital to encourage the formation of corporations to finance foreign trade, to increase our foreign trade, now that the war is over, in flour, grain, beef, and all farm products; and it certainly ought to be done.

Mr. PLATT. I think that is a good statement of it.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Does this mean that the banks will loan money, or that they will buy stock?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. They may buy stock in such corporations.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Do you think that buying stock in a commercial corporation is a good business proposition for a bank?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. This is not a commercial corporation; it is a financial corporation.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. But it is to extend our commercial relations in foreign countries.

Mr. PLATT. It is to finance a corporation that is to make loans to promote our trade in foreign countries.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. The object of this bill is to permit banks to purchase stock in the corporation, is it not?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. As the chairman of the committee [Mr. PLATT] has explained, large corporations like the Baldwin Locomotive Works have the capital and the credit which enables them to finance their own sales in foreign countries, but smaller corporations can not do that. Now, if they want to organize a financial corporation for the purpose of facilitating and assisting their foreign trade, and want to sell stock in a corporation for that purpose, this bill permits banks to take stock in that corporation to the amount of 5 per cent of their capital.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. There is nothing in the law now that prevents a bank making a direct loan to the corporation, is there, to the amount of 5 per cent of its capital stock?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. No; but this is to facilitate the organization of companies to encourage foreign trade.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. To encourage banks to engage in commercial lines of business.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. No; but to invest not to exceed 5 per cent of their capital stock upon such conditions and under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board to corporations organized under our laws for the purpose of engaging in financial operations necessary to facilitate the exportation of our goods and merchandise, our cattle and grain, and all our farm products.

Mr. DOWELL. What is the difference now, in so far as credit is concerned, whether a national bank loans 5 per cent of its capital stock or whether it invests 5 per cent of its capital stock?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The only difference is that they get the stock of a corporation which is under the control of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. In the one case they make a loan and can get their money back, and in the other case they can not.

Mr. DOWELL. Yes; in one instance the bank owns stock in a corporation and in the other instance it loans money which must be returned to it.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. It encourages the sale of stock in all communities by allowing a limited amount of it to be sold to banks, which is prohibited now.

Mr. DOWELL. I understand that; but what is the difference, so far as the credit is concerned, whether they extend a credit of 5 per cent of their capital stock or buy stock in this corporation to the extent of 5 per cent of their capital stock?

Mr. PLATT. I will tell the gentleman what the difference is: A national bank can not, as a rule, make long-time loans. It must make short loans. If it buys stock, it has an investment which extends over a term of years. This bill provides for cooperating in such investments.

Mr. DOWELL. In a bill of this character you can permit them to make a long-term loan under certain prescribed conditions, and it will then provide for a loan instead of for the purchase of stock.

Mr. PHELAN. If the gentleman will yield.

Mr. PLATT. I will yield.

Mr. PHELAN. I will tell the gentleman the difference. The gentleman wants to form a corporation. He wants me to buy stock in that corporation. I say no, I will loan him the same amount of money. If he is going to run the corporation, which does he want—does he want me to buy the stock, so that whatever money I have put in there will stay there, or does he want me to make a loan in such a way that I can call it at just the time he does not want me to call it?

Now, that is precisely the way of these corporations. If they are going to be formed and be substantial, solid, and stable, they must sell their stock. They are not going to borrow money, which may be called at any stage of the game. They want a fixed investment, so that the money will stay there. From the point of view of the bank, it is unnecessary to discuss it, because if the bank does not invest in the stock of corporations it is not interested in what the corporations do. This is to give the corporations stability and permanency, which they would not have on a borrowed capital.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. As I understand the situation, it is this: Financial corporations will be organized to extend credit to business men in Europe. National banks are to be permitted by this bill to subscribe an amount not exceeding 10 per cent of their capital stock and surplus?

Mr. PLATT. Five per cent.

Mr. DUNBAR. I understood it was 10 per cent.

Mr. PLATT. Ten per cent is the total subscription to foreign banking institutions and to these corporations.

Mr. DUNBAR. My impression was that national banks were permitted to invest to an amount of 10 per cent of the capital stock and surplus, in compliance with the conditions that the gentleman has just explained.

Mr. PLATT. Not in the corporations contemplated in this bill. They are permitted to invest an amount equal to 10 per cent of capital and surplus in three different kinds of corporations—branch banks or banks principally engaged in international or foreign banking, which they may combine to invest in, or in these corporations. If they have invested already 10 per cent in one or more of the institutions already authorized, they may not invest any more. If they have already invested 5 per cent, they can invest 5 per cent more in these corporations, or if they have invested 8 per cent they can invest 2 per cent more in the corporations.

Mr. DUNBAR. The bill limits the investment that any national bank shall make in a corporation in Europe to 5 per cent; is that correct?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; a corporation chartered in this country, however.

Mr. DUNBAR. The purpose of the bill is to permit a national bank to subscribe an amount not to exceed 5 per cent of its capital and surplus in financial corporations organized to extend credit to purchasers in Europe, and so our national-bank stockholders will be interested in financial institutions that finance Europe and the citizens of Europe. Thus our local national-bank stockholders will be liable for losses that may occur by reason of foreign financial operations of these corporations which in this bill enables them to become stock owners.

It seems to me the question is, Should our national bank stockholders be protected so their directors will not be permitted to invest in financial corporations which operate abroad among people and among nations whose stability to-day is not assured?

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman might almost say that the manufacturers and farmers should not be allowed to sell anything in Europe; that they should raise only as much wheat as we could eat. That would be the reductio ad absurdum argument, that we should not raise or produce anything beyond what we could eat or consume ourselves.

Mr. DUNBAR. Manufacturing concerns that are organized for the purpose of making money and selling goods in Europe should be first assured that their operations are going to be financially successful, and they will be to the full extent of their business ability. But having sold their wares to Europe and received commercial paper in payment, that commercial paper which they received in return for their wares could be put up by them as collateral security with financial institutions, and if they are responsible they, in turn, can renew from time to time paper received from foreign merchants as well as from their own credits. It does not seem to me that a national bank in a country town should at any time be permitted to subscribe for stock in financial institutions to operate in countries where to save credit now due we are told we must extend more.

Mr. PLATT. As I have said, the large, responsible concern can sell goods on credit to any amount. The United States Steel Co. can sell all the steel it wants to and take its pay when it pleases or take bonds. Smaller concerns must cooperate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] if no one else wants the floor under the rule. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. PHELAN. There was no opposition in the committee, but I am the ranking member of the committee.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman from Massachusetts is the ranking member, and I think he ought to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts for one hour.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, I think a very much better understanding of this bill can be had if we find out what the present law is and if we find out what this amendment proposes to do. While the question of foreign finance is more or less complex, the question involved here in this amendment is in its essentials very simple. At the present time a bank having the capital and surplus of $1,000,000 or over can establish branches in foreign countries to do foreign banking. That was incorporated in the original Federal reserve act under section 25. Subsequently we amended section 25 by providing that banks having a capital and surplus of $1,000,000 might contribute an amount equal, at the maximum, to 10 per cent of their capital and surplus for the purchase of stock in corporations engaged in foreign banking. I may not be using the exact words, but I am using them substantially. Remember that. Banks of that size could purchase shares of stock in corporations engaged principally in foreign banking.

Mr. HERSMAN. Domestic corporations?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes; domestic corporations. All that we intend to add by this is this provision, that all banks, whether they have a million capitalization or not, may have the authority, under permission of the Federal Reserve Board, to invest an amount not exceeding 5 per cent of the particular bank capital and surplus in the stock of corporations designed to do foreign financing in connection with export trade. The difference between what is proposed to be permitted under the amendment and what is permitted under the present law is this: We permit any national banks which see fit to do it to buy shares of stock in corporations doing foreign financing in connection with export trade, whereas under existing law only larger banks can so buy stock, and then only in respect to foreign banking. First of all, some question might be raised whether or not it would not be possible under existing law for banks having a capitalization of $1,000,000 or over to do the very thing that is contemplated in this amendment for all banks. It is simply a question of what the word "banking" means. I suppose nobody is qualified to give an exact definition of what "banking" means, but the reason we are putting in the phrase "international or foreign financial operations," or whatever the term is, in the amendment is that we want to make it absolutely certain that a certain kind of financing can be done by these corporations in whose stock we permit national banks to invest their money. And the thing we are looking for is this: We want to see corporations formed in this country, either under the authority of the United States or of any one of the States, which can loan funds or extend credit to the people in foreign countries for a long period of time.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman tell me whether these corporations which are to be organized for the purposes stated in the bill are to do a general banking business or simply to make long-term loans?

They can not take deposits, as I understand it. They are organized simply for the purpose of making loans, and, therefore, their total revenue will be the interest upon the loans they make, and that will simply be the interest on the capital they have.

Mr. PHELAN. No; that is not the situation. In the first place, the corporations existing to-day are incorporated under State laws, and some of them have very extensive powers. The limitation we are putting upon them is that the Federal Reserve Board shall have the right to limit what kind of business they shall do, so that it is not contemplated originally that these corporations shall accept deposits and use deposits in the ordinary sense, but that will be a matter to be decided by the Federal Reserve Board. To come to the second part of the gentleman's question, it is not contemplated, as I understand the proposition, that these corporations are going to be limited to the amount of money they raise by the sale of their stock, as to the funds they shall loan. Far from that. In all probability these corporations will put out their own obligations. They may put out a note, they may put out a debenture, they may put out a bond, they may resell the foreign securities. I do not know what they will put out, but they will endeavor to get funds from investors all over the country far in addition to the amount of their capital stock, so that the funds can be loaned abroad.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. In just a moment. This is the situation and this is what we want to do. To-day foreign countries are tremendously indebted to the United States. How are they going to pay their indebtedness? They have not the funds. They can not obtain the funds. If they can get simply credit, that is only robbing Peter to pay Paul. There is only one way in this world that these foreign countries can meet their indebtedness and obligations, and that is by production, and incidentally by saving; but production is at the basis of it. How are they going to produce?

Men in Poland, men in Belgium, men in France, men in England, men in Italy, in any of these countries, want to get raw material from this country, and they want to get machinery and other things with which to do business—locomotives, as was stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT]. How are they going to get them? They have not the money; they can not get the credit. Something has to be done to provide them with the means of producing things, producing wealth. They have got to get funds or credit some place, and we have got to give it to them in some shape or manner. The purpose of this bill is to provide the means whereby we can extend them credit, extend them not only the kind of credit they want but the kind of credit that is absolutely essential for them to have, and give them credit under the safest conditions. Let me explain. To-day there is being extended credit to these foreigners. It is being extended in this way: Banks will loan them money with which to do business. What do they pay? They do not pay cash; they do not pay money; they have not got it; but they give an obligation, a note, or an acceptance, or something of that sort. On its face it is a short-time obligation. It obliges the maker or the acceptor to pay his obligation within 90 days, or three months, but when that obligation is made it is never intended to be paid within 90 days, because both the lender and the borrower, the obligor and the obligee, know that the man borrowing never in the world can get funds in 90 days.

The man who borrows the money, or the corporation or the company which borrows the money, has got to be given time to produce wealth, to produce the means, to produce the products until finally it is on its feet in a stable financial condition able to meet its obligations. That is what this bill is intended to do. The banks of this country necessarily and probably in a limited degree have been obliged to take these obligations, have been obliged to take what, on the face, are short-time obligations but what, in fact, generally through agreement to renew, are long-time obligations. Now, when the national banks or the State banks or the trust companies of this country are investing their money in that way, in most cases they are investing your money and my money and their depositors' money subject to call, investing that money subject to demand in long-time investments. That is a poor, indefensible practice of banking.

I am not finding any fault with the banks for doing it. They are doing it because they have got to do something to bridge over this situation. What we are trying to do by this bill is to provide corporations which will finance these people, who are now being financed by an unscientific banking method, in some degree to finance them soundly, to enable them in a far greater degree to meet their necessities. The way we are doing it is by permitting a national bank to invest money in a corporation which shall engage in this line of business. Now, this is the kind of business in which these corporations, roughly speaking, are going to engage. A corporation, we will say, incorporated under the laws of the State of New York for a certain amount of capital will look into these investments abroad to see what is necessary. Take the case of a foreign textile manufacturer. Some manufacturer over there wants to produce clothes, so that the people may have something to wear. He has not got the money; he has not got the funds nor the credit. He arranges with this corporation whereby this corporation will give him credit, not for 3 months, not on what appears to be short-time obligations but is not at all, but for 18 months or 2 years, by an obligation which on the face of it shows that it is a long-time obligation. This corporation in New York will say then, "We will give you time on this transaction. Of course, you have got to have time. It is foolish to think you can start your business on obligations for three months; we will give you two years." So they will make some arrangement with the corporation. They will get security. What kind of security they get will depend upon the kind of business instinct and business experience and business capacity the corporation has; but where the banks are interested and the banks are going to put up their money, they presume that the men running this corporation are going to know their business; but at any rate they are going to make these long-time loans, and they are going to get the very best security they can; in most cases, we presume, good security.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. In just a minute. But then, after this New York corporation has done that, or while doing it, it needs in some way to get money to carry on its business. This corporation in New York has got to start with the amount invested in their capital stock. They can use that, but they probably will need very much more. If they do, there are several ways in which they can get the money. They can use their own obligations in one form or the other, whether it is debentures or bonds is not material. They can put out some kind of security, backed by this capital and any surplus they can accumulate, backed by the foreign securities held and by other assets, backed by their business integrity and standing in the community, and those obligations can be sold in this country. The people who invest their money in these securities are not people who are simply putting deposits temporarily in some banking institution, but people who keep their eyes open and, knowing what is being done, are putting their money into investments which they expect will be long-time investments.

It is precisely like people buying bonds of any kind. They do it because they want the money in there; they do not want their money coming out in a month or two months or three months. They want it to stay in there. But I am perhaps taking up too much time. Let me conclude by saying the very purpose of this bill is to enable us to do what we are obliged to do, not for the benefit of financing the business or commerce of foreign countries but for our own benefit, for our own protection, and for our own security. Therefore I say the purpose of this bill is to permit that kind of business to be done in the manner which I have briefly and only roughly tried to explain.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. I will.

Mr. HUSTED. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: I understand it has always been the policy of the Government to keep the assets of national banks as liquid as possible, so that they can always meet their obligations on demand; and does it not militate against that policy to permit national banks to invest a portion of their capital in the stock of any corporation whose very purpose is to make long-time loans? Does it not tie up 5 per cent of the capital in stock which they may not be able to sell for 50 cents on the dollar, and which undoubtedly they could not sell readily? The very purpose of enacting this legislation is to encourage people to buy the stock so that the stock would not sell freely in the open market, and you are tying up the capital of national banks in the stock of corporations which are going to be slow assets. You are going to get the national-bank system out of the very splendid condition in which it is in and which inspires general public confidence at the present time.

Mr. PHELAN. I will answer the gentleman briefly. Let me say simply for the sake of the RECORD. He asks whether or not it has not always been the policy of the Government to require our national banks to keep their money in liquid assets.

Mr. HUSTED. As liquid as possible.

Mr. PHELAN. I will say in answer to that it has not always been the strict policy, because under the present national banking act national banks can invest their money in bonds, long-time bonds; they can invest their money under certain conditions in real estate mortgages. I am not quibbling, but I want the RECORD to have the answer straight.

Now, I will say to the gentleman that as a matter of banking principle it certainly is good banking principle to have commercial deposits, to have deposits subject to demand invested in the most liquid assets you can find. Yes; that is true. But I will point out to the gentleman relative to this provision, first of all, what I have already pointed out, namely, that we have given that very authority under the original provisions of the national banking act.

We gave authority in the provision—section 25 of the Federal reserve act—which permits banks having a capitalization of a million dollars or over to engage in foreign banking. That is the first proposition. We have permitted it again by amendment to section 25, which passed through Congress providing that banks of a certain size may contribute an amount equal to 10 per cent of their capital surplus in banks principally engaged in foreign banking. So that we are simply extending the authority for investment in another kind of corporation, or a corporation designed to do a little different kind of business similarly to what we are already permitting under existing law.

To go further, I will say more than that, the amount is small. The amount permitted under this section is only 5 per cent; that it does not in a sense increase the amount which the bank can extend, because that still remains for this kind of an investment under the present law, section 25, 10 per cent in the aggregate. And I will say, furthermore, that the 5 per cent of the capital of the banks is, when you consider the way banks do business and the resources they have beyond the capital and surplus, not a very large sum of money proportionally.

I will say in conclusion that it is manifestly better for the banking interests of the country that these corporations should be formed, and the national banks should be permitted to invest their funds in such corporations than to have the business done as it is necessarily done to-day by banks taking long-time obligations, which on their face are only short-time obligations.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. The amount of money to be obtained by this law, to directly or indirectly finance a corporation doing business in the United States, is too small for the institution to make a success. The danger in this bill lies in the fact that it is intended to stabilize the stock of the commercial corporation asking for credit, who to procure enough money to successfully do business must sell their stock to the public and in doing so use the fact that the bank is, if not in fact, indirectly a stockholder. To divert the funds of an institution that is simply the clearing house of the local public to finance industries doing a foreign business is not the function of a national bank but the privilege of private capital.

Mr. PHELAN. I want to say that what the gentleman says is certainly not complimentary to the banks of this country, when he thinks the banks of this country would invest their stockholders' money and risk their stockholders' money in a corporation when they are going to lose it. I have more confidence in the business capacity and business integrity of the directors of these banks than that, and I am satisfied that the banks of the country, by and at large, are not going to make unwise investments.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. They are not buying at large, but in individual cases.

Mr. HERSMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. I will.

Mr. HERSMAN. I want to ask this: If the object of this corporation is to build up the industries of Europe, would not the best way be to extend credit through Government agencies, and then the United States Government could collect this money if anything happened?

Mr. PHELAN. It would not be a good thing for the Government to get into this. But I think if the gentleman had had an opportunity to go all through this he would see it would not, because the money or credit that is going to be loaned is not going to be loaned—it may be in some cases—but it is not going to be loaned to foreign Governments; it is going to be loaned to individuals and companies and corporations doing business in foreign countries; and certainly the United States Government ought not as a business proposition and as a permanent matter engage in the loaning of money in that way to people in foreign countries.

Mr. HERSMAN. That is very true, but by loaning it to the various foreign Governments they could extend the credit to the corporations and individuals.

Mr. PHELAN. I think this Government has already incurred as much indebtedness as it ought to do, and it ought not, for the sake of loaning to foreign companies, extend this indebtedness.

Mr. HERSMAN. Then it does not seem that a domestic corporation should further extend credit in those foreign countries if it is unsafe for the Government to do so.

Mr. PHELAN. That has got to be done if we are going to have any business at all.

Mr. TREADWAY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. You are asking to put an official stamp of approval, by this enactment, upon private transactions. In other words, you are willing that the national banks should invest in private corporations purely for commercial purposes. Why should you go through the intermediary of voting this Federal authority to national banks? If the people of our country want to make the kind of investments that the gentleman refers to, as incorporated in the bill here, why give the authority to the national banks? Why should not the corporation itself go out to the public and ask for subscriptions to its stock, rather than putting the stamp of approval by doing it as a national-bank depositor?

Mr. PHELAN. I do not agree with the gentleman's premises.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am asking a question.

Mr. PHELAN. I am going to answer it.

Mr. TREADWAY. It is not involved in any theory.

Mr. PHELAN. I do not agree with the gentleman's premises in any particular. His is rather an involved question. There is nothing to prevent a corporation now from being formed in New York, Massachusetts, Connecticut, or any other State, and putting its stock on the market and getting subscriptions and doing business in this way.

Mr. TREADWAY. I presume not.

Mr. PHELAN. But the extent to which that has been done is so small that it does not take care of the situation. It is like so many other things—there has got to be something put behind the thing to give it a push.

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes. That is the very point I am making.

Mr. PHELAN. Yes; that is the point; and you have got to get the National or the State banks or some other large financial institution behind this thing, or you will not make a success of it.

Mr. TREADWAY. In other words, through this bill you want to put the push into this kind of finance, having Government approval, that could not be secured through private capital?

Mr. PHELAN. That is not the situation at all.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is what it develops into.

Mr. PHELAN. No; that is not what it develops into at all. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] had been here when I was speaking before, he would have heard me say that we permit exactly the same kind of thing to be done under existing law in the case of corporations whose principal business is foreign banking. One reason why we are doing this is because we can not be certain what interpretation will be put on the word "banking."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. PHELAN. I will proceed for five minutes more. If "banking" means commercial banking in the sense of short-time obligations, then the present law does not cover the present situation. If it embraces long-time investments, then it would cover the kind of transactions which are intended here. What we are trying to do is to permit banks to take stock in corporations whose purpose it is to loan money in foreign countries where it is necessary for our good. Do not forget that—for our own good; to permit these foreign corporations to finance propositions in connection with our export trade.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. In just a minute. And this is the thing that you must keep in mind always, just as we had to keep it in mind to a much greater degree during the war, that when you are confronted with a situation, of necessity you have got to meet it. You can not pick up a financial paper without reading about the situation in Europe as to their financial condition. They need credit. They have got to have credit, and if we do not extend it to them in some shape, way, or manner, nobody knows what is going to happen to them, and nobody knows what is going to happen to the obligations which they owe us.

Do not forget this fact, that this whole proposition is not an altruistic proposition, to finance our good friends across the water, much as we would like to do it. It is a measure to finance our own trade, to provide a practical way by which we can sell our own exports and receive pay for them, and it is a means whereby these countries can rehabilitate themselves and when the time comes meet the obligations which they owe to our Government.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I not ask if it does not resolve itself into this, that it is a form of securing credit to that foreign trade, to which the gentleman refers, which otherwise would not appeal to the private investors in this country?

Mr. PHELAN. Not for one second. If the gentleman contends that, then the gentleman will say that the matter of buying railroad bonds, the matter of buying industrial bonds, the matter, perhaps, of buying farm-loan bonds does not appeal to the people of this country. But here is where the difference is: We will say that the gentleman has capital to invest, he has funds which he wants to put into good security, but he is not going to take any bond or obligation of any kind whatsoever of a manufacturer over in Poland. He does not know anything about the manufacturing business over there, however much he may know about Poland. He has no means of getting the information except at great expense to himself. He never in the world would invest his money in a bond or note or acceptance issued by that manufacturer or corporation over there, although it might be the safest kind of an investment. But if there is a corporation formed whose business it is to know about that business and about credits of that kind in those countries——

Mr. TREADWAY. It is a private corporation, is it not?

Mr. PHELAN. It is a corporation incorporated under the laws of the United States or of any of the States. It is a corporation, but it is a corporation whereby its stockholders risk their own money and try to make money out of the proposition, and are interested financially in the project, so as to see that their investments abroad are good investments. So I can say to my colleague from Massachusetts, "You can invest your money safely in that $5,000,000 corporation or its securities." It is like the farm-loan system. A farmer out in Nebraska, or a banker in behalf of a farmer in Nebraska, could not come to me in Massachusetts and get a loan, because I do not know the first thing about Nebraska or about his farm or about the conditions; but when something is put between us in the way of an organization formed under the Federal farm-loan act, then I can invest my money in the bonds of those banks and those banks can loan him the money. This is the same sort of proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. PHELAN. I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts reserves the remainder of his time. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] has half a minute remaining.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have a quorum. I will make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves that the committee rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are demanded.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. PLATT and Mr. LONERGAN to act as tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 1, noes 104.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum is present, and the committee votes not to rise.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] yielded to me 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this measure seems to have created quite a considerable amount of uneasiness as to the situation regarding our banking interests. I want you to remember, in the first place, that the national banks own their own money. They are by this bill permitted to invest 5 per cent of it in the stock of banks that are dealing in foreign exchange. That is all. They are permitted, not required, to do so. They may or they may not do so.

Now, the question arises as to why we are doing this at the present time. If any of you keep up with the swing of foreign exchange you will see the necessity for the maintenance of credits in the countries to which we are selling an enormous amount of our products. Our agricultural products are going abroad by the billion, and it is necessary that there be some means by which that business can be carried on.

Under the law as it stood up to a few weeks ago every national bank had the right to buy foreign exchange to the extent of its capital stock. That is, a man sold a consignment of cotton in Savannah or New York to a purchaser in Liverpool. The purchaser accepted a draft at 90 days for the price of the cotton. That draft would be immediately sold. The bank with which the cotton man does business would get the draft and indorse it and sell it to a dealer in foreign exchange in New York. If that keeps piling up, it will take but a very short time until the bank has absolutely all its stock invested in that kind of security, directly or by indorsement. You talk about the danger of investing 5 per cent of the bank's capital in a corporation handling foreign exchange! Why, before we passed the act increasing that limit, they could put the whole of their capital into transactions of that kind, and when the goods are sold and shipped from this country it is necessary for somebody to put up the money. The goods are purchased over on the other side at 90 days, and in a great many instances where they are just recuperating and reestablishing their manufacturing industries, they have got to buy these raw materials on such terms that they can renew their credit for 90 days more, and then perhaps 90 days more, and frequently the credit has to be carried for a year. Now, that is the situation. Is it an alarming thing then that we allow them to invest 5 per cent of the capital of a bank for the purpose of creating great banking institutions to handle this line of foreign credits, and thereby relieve the commercial banks? The ink is hardly dry on the act which we passed the other day taking off the limit, so that national banks to-day can put every dollar they have got and every dollar they can borrow and every dollar of their deposits and everything else into foreign exchange. What is the result? It is all they can do to keep everything moving now. Do we propose to sit down and build a wall around the United States so that we can not sell our products abroad? What will become of the men who raise wheat in the West and cotton in the South, and what will become of the man who manufactures goods in New England or Pennsylvania if you stop the exportation of that which they produce? As I have said, we passed a bill the other day increasing the limit of the amount of foreign exchange that a national bank can buy.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. I know very little about this bill, and I am asking for information. I realize, of course, the necessity for having foreign credit if we are going to be paid for our products.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. I take it that is the purpose of this measure.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. Now, if we have passed a bill that puts no limit on the investments of national banks in foreign exchange, and if we now pass this bill which limits them to 5 per cent, will not the passage of this bill restrict rather than enlarge the foreign credits which they can extend?

Mr. STEVENSON. No, sir; for this reason: The act which we passed the other day allowed national banks to buy as much foreign exchange as they can buy regardless of the amount of their capital stock and surplus, and they can still do that; but it is not healthy that that should be done, because a great deal of that foreign exchange will have to be carried 12 months and some of it 18 months.

Now, what is this proposition? It is, as far as possible, to enable the financiers of this country to get together and to organize corporations that will handle that whole situation and relieve the ordinary mercantile banks from carrying these heavy loads of foreign exchange that they are having to carry to-day in order that our trade may continue to go forward. Gentlemen talk about restrictions on long-time credits and say we ought not to allow them to invest in long-time paper. I think it is going to be a good deal safer to allow the foreign-exchange banks to have paper running for a long time, because the fluctuations at present, and probably for months to come, are very great in foreign exchange. If you have noticed it, I think you have seen that the pound sterling has fallen from $4.85, which it used to be, to about $4.15 in the past week, or about 70 cents below what it used to be. If a small bank has all of its capital stock tied up in foreign exchange, fluctuating as it does, there is danger of its being caught in a tight time and wiped out of existence; but if all the banks get together and risk only 5 per cent of their capital stock in foreign-exchange banks, you will have an institution that will have sufficient backing to carry this foreign exchange and it will be able to hold it until the purchaser of the goods is able to pay for them, and the condition which confronts us to-day where foreign exchange fluctuates to such a degree as to be a menace to all banks that are holding foreign drafts or bills of lading will be remedied; and this will benefit not only the banks but the people who are shipping cotton and flour and wheat and other manufactured articles to Europe.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I ask the gentleman why he advocates that the national banking system should be an agency for securing this credit?

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not advocate that. We advocate their being allowed to become a part of the great interlocking system that will create it. There is nothing to prevent the State banks or private capitalists going into it, and we say to the great institutions that we have created by legislation: "You can enter in and be one of the units, you can be one of the bricks in the wall which is to be erected, which will come if you shut off the exportation of goods of this country."

Mr. TREADWAY. Does the gentleman claim that using the banking system of the country is a benefit to the banks or to the foreign private companies?

Mr. STEVENSON. It is for the benefit primarily of the whole country, because it enables it to market its products in the markets of the world and not have to burden the small banks that have to handle these bills of exchange. It is for the benefit of the institution that is going to have the stockholders and going to handle the exchange, because we assume that it will be handled in such a way as to be of benefit to the public and a benefit to themselves. If it is a benefit to them, it is a benefit to the banks that put money in the stock. The general benefit is what is looked to, and the feeling that in this country every financial institution that is able to do it should have a right to become one of the great financial powers that will enable the United States to maintain its enormous foreign trade and maintain itself in the markets of the country and not surrender them, as a good deal has been said is going to be done, to somebody else who can finance them and who will finance them if we do not.

Mr. TREADWAY. Have not the individuals of the country been generous in that line, in buying Liberty bonds of which we have allowed a credit of ten billions to other countries?

Mr. STEVENSON. That is a credit given to the foreign countries. This is a credit for the purpose of handling the goods of our people which they have to sell and whose market is restricted, whose financial returns are depleted because of the want of sufficient financial ability to handle them.

Mr. TREADWAY. May I be allowed to say that that is the very argument made by the Treasury Department for extending such enormous credit that they would buy manufactures in this country and the subscription to bonds of ten billions was coming directly back into our pockets? But to-day the gentleman from Massachusetts, my colleague, says that the Government as such has extended all the foreign credit it should.

Mr. PHELAN. Will the gentleman yield? I do not know that I said exactly that, but what I meant was——

Mr. TREADWAY. I did not quote the gentleman verbatim, but that was the thought.

Mr. PHELAN. What I meant was that they should not extend any more of that kind of credit when it could be done better in this way.

Mr. TREADWAY. It is taking the money of this country for foreign trade, and it makes no difference whether it is bonds or stocks.

Mr. STEVENSON. Now, I can not yield any further. The people who subscribed for Liberty bonds did so when the cannons roared, when the fight was on, and when everybody had to stand it, and when we had to resort to extreme measures such as would not be resorted to in a time of peace. Now that peace has come we say that the ordinary financial processes of this country should handle the trade of this country with foreign countries, and we want to give the banks, the national banking systems, the same opportunity to become interested in this patriotic work that banks organized by the States, the trust companies organized by the States, and private individuals have for participating in the carrying on of the trade.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. The position of the gentleman, I take it, is that with Europe in its present condition it would be impossible for them to buy and pay for our products.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is the situation. I will give the gentleman an example. Take a cotton mill in Belgium just rehabilitated. That great corporation was eminently successful before the war devastated the country. It took all of their resources absolutely to the limit to get ready to begin and erect a splendid plant, which has a potential future, but it has been unable to buy the cotton. What will it do? It can issue bonds to the bank in Savannah that handles the bills of exchange for cotton, but for the men handling these bonds it is too big a proposition. But if you have bills of exchange, corporations that can give credit for that purpose, with an agency over there to finance it and carry it on, they can investigate it and find out whether the bonds are all right. They can finance it and pay for the cotton, and immediately the returns will begin to come to this country, and there will be very little loss, if any, and an immense amount of trade which is exceedingly valuable will come to this country.

Mr. REAVIS. The question was asked whether this was for the general welfare and benefit of the banks. The great agricultural sections in this country produce an enormous surplus, and if they can not dispose of it over the seas will not that affect the banks?

Mr. STEVENSON. It will destroy them, and I say it is for the general welfare—for the good of the live stock of the West, the cotton of the South, the manufacturers of the North and the Northeast.

Mr. REAVIS. And incidentally to the banks?

Mr. STEVENSON. It will relieve the banks that have to carry these people and which will be ruined unless they can sell their product and ship it abroad. It will not be likely to be a losing venture, for the gentlemen who manage these things, who have the finances to back it up, are usually able to take care of themselves in any financial deal, and the corporation will not be likely to lose anything. If the bank has a surplus and capital of $100,000 it could not lose over $5,000 under this bill.

It is an infinitesimal amount in comparison with the enormous banking facilities of this country, and if you put all of those 5 per cents together you will have a corporation that can deal and deal extensively with the foreign exchange that arises out of these transactions and preserve us from financial and commercial disaster, which will come as sure as day follows night if you do not fix it so that the great crops of this country can go abroad and be marketed and be marketed at a fair price, be marketed so that the money can be promptly realized out of them.

Mr. Chairman, I expected to speak along another line, but there seems to have been considerable doubt as to what the bill means. I have undertaken to tell what I think it means. I think it means, in the place of the haphazard method of handling the foreign exchange of this country, the getting together of the financial interests of the whole country and the pooling in a few great corporations of their tremendous assets, a little from each one, building a powerful organization which will always be able to handle our foreign exchange in such a way that the fluctuations up and down will cut very little ice when it comes to the final result, and we will be protected and our crops and manufactures will continue to move into world commerce as they should do in the reconstruction period which is about to come.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and two Members present, a quorum. The gentleman from New York has one-half minute left, the gentleman from Massachusetts 13 minutes.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, all I want to say in conclusion is that this is not primarily a proposition to help somebody abroad. If the men raising wheat want to export it to these countries those in foreign countries buying the wheat have to have some funds with which to pay for it. The same applies to the men who want to export cotton and to the corporations that want to export agricultural machinery or any other industrial product—shoes, as some one suggests, or anything manufactured in this country. In other words, if we are going to export goods which we must export if our people are going to be prosperous we have got to give some means to the people abroad to get funds with which to buy those things. That is essentially necessary for the progress of agriculture and manufacture and commerce in this country.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. What reason can the gentleman give for reducing the capital and surplus of national banks in the United States, paid in for the protection of the depositors, while allowing that capital stock to be invested in purely speculative enterprises of this kind?

Mr. PHELAN. In the first place, the gentleman is not accurate when he says that we are reducing the capital stock of national banks.

Mr. ANDERSON. You divert it from the object for which it was originally intended.

Mr. PHELAN. I want the record straight. No national bank is obliged to do this. If it does it, it does it of its own free will, and the national banks which will do it in most cases will probably be the soundest kind of institutions that we have. They will do it because they will find it is a good investment. We have all kinds of fixed investments in which banks invest. They invest it in their own bank buildings, for example, and they invest it in buildings which they offer for rent, but the primary purpose of this proposition is to finance our foreign trade. This is the best way to do it, and at the present time it seems to be the only way that we can get the thing started, and that is why we are doing it.

Mr. ANDERSON. Does the gentleman mean to say that these corporations can not be organized and financed without the assistance of national banks to the extent of taking 5 per cent of their capital stock for the organization of these corporations?

Mr. PHELAN. No; I do not say that, but I say that these corporations have not been organized to meet the situation at the present time, and the men who understand most about our financial operations have come to the conclusion that unless at least some banks invest their money along this line we will not get funds in sufficient amount to meet the great need for this kind of a corporation doing this kind of business. It is essential and necessary.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. KINKAID. Is it expected that the exporters of these products and manufactures would invest largely in the stock of those banks that we will establish?

Mr. PHELAN. I think it is not unlikely that they will.

Mr. KINKAID. Would not they be the natural and proper ones to do that? They ought to encourage it.

Mr. PHELAN. Yes; except that this must be remembered, that the average man who is manufacturing goods needs a good deal of his capital in liquid shape so that he can turn it and turn it again, and the best evidence of that is that no matter how large the individual, the partnership, or the corporation, it will be found in most cases that the individual, the partnership, or the corporation is going to the banks and borrowing money with which to do business. As a rule they need the most of the money they have to keep producing, and it is the constant turnover of the capital and other funds that they have that makes production in this country so great as it is.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, in the time left I simply want to say that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] called attention to the fact that when this bill is put into effect it will relieve the national banks of a large amount of obligations which they now have, and to that extent will greatly help them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 25 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the act approved September 7, 1916, be further amended by striking out the period at the end of the third paragraph thereof, and adding in lieu thereof the following: ", or until January 1, 1921, without regard to the amount of its capital and surplus, to invest an amount not exceeding in the aggregate 5 per cent of its paid in capital and surplus in the stock of one or more corporations chartered or incorporated under the laws of the United States, or of any State thereof, and regardless of its location, principally engaged in such phases of international or foreign financial operations as may be necessary to facilitate the export of goods, wares, or merchandise from the United States or any of its dependencies or insular possessions to any foreign country: Provided, however, That in no event shall the total investments authorized by this section by any one national bank exceed 10 per cent of its capital and surplus."

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That section 25 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the act approved September 7, 1916, be further amended by the addition of the following paragraph at the end of subparagraph 2 of the first paragraph, after the word 'possessions':

"'Until January 1, 1921, any national banking association, without regard to the amount of its capital and surplus, may file application with the Federal Reserve Board for permission, upon such conditions and under such regulations as may be prescribed by said board, to invest an amount not exceeding in the aggregate 5 per cent of its paid-in capital and surplus in the stock of one or more corporations chartered or incorporated under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof and, regardless of its location, principally engaged in such phases of international or foreign financial operations as may be necessary to facilitate the export of goods, wares, or merchandise from the United States or any of its dependencies or insular possessions to any foreign country: Provided, however, That in no event shall the total investments authorized by this section by any one national bank exceed 10 per cent of its capital and surplus.'"

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Before the gentleman proceeds, the committee amendment is in a number of sections, although it is only one amendment. If there is no objection, the amendment can be considered by sections.

Mr. PLATT. I do not know that I have any objection, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this proposal is intended to relieve a situation, and I confess that I am not entirely satisfied with what it promises. I have understood from the members of the Committee on Banking and Currency that it meets the sound business sense of the banking judgment of the country as represented by our banking agency in the Government, and probably it is justified; but there is a situation just now confronting the country that makes it seem to be somewhat antagonistic to the best interests of the Government, in that the bill is intended to enhance the export business. There never was a time in the history of the world when we had such an export business as now. Our exports for the fiscal year ending June 30 this year amounted to the enormous sum of $7,225,000,000, and the balance of trade in our favor, which measured the amount we sold above what we purchased, amounts to the enormous sum of $4,129,000,000. That means that we sold $2 and more for every dollar that we purchased. No such business transaction measured in foreign transactions has ever approached such a figure as that before.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will yield to my friend.

Mr. STEVENSON. However, the last month of which we have a report—I believe it was June—they just about balance, do they not?

Mr. FESS. No; the last month, which was June, was $918,000,000, which was $200,000,000 above any month prior. That was, it seems to me, a marvelous figure.

Mr. STEVENSON. But were not the exports and imports within $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 of each other the last month—I believe July? In other words, have they not come back practically to a balance?

Mr. FESS. I have not the report since June, and it was not up to June.

Mr. STEVENSON. The last month I have a report for just lacks a few million dollars of balancing, and it would seem it was swinging back.

Mr. FESS. However, that swinging back is not going to be very permanent for some time to come. I think without doubt that statement is correct.

Mr. PHELAN. Will the gentleman yield for just a second?

Mr. FESS. I will yield to my friend.

Mr. PHELAN. If the exports continue at the same rate, I would like to have the gentleman point out how these foreigners are going to pay us.

Mr. FESS. I will say to my friend that he is now suggesting the most delicate feature of the legislation. In other words, we are constantly putting Europe in debt to us, and this is a proposal to lend them credit to increase their indebtedness to us; and if you are proposing to lend them more credit in order to buy what will add to the indebtedness already incurred, the pay day must come some time. Does the gentleman propose to continue to kite these checks by paying off one credit by another credit from the Government?

Mr. PHELAN. If the gentleman will yield, except we are now providing a means of extending credit to them whereby they can produce something with which to pay us in some shape or manner.

Mr. FESS. That is begging the question. If you extend the credit to them in any form, with that credit they can buy the raw material out of which they can produce. The gentleman brings out the very delicacy of the situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will yield to my friend, the chairman of the committee.

Mr. PLATT. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts hits on what is really the very important point. We are selling to Europe locomotives, machinery, implements, and so forth, to produce with, as well as raw materials with which, when they get to work, they will be able greatly to increase their exports or our imports. They are increasing them now, as has been stated.

Mr. FESS. I know the position of these gentlemen favoring this legislation, and in a sense it is rational. You are proposing to facilitate exports. The truth about the matter is that our exports have reached a plane now where the high cost of living, as the gentleman knows, is a delicate problem, and with the facilities of export it will still continue to increase in the high level. On the other hand, the gentleman wants to maintain our business ability here, which, in a sense, is justifiable; but my question is this: Are you going to continue indefinitely to extend credit to Europe without any regard as to when it is to be paid? This, however, if the gentleman will permit, is of some relief. You do not propose that the Government is going to do it, but you would allow a Government agency to do it. This is not as bad——

Mr. PLATT. Hardly.

Mr. FESS. Well, national banks, in a sense, would be governmental.

Mr. PLATT. Let me say this to the gentleman, that in a large measure this provides for funding debts already incurred. Foreign exchange already has all it can do to pay for our exports, and the foreign exchange lately is so tremendous that something has got to be done to fund some of these bills.

Mr. FESS. I will say to my friend this is a matter of relief; but I think this, that the remedy is just about as bad as the disease, and I think the country is in a status, due to the war, that piecemeal legislation can not very much help; and while I know that this is intended to correct, it is a delicate feature of it, which does not appeal to me strongly enough to win my support.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, unless the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] wants to answer the gentleman——

Mr. PLATT. If the gentleman from Massachusetts desires to answer him, all right.

Mr. PHELAN. I want to take a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. PHELAN. There is a statement which has been made more than once which I think indicates a failure to see the real purpose of this bill. Now, the gentleman from Ohio, who makes a study of all these bills and who follows them very closely, and has done so in this Congress and other Congresses, refers to the enhancing of our export trade. He speaks as if the primary purpose of this bill was to increase and ever increase our exports. That may or may not be a good purpose. I am not prepared to say now whether it is or not, but it is not the primary purpose of this bill, to keep increasing our exports. The purpose is to take care of what we do export and what it is essential we should export. There has got to be some way whereby these foreigners can pay for the wheat and cotton and locomotives and other commodities they get from this country, whether those exports are large or small, and this is a means designed to give it to them.

Let me point out that England has been the great creditor nation of the whole world; that every civilized nation and, I think, uncivilized as well, has paid annually millions of dollars into the coffers of English people, because they have securities secured from all over the world. How those people abroad are going to pay us, I am not ready to say. I do not know how we are going to get the payment. If we get it in goods, we must be prepared perhaps to have those goods coming into our markets and competing with American-made goods. But I can see the possibility of America becoming the great financial center of the whole world to-day and occupying the position that has hitherto been occupied by England alone, and I can see an opportunity by the proper expansion of our foreign trade and proper financing of our foreign trade, whereby the people of this country will hold securities, and good, safe, sound securities, from the peoples of the other countries of Europe.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. To debate this question.

Mr. FESS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] a question. As I understood, the gentleman said that the primary purpose is not to facilitate exports.

Mr. PHELAN. I did not say that. The gentleman used the word "enhanced."

Mr. FESS. In the same sense as "facilitate."

Mr. PHELAN. But that is not the purpose. The purpose is to take care of and finance the export trade.

Mr. FESS. Let me ask my friend this: Is it good governmental policy for us, in order to sell our goods, to extend credit in order to have them paid for?

Mr. PHELAN. It is a thing that is done every day in this country.

Mr. FESS. Is it a good thing, with the status existing between us and Europe to-day, with $10,000,000,000 of credit already in our possession with the peoples of Europe?

Mr. PHELAN. When the gentleman speaks about ten billions——

Mr. FESS. I mean——

Mr. PHELAN. I suppose the gentleman refers to governmental securities?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. He and others must keep in mind that this is not a governmental proposition.

Mr. FESS. Well, it is quasi governmental.

Mr. PHELAN. It has nothing quasi about it. It is a question of a private corporation, a corporation no different, except as its purposes may be different, in its organization and in its theory or principle from the United States Steel Corporation or the General Electric Co., owned by private individuals.

Mr. FESS. It is governmental in that it is giving national banking institutions the privilege to do this.

Mr. PHELAN. But just like any other privilege you give to national banking institutions. You give them a privilege to loan money to you or to me, but those loans to you and me are not necessarily quasi public. This is a private proposition, and the Government's money is not going to be involved in it. That ought to be made as clear as possible.

Mr. FESS. Is my friend at the point now where he wants to discontinue loans by the Government to Europe?

Mr. PHELAN. I rather hope that this Government will not be obliged to put out any more bonds to its own people, and I rather hope that this Government will not be obliged to extend further credit to foreign nations.

Mr. FESS. Are we ever obliged to do it to foreign countries?

Mr. PHELAN. It depends on what you mean by the word "oblige." We were obliged to do it during the war.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would like to express an opinion.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing before the committee.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. HUSTED. I rise for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee why all this matter in the present law was stricken out of the first section of this bill?

Mr. PLATT. I will say to my colleague from New York that the Senate bill, I suspect, was written by some one who handed it in. At any rate, it contains very awkward phrasing, and it simply adds to an already long and involved paragraph language which seems to me not quite clear. The House bill adds a new paragraph, making it a good deal easier to understand. The paragraph or subparagraph before it refers to a bank with a capital of a million dollars, and this paragraph has not any such limitation. You will notice the Senate bill says "or until January 1, 1921, without regard to the amount of its capital and surplus," added right on to another paragraph which ends up with the words "or any of its dependencies or insular possessions to any foreign country."

I will not go into it more elaborately, but I think that the gentleman will admit, when he looks it over, that the House bill is a much crisper way of putting it. In section 3 we adopted some changes which make it more certain that these later paragraphs of section 25 apply.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Of course it is an economic truism that every dollar's worth of commodities that we export to a foreign country for which we do not receive a dollar's worth of commodities in return leaves us just that much poorer, so that the observations of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] are exceedingly well founded.

There would be a much greater occasion for the enactment of this bill if the trade balance were against us instead of in our favor. Now of all times, when we have had for several years a tremendous trade balance in our favor, is presented the least occasion for a bill of this kind designed for the purpose of lending credit to foreign countries.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Not yet. I have not got to what I wanted to say. But the reason that I have stated is not the reason why I am not willing to vote for this bill. It is perhaps a good reason, but I have other reasons that are more obvious. My time is insufficient for me to dwell on my objections to the bill. I merely want to mention two or three of them.

This bill enables national banks to own stock in other corporations. I regard that as bad in principle, and I am not willing to approve it.

The bill authorizes national banks to divert their capital to purposes wholly different from the purposes for which the banks were created. It authorizes a misuse—a perversion—of their assets such as I must oppose.

It enables banks to divert their assets from domestic uses to use in foreign countries, and I would not be able to vote for a bill of that kind.

But there is another ground, Mr. Chairman, which, it seems to me, is still more important than any of these. This bill enables national banks, in substance and effect, to form a combine. That is to say, they may go in together, each one subscribing for a certain amount of the stock of a corporation, owning an equal amount in it, and being practically equal partners in that corporation, so that under this bill they may be able to form a sort of financial trust which will enable them to dominate any industry they choose. For illustration, the national banks of the South would be permitted under this bill to finance an immense cotton-exporting corporation, a concern of such a vast strength of capital that there would be no hope of anybody competing with it in foreign markets. They would be able to finance——

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Not for just a moment. They would be able to finance their corporation in such a way as that there could be no other competitor in the business, and in that way it could monopolize the cotton-exporting business and control the export of cotton, juggle the price at will, sell cotton at whatever price it chose to fix to the people in foreign countries, and pay whatever it pleased to the producers in this country.

The same argument may be applied to the wheat produced in the district of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG], who sought to interrupt me a moment ago. It may also be applied to the manufactures of the district represented by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN]. It may be applied to any industry which depends upon export trade or the prices in which are affected by export prices.

Here we are, as it seems to me, going on with very little thought—for it seems that this particular crotchet in my mind, if it be a mere crotchet, has not been in anybody else's mind—it seems to me we are going on with very little consideration in the House, busily creating a vast financial machine which may have such immense powers that it will be able to crush any industry that comes within the scope of its operations.

The capital of the banks is not merely their private concern. It belongs to the people, and the banks simply hold it in trust for the public benefit. I am not willing, Mr. Chairman, that the resources of banks built up by them out of the people's confidence, out of the money that the people have loaned them or that the Government itself has loaned them, should be used as an engine of oppression, as a means of fostering monopoly, or in erecting a vast trust to sap the strength of American production.

I opposed the measure passed by the last Congress which permitted American manufacturers to organize a trust for the purpose of selling their goods in foreign markets. I opposed it for the same reason that I am going to vote against this bill. If it was wrong that we have a combination or trust of automobile manufacturers or of wheat or cotton producers or of others directly engaged in a business for the purpose of controlling the foreign trade connected with that particular business——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to proceed for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Still more wrong is it, still more does it address itself to our doubts and fears, that it should be proposed to create a purely financial institution having itself no proper interest in an industry which may have it in its power to dominate that industry, to dominate that product, or to dominate any line of American trade that it may choose to project its activities into. I am unable, with the light before me, to give my adherence to this measure. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has again expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I did not have opportunity to be present during much of the discussion of the bill now under consideration. I was elsewhere engaged on official duty. But I have listened with great interest to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. We all understand that we have been financing the world, not only with the credit of the Government, but with our individual credit. We took foreign securities from Great Britain—I do not know how much; but through Morgan & Co. and others there were absorbed in this country, by banks, by capitalists, by individuals, very large amounts of securities that were in existence when this war commenced. Then came the loaning to various Governments. I do not know to what amount, but I suppose it was $10,000,000,000 plus.

Now, the gentleman from Ohio speaks of the extraordinary exports. Of what? Of wheat, the crop just completed, which I suppose is going abroad; cotton, and various other kinds of products that were produced in the country. In the meantime we have a great hurrah about the high cost of living in this country.

Well, inflation of the currency and of the credit. So far we have been able to keep the credit of the Government at a parity with gold. The Federal reserve bank has been a very convenient help in that matter. All the banks, taking securities here and there, some short and some long, have directly or indirectly helped, by financing our own people and in some instances people abroad, and where we have financed our own people they, in turn, have financed abroad as well as at home.

Now, we talk about the high cost of living. What makes it? Oh, you say, the price of wheat is guaranteed at $2.26, and that does it. Not at all, as I understand it. It is what we export of something to eat, and of cotton, of something wherewith to be clothed, and so on.

The people abroad can not pay for what we export, and the argument is made, and truly made, that we have got to finance the world or the world will not buy our goods. Well, we have been doing that. What is the result? Inflation here. Now, we have got to decrease the inflation or the price of living will continue to go up undoubtedly. I do not know of any way to stop the inflation. We keep on selling products that command such an extraordinary price in the United States that from the President down everybody is agonizing about the high cost of living, the newspapers are full of it, and wages and everything else are asked to be increased and have been increased—I will say doubled, but perhaps not as much as that. Now, do not let anybody say I am in favor of it, but we might by law impose an embargo on the cotton going abroad that sells for, I will say, 30 cents a pound.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I would like five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRISP. Will my distinguished friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP. I always listen with great attention to what the gentleman says. I wish to ask him how do prices now compare with prices during the Civil War?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, prices now are much higher than they were during the Civil War. I will just side-step for a second and say that at the close of the Civil War we had an era of prosperity that wound up in 1873 with the worst panic, I think, that this country ever suffered; and we did not get through with unscrambling the eggs and get back to the normal until McKinley was elected President. You understand about that. But that is not very relevant to what I desire to say now. We could place an embargo on exports of foodstuffs. Well, if you should stop the exports of foodstuffs and the exports of cotton, we would not have so much trouble about the increase of wages and the increase of everything else. I am not proposing those remedies, but I do not see how promoting larger exports to feed the world on credit, we furnishing the money to the world on credit to enable the world to buy of us, is going to reduce the high cost of living in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the requisite number of words, merely for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. As I understand it, the main trouble in financing our foreign trade to-day is the short-time credits, not exceeding six months, that usually prevail.

Mr. PLATT. Yes; or even shorter.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That being so, I do not quite see just what effect this provision will have on the length of the credits extended.

Mr. PLATT. This corporation to which the banks are to be allowed to subscribe a small sum, not to exceed 5 per cent of their capital and surplus, is expected to take long-term foreign securities—bonds, for instance, of a manufacturing corporation or a railroad or something of that sort. The thing has been pretty thoroughly investigated, and it has been found that Europe has perfectly good securities, but some means must be found of enabling Europe to realize on those securities. Now, this corporation can investigate those securities thoroughly, take them as a basis, make loans on them, and perhaps issue its own securities based on them.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Has the gentleman any particular corporation in mind when he says "this corporation"?

Mr. PLATT. No particular corporation, although steps have been taken to organize such a corporation, and I am not sure but some small corporations have already been organized.

Mr. McFADDEN. I have in my hand the Ackerman bill, introduced by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ACKERMAN], which is the same as the Edge bill, introduced in the Senate. That is for the purpose of organizing one of these companies to which the banks shall be permitted to subscribe. That is almost a duplicate, I should say, of what the War Finance Corporation was that we organized here a few years ago.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But it is to be entirely a corporation subscribed for by private capital?

Mr. McFADDEN. By private capital and subscriptions by national banks, and there is nothing to prevent foreign capital being invested.

Mr. PHELAN. I should like to suggest one thing which is essential to an understanding of the proposition. This corporation intends to loan money to foreigners engaged in trade or commerce and to make the loans for a long period of time. Now, the way to procure the funds for long-time loans is by raising money from people who want to invest it for a long time. To-day we have not in sufficient number organizations to get the money from people who want to invest it for a long time and loan it in this way. These organizations when formed can loan to people in foreign lands who want to borrow for a long time. The way it is being done now, in so far as it is being done, is by having loans made by our national and State banks on short-time obligations, as they appear on their face, but in reality long-time obligations. The point is that the sums that are being loaned in this way by banks are funds which in most cases are subject to demand by depositors.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Under this bill the banks themselves do not make the loans; they simply acquire the stock in these particular corporations.

Mr. PHELAN. That is true; and I should have said it is to enable corporations to be formed which can obtain money from some sources upon long-time investment which they can loan on long-time terms to somebody else. This bill permits the banks to take stock in such corporations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, as a member of this committee I confess that when the topic was under discussion the considerations that have been submitted by the respected Member from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] appealed to me so strongly that I hesitated to vote for a favorable report. Other considerations that have been presented also added to my difficulty. But it turned out to be a balance between advantages and losses, and after careful consideration the committee unanimously, as I recall it, decided that on the whole the arguments favored this proposal.

The world moves very rapidly these days. I sought the attention of the gentleman from Alabama only that I might point out to him how swiftly the world had moved since he had acquainted himself with the facts; for had he examined the recent figures of the Treasury Department he would have found that most ominous changes in the figures of the exports and imports were presented by the report of the month of July, giving us new problems and new uncertainties to add to the volume that now confronts us.

As a permanent program of investment by our banking institutions, for one I should join with gentlemen who object. Almost have I reached the point where I will join with any other Member in pledging myself to vote for no other proposal at this session that shall in any way add to the miseries of the world by expanding credit and inflating the currency. Almost am I determined that I will vote for no more expenditure of Government money immediately for new enterprises. But, sir, it is a condition that confronts us. The countries of the Old World are nearly bankrupt—perhaps bankrupt beyond salvation. Our duty did not end with the armistice. Our duty was not alone to preserve democracy but to sustain and continue democracy, and our duty will not end until we have given the last ounce of our power to put the world back on a normal basis. [Applause.] Here is one proposal to help mankind carry to completion the purposes of the war. [Applause.]

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to say anything on this measure, but I want to discuss briefly the reasons for my supporting it. There is no altruism in this bill as far as I am concerned. I am not going to support it because it helps the people of Europe. I am for it as a practical business man, because I think it is necessary to check, first, the already inflation of credit, and, second, the wildcat speculation in foreign trade. If you do these two things you will be stabilizing the exports and restoring as nearly as possible normal credit conditions for export trade.

This bill is all the more necessary after the House passed the bill it did the other day over my protest, and I am sure it will go through the Senate unanimously, because I have not found anybody over there who really knows what it does. You passed a bill the other day that did this—it was an amendment to the banking and currency law: Under the present existing law national banking corporations could not purchase foreign bills of exchange in an amount exceeding the capital stock, but there are some banks in the country which are greatly interested in foreign bills of exchange. They came down and asked us to take off the limit. I was not given an opportunity to touch that feature of the bill, but I protested, but could not get rid of it. The House passed the bill, absolutely taking off the limit as to the amount that might be used to purchase foreign bills of exchange. It made an exception of foreign bills of exchange, so that any bank can invest all of its surplus capital and deposits in foreign exchange.

They are taking these foreign bills of exchange, they are taking this foreign export business, and they are deliberately covering most of the transactions into short-term commercial paper, and they know that when that short-term commercial paper becomes due they are going to renew it, and what has happened? You are filling the commercial banking system of this country with what pretends to be upon its face liquid assets, when, as a matter of fact, everyone knows and they admit that they are long-term assets, and you are absorbing the credits of this country for the purpose of financing these foreign operations. I am for this bill because it will call a halt. I am for this bill because it will say to the national banks of this country, "You stop buying that class of paper, you let these private corporations be organized for the purpose of handling this export business, and you let them handle it, and you can invest only to the amount of 5 per cent of your capital stock and surplus in the stock of those corporations." That will stop this wildcat speculation.

All men know that in the foreign trade for the next two years there are going to be millions of dollars made. There will be some parts of the country where money will be anxious to go into an enterprise of that kind, and in other parts of the country it will be hard to raise the money. One group says "We have to get the banks into this in order to get investments at all," and the other says, "No; that is not necessary; and the only reason we do that is to give a standing to it." The only practical reason for letting the banks have 5 per cent of the capital stock is this: One of these promoters will come to your town and he will want to sell you stock in one of these corporations engaged in foreign business, and all this discussion about lands has nothing to do with it, because this bill restricts it to export trade, as will be seen by the language of the bill itself, at the bottom of page 2 and at the top of page 3. The man who is approached naturally says, "I will go to my banker"; and the banker will say, "Have you filed your agreement with the Federal Reserve Board agreeing to conduct that business in accordance with the rules and regulations of the Federal Reserve Board?" He will say "No," and the banker will say "Then I will not advise you to go into it." That is the only practical effect. I am for the bill, because I think it will steady our foreign trade and check possible inflation of credits covering that trade.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, before gentlemen proceed I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of five minutes debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of five minutes debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to have a few minutes.

Mr. PLATT. We have two more sections to read.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Very well; I will get in on one of the others.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Chairman, I approach this subject not from the standpoint of a lawyer, because I am not a lawyer, or from that of a financier, but it seems to me it may be argued out on plain business considerations greatly in favor of the passage of this bill. The United States produces a great deal more than it can possibly consume. For a great many years we have been endeavoring to build up a larger foreign trade, especially with the Orient and with South America. One of the great difficulties in building up such a trade has been the absence of American banks and American banking money in those countries. This bill would remedy that shortcoming. The present unsettled condition following and the result of the war may well be regarded as temporary. Not always are we going to be in the straits we are in now.

The European countries are not always going to be in the distressed condition that they are now. The United States is like a business man who has a lot of customers who are temporarily in bad circumstances and weak financially. They now are, however, consumers of our goods, the same as they always have been. In that state of affairs should we, as has been suggested here by some gentlemen, shut down on sales of our products, keep our goods here, and hoard stuff that we can not consume? Should we let our foodstuffs mold and decay because the credit of our customers is at a low ebb? Is that the idea?

Reference has been made to the enormous margin of our exports over our imports as a subject for alarm. It has generally been regarded as an evidence of prosperity in a nation when this condition exists—when the "balance of trade" is in our favor. Even though we may have to expand our credit in order to maintain the trade, if as a Nation we have the capital to warrant it, that is certainly better than to lock up and hold foodstuffs and cotton and refrain from employing our workingmen in manufactures.

It appears to me that it is the part of good sense to ease up the situation for our customers, to make it possible for them to go on and get the food and the supplies that they require. In that way we will accomplish not only a practical result but an ethical result as well. We ease up on these foreign consumers so that they can go ahead with their own business and put themselves in a way that they can pay up the debts that they owe us, which some gentlemen here are so fearful we may not collect entirely. This depressed state of affairs is not going to last always. Great Britain, France, Italy, and most of the countries to whom we have loaned money, will pay us back. Probably we will not get our money back from Russia for a good while, but from most of these countries we will receive the amount due us. It appears to me that this measure, which is one to tide over the immediate situation and to build upon a sound foundation for the future, is a sound one, and I shall take pleasure in voting for the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That paragraph 2 of said section be amended by adding after the word "banking," in line 3, the words "or financial," so that the sentence will read: "Such application shall specify the name and capital of the banking association filing it, the powers applied for, and the place or places where the banking or financial operations proposed are to be carried on."

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of saying a few words in reply to what the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] said when he spoke about the possibility of a great financial corporation which could dominate our export trade through the instrumentalities provided for in this bill. The United States Steel Corporation, which is the dominating force in the home city of the gentleman from Alabama, can sell its steel rails to a company in South America or in Europe and take the bonds of that company. It has sufficient financial resources to be able to do that—to be able to extend credit over a long time. The General Electric Co. can sell its electrical equipment to Europe or South America and take bonds of the company to which it sells it, and the Standard Oil Co. can do the same. The Baldwin Locomotive Co. not only can do it but is doing it; but smaller concerns can not take these long-time securities and secure with them the capital they have to have on hand to pay the wages of their men and to buy the raw material, and this is for the purpose of enabling the smaller manufacturing concerns and the exporters of cotton and grain, and so forth, not to inflate business but to continue the business we are doing, to get the foreign trade that we are entitled to and must have to enable our demands to be met.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I will yield; certainly.

Mr. FESS. Have we suffered any in our foreign trade because we have not had this sort of legislation?

Mr. PLATT. I will say to the gentleman that within the past week or two there has been a tremendous fall in foreign exchange, which means that our people are not going to get the money they thought they were, because the medium of exchange in which they were to be paid has gone down in value. Now, something like this has got to be done in order to stabilize foreign exchange. The English pound sterling, which ought to be worth $4.86, is worth now something like $4.25 or $4.30.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman means that we are legislating here to stabilize the British consol?

Mr. PLATT. South American or any other exchange.

Mr. FESS. Well, it is the British consol——

Mr. PLATT. Oh, no; the British consol is not money. It is in order to enable us to get back the money for which we supposed we sold our goods.

Mr. FESS. We are extending more credit to insure that we will get as much as we have already expended?

Mr. PLATT. Well, that is one way of putting it.

Mr. FESS. Well, have these institutions that the gentleman intends to help, or that the gentleman intends to assist, ever applied to the Finance Corporation?

Mr. PLATT. The War Finance Corporation is a concern that uses Government money. These are private institutions. We want to get out of the business of the United States loaning its money as fast as we can.

Mr. FESS. I congratulate the gentleman on that, and I think that is a complete answer. If the Finance Corporation is not being appealed to because the gentleman wants to get away from Government activities, I think that is a very wise thing to do.

Mr. PLATT. That is exactly what we want to do.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. McFADDEN. It is a fact, however, that Congress recently authorized the War Finance Corporation to carry on this export business?

Mr. PLATT. I do not remember the terms of that act.

Mr. McFADDEN. At least they permitted them to invest their funds in this class of paper?

Mr. PLATT. To a certain extent, but they are supposed to be winding up their business and not supposed to be taking on any new business that can be avoided.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I only want a minute or so to call attention to one fact: When stock is subscribed in a national bank it is not subscribed to be converted later on into any stock issue in any corporation or company but for the purpose of carrying on a banking business. While it is true that this Congress can pass a law that will legalize that kind of transaction, it does seem to me that we have not the moral right to invest the other man's money contrary to his wishes, desires, and purposes, but that when we loan or invest this money subscribed for bank stock we should at least consult the subscriber's wishes in that regard. Now, these corporations might start in business and in six months or a year's time the value of that stock might be anything from $100 a share down to $10 a share, and the question is, Whose money is being risked?

Mr. PHELAN. Will the gentleman yield for just a moment?

Mr. BEGG. In just one moment I will. I maintain that every man has the right to invest his money as he wishes and where he wishes, but when he puts his money in the custody of another man for a specific purpose I question whether this body is morally fair with him, if legally so, when it makes it possible for the custodian to divert that money for purposes other than for which it was given to him.

Mr. PHELAN. The gentleman understands that no bank is obliged to invest any money whatsoever in one of these corporations unless it desires to do so, does he not?

Mr. BEGG. I do; yes, sir. Now, just one minute. I appreciate fully that a national bank is not obligated to do this, but even if they are not obligated, it is at least a temptation to a great many small banks to follow the lead and the advice of the big bankers. With the control of banks as they are to-day, the pressure that could be brought, if they want to from the top, could be pretty strong if it was so desired. Anyway I think it decidedly dangerous for this body to recommend to the national banks that they gamble with even 5 per cent of their stock, for that is what it amounts to in the end.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. I will.

Mr. WINGO. Under the present existing law the bank with a capital stock of $100,000 can invest $100,000 in foreign bills. If this law passes, they can only invest $5,000 in the capital stock in a corporation that is buying these foreign bills. What is the distinction? Do we not protect the stockholder better than under the present law?

Mr. BEGG. In reply to the gentleman on that proposition let me say this: When I give my bank official my money to invest in the banking business I can see a decided difference in trusting his judgment as to the value of the security he purchases with it as against his taking a gambler's chance in a stock company.

Mr. WINGO. Well, but he is permitted under the law to take 100 per cent chances, and this law is going to limit him to 5 per cent; certainly that protects the stockholder.

Mr. BEGG. I question that seriously. He can not do it in Ohio. I do not know what can be done in the gentleman's State.

Mr. WINGO. The same law applies in Ohio with reference to national banks as it does in Arkansas. Section 5202 of the Statutes, if the gentleman will read it, permits 100 per cent investment in these foreign bills. This act will take that away and limit him to investing 5 per cent in the stock of a private corporation that deals in these foreign bills. In other words, we are going to take this class of paper out of the banks, and they are going to organize private corporations for that purpose.

Mr. BEGG. I will not attempt to deny the gentleman's statement, but I would like——

Mr. RICKETTS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. In a moment. I would like to call attention to this question that seems to me to be a forceful phase of the subject, and that is this: The proponents of this bill admit and state that the credit of Europe is practically at the lowest ebb to-day. Are we not inducing and encouraging reckless expenditure and useless and needless buying by people who can ill afford to buy and who should not make such investment to-day?

Mr. PHELAN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BEGG. I can not yield just at this minute.

My theories and my training on finance may be old-fashioned and wrong, but I was taught not to buy if there was not some chance some time in the future to pay for a thing which I was buying. I believe that is mighty good doctrine to apply to Europe to-day. Let them pay for some of the things they have bought from us, and then if they show good faith and ability to pay, and quit their scrapping and quarreling and fighting, and get down to business and produce with what they have now, then when they have shown that good faith on their part I think the American public will be willing to extend them more credit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the last word. I do not desire to occupy the attention of the House very long upon this question, but there are one or two practical thoughts that have occurred to me. I am not on the committee; I am only giving the bill consideration as it is now read to us. It does seem to me that this is not an occasion for the exercise of charity or benevolence. This is not an occasion for the extending of good feeling, even towards needy foreign nations. This is not a question, either, of helping to feed those on the other side of the sea. It is a practical question to us, as Congressmen and legislators, touching the welfare of the national banking system, pure and simple, and on that basis alone this bill ought to be considered. Of course, the power of Congress to deal with this subject is unquestioned. Congress has the power to deal with this matter, but are we dealing wisely with it when we take away from the board of directors and officers of the bank that responsibility which ought to attach to them and make them careful in handling deposits that are already in the bank—handling the capital that is back of those deposits—and in exercising their duty of preserving the integrity of their financial institution? For it is part of that system which is the backbone of business at home. The question, it appears to me, is this: Is it right to grant this power to the national banks? We are authorizing the national banks to invest in a certain kind of stock. We permit it. It may be good or it may be utterly worthless. You take the responsibility from the director, and the director can subscribe to that stock without having any legal obligation. His duty now, under the responsibility of his office, is to invest legally and properly and wisely. But here you say to him, "There is a stock. You may subscribe for that stock and you will incur no financial responsibility in making that investment, for, forsooth, the Congress of the United States has said that they permit you to do so to promote this foreign trade. In order to do it, thinking one can not raise capital in a legitimate way by the business men of the country subscribing, Congress is going to let the banks put this money into these corporations to promote trade with foreigners, and are going to relieve the bank directors from legal responsibility in making such an investment."

The argument of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] is not pertinent. He said: "The other day we permitted them—the banks—to invest without limit in foreign exchange." Now he says that he is going to vote for this bill in order that at least 5 per cent of the banks' capital may be taken away from the temptation to invest in foreign exchange.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I quote almost verbatim the language of the gentleman when he referred to this subject.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WINGO. I am sorry the gentleman misunderstood me. It was just the opposite. The point I was making is that now they can invest 100 per cent in foreign bills under the law. Under the bill we passed the other day we removed that limit. Under this bill they can only invest 5 per cent of their capital stock in the capital stock of the corporation dealing in foreign bills. They may do it if they want to.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The gentleman's statements are usually, as in this instance, very clear and easily understood. He said he was not in favor of this kind of legislation, but that because we passed a bill the other day he was going to vote for the present measure, inasmuch as it took 5 per cent of the capital of the bank out of the range of temptation to make the investment we the other day authorized and permitted.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield? This bill provides for the capital stock of these companies which are to be organized. When they are organized, is it not a fact that those companies will create commercial paper and sell it to the very same banks?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Why should the avenue and the approach to the use of credit be altered because these corporations are going to engage in foreign trade? Why should they not come to the banks, like every other business and commercial institution, and get their discounts and make their loans? Why should national banks take a part of their capital, which is pledged as a protection to the depositors and those dealing with the banks, and probably invest it in a stock which would not be worth a farthing when the time came to account and settle for it?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, while my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] is one of the ablest debaters in this House, he misunderstands somewhat the purposes of this bill. If anybody will read it he will see that it says that any national banking association "may file an application with the Federal Reserve Board for permission, upon such conditions and under such regulations as may be prescribed by such board," to invest in any amount not to exceed 5 per cent, and so forth. All that the banks are given is authorization to ask permission of the Federal Reserve Board to make this investment if they want to do so. If that board is not satisfied with the investment; thinks that it is financing foolish things; if it thinks they are taking securities that are not good—and everybody knows that Europe could give ample assets if you give them time to realize on them—or, if it is not satisfied with its business in other respects, the board can refuse permission. It brings it under the restriction of section 25, applying to branch banks, and so forth.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. HUSTED. Is it not true that even if this legislation is passed, national banks can still buy all the foreign exchange they want to buy; in other words, is not this in addition to authority already granted? They can buy just as much foreign exchange if this bill is passed as they can now, and in addition they can invest 5 per cent of their capital stock in the capital stock of a corporation organized to make these foreign loans.

Mr. PLATT. This is a cooperative proposition, to enable the capital of the country to cooperate in taking care of foreign exchange. Yet they can buy foreign exchange now and some of them are doing so.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. PHELAN. The point that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] must not forget is that the moment these corporations are formed they are going to relieve the banks of a kind of security which the national banks are now carrying, and which they ought not to carry, according to the best principles of banking. These banks are now taking short-time credits and renewing them.

Mr. PLATT. Yes. They are renewing them from time to time.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I regret to differ with my friend from New York [Mr. PLATT] about these matters, and therefore I want to ask him some questions to clarify this situation.

Mr. PLATT. Very well.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Are not these stocks to be subscribed for by the national banks under the terms of this bill? Permission is to be given to the national banks to subscribe for this stock?

Mr. PLATT. Yes. The national banks are to ask permission of the Federal Reserve Board to subscribe for this stock.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Then it does not represent the case of stock which has assets behind it being offered to the bank, but it presents an instance of an entirely new venture being presented to the bank directors for an investment of 5 per cent of their capital, does it not?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; very much as the Federal reserve bank did.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Therefore to that extent it is permission to speculate in a stock that is purely speculative?

Mr. PLATT. Well, it is an operation where, if we did not have this sort of restriction, any bank would be allowed to act. Foreign banks are generally allowed to do it—to cooperate with corporations in their own interest.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. According to your experience with national bank examiners and their work, if a national bank examiner came to your bank or to mine and saw in our possession a stock that had no quotable value and that perhaps could not be sold on the market, would he not say, if that were paid for out of the capital of the bank, that the capital had been impaired to that extent? Surely he would. Now, if that be true, are we not giving them permission here to impair their capital to the extent of 5 per cent?

Mr. PLATT. No; not any more than when we allowed them to subscribe to the stock of the Federal reserve bank. I know of one bank in my district that charged off its purchase of stock in the Federal reserve bank to profit and loss, but that bank thinks better of Federal reserve stock to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have given but little time to this matter, and I am going to be very brief in my remarks. But to me it seems that by this legislation we are putting more power in the Government to direct the national banks in the use of the people's money deposited there. Under the law a stockholder in a national bank is liable to the depositors for double the amount of his stock. That is to say, if a national bank fails, the capital stock of the bank must go to liquidate the debts, and then the stockholder is called upon for another like amount to make good the credit to the creditors of the bank. This is a heavy penalty upon the stockholder. This legislation opens the door to the investment, as it seems to me—and if I am not right, I want to be set right by some man who is more familiar with the details of the bill than I am—it opens the door for wider opportunity for loss of money by the national banks.

One gentleman in discussing this bill stated that these bills were to be taken for 90 days, and renewed and renewed, for 18 months in some instances. I submit that if a bill for the sale of goods to a foreigner is renewed for 18 months, your collateral security gets away from you.

Mr. PLATT. That is the point exactly.

Mr. PHELAN. It is just to get rid of that unscientific way of doing business that this bill is designed, so that a corporation can safely own from that foreigner a bill for 18 months, and know that he has that bill for 18 months, and get good security.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; but how does this bill strengthen the security by renewing the loan? And if a bank invests in the stock of another bank and the value of that stock is poor, the value of the bank's stock is gone.

Mr. PHELAN. It is no different from buying railroad stocks or bonds.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; but the man who buys railroad stock now is a fool. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. PHELAN. They have always been permitted to invest in those bonds. It is simply a matter of business judgment.

Mr. FORDNEY. No sensible man, with the valuable securities in this country for sale, drawing good rates of interest, will buy even good railroad stocks or bonds under the chaotic conditions that exist to-day relative to railroads. There is not a railroad in this country that knows whether its stock is worth a penny.

Mr. PHELAN. I did not say "stock." I said "bonds."

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, say it is bonds. Another thing: We have been shouting our heads off in the last 30 days about lowering the cost of living in this country. We want to bring down the prices to the consumer. That is right, is it not? And the administration is advertising through the papers and to the galleries that it is going to do it, while Mr. Hoover sends word from abroad that unless we loan to foreign countries $4,000,000,000 to buy our products that we are going to send abroad there will be the greatest slump in prices that ever came to the people of the United States. What do you think of that? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. In a moment. Think of it! One branch of the Government, of which Mr. Hoover is a part, advocating boosting prices by the loan of $4,000,000,000 to foreign countries in order that they may buy American products and keep up prices in this country, and the President, at the head of the Government, shouting for lower prices! Ah, the essence of inconsistency! [Applause on the Republican side.] Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JUUL. I wanted to know from the gentleman if that is not what we have been sitting here these three months in the hot summer time for—to have a decided slump in the prices of necessaries?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. The President went on a junketing trip abroad for eight months, and when he came home he called Congress together because of the serious conditions existing in the country. And when we talked about recessing here for four or five weeks he sent word to Congress that not under any circumstances should Congress adjourn, because of the serious condition existing in the country. Now he proposes himself to go away on a political tour of 30 days, beginning to-day, and asks the schoolboys—Congress—to stay at home and attend to business. That is his idea of consistency. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That paragraph 3 of said section be amended by striking out the words "subparagraph 2 of the first paragraph of this section" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "above," so that the paragraph will read:

"Every national banking association operating foreign branches shall be required to furnish information concerning the condition of such branches to the Comptroller of the Currency upon demand, and every member bank investing in the capital stock of banks or corporations described above shall be required to furnish information concerning the condition of such banks or corporations to the Federal Reserve Board upon demand, and the Federal Reserve Board may order special examinations of the said branches, banks, or corporations at such time or times as it may deem best."

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am not entirely happy in finding myself in opposition to the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee and the members of that committee. I think the committee have been very careful in presenting legislation that is generally sound. I think we all will agree, however, that there have been some proposals during the war that were not entirely sound, but they were excused because it was war time, and both sides of the aisle supported the proposals.

Mr. PHELAN. If the gentleman will yield, so that the record will be correct, there was only one piece of legislation that I recollect about which the committee had any hesitancy, and we were obliged to submit that because of the pressing emergency abroad.

Mr. FESS. I wanted to state that I believed there was some legislation that in my opinion was not entirely sound. I do not mean to say that the committee itself announced that it was unsound, but I felt then and feel now that some legislation was proposed that the Committee themselves were not entirely in accord with, and that they would not have reported except because of the existing emergency.

This measure surely invites speculation; and if there ever was a time when we ought to discourage speculation, it is this hour. For since the war began the circulating medium of the world, not including Russia, has increased from $15,000,000,000 to $45,000,000,000. Russia has $80,000,000,000 of circulation, which renders her purchasing power valueless and her price level for necessities out of sight.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLACK. It is my understanding that the purpose of this bill is to stabilize the foreign-exchange situation. Does not the gentleman think that an unstable foreign-exchange situation does more to encourage and bring about speculation than any other one thing that could happen?

Mr. FESS. I do not think a bad condition of foreign exchange enhances speculation. It disturbs business, but high prices always enhance speculation. When we are on a high-price level people seem to think they are doing well. If a man is getting $6 to-day and has to pay $6 for what $3 would have purchased before the war he makes himself believe that he is doing well, because the $6 passed through his hands instead of $3. This is fundamental, gentlemen of the committee, that high prices always breed speculation. High prices just now, as everybody must admit, are due to the conditions of the war, and they naturally invite inflation the like of which we have never seen in the world.

The speculative spirit is not only here, but it is everywhere.

Now, if the gentlemen of the committee will bear with me a little while, as a student of our own history, I wish to remind them of certain events in our own country which mark great speculatory periods.

The first financial crisis of our history of any significance was immediately after the Revolutionary War. The common expression to describe the valuelessness of money at that time was that it was "not worth a continental." Without a basis of redemption, when money has no value, and prices range high, speculation throughout the country reaches such a plane that great confusion must follow. That was what occurred when we ultimately went into the famous crisis that followed the Revolution. Speculation was induced specifically by conditions of the Revolutionary War.

In 1819 the second financial crisis broke upon the country. There has been a good deal of dispute as to just what produced it. The truth about the matter is that the War of 1812 was really the distinctive cause of a speculative spirit that carried people into the making of wild purchases, and the crisis broke in 1819.

The next great crisis that came to our country, as I recall it, was in 1837. A good many people say that crisis was precipitated by President Jackson's specie circular, wherein instead of the Government taking State-bank funds in payment for public lands he required that those payments should be made in specie. I think that was the occasion for that crisis, but it was not the cause of it. The cause of the crisis of 1837 was a speculative period in our history induced by wild speculation in public lands throughout the Middle and Far West. It was in 1831 that Chicago was established. It was in the thirties that there was a great exodus from the East to the West in the settlement of the new country, and we were in a period of wild speculation, and the crisis came inevitably.

In 1857, prior to the Civil War, when things seemed to be pretty stable, we went into another financial crisis, and people have questioned as to whether that had any connection at all with the Mexican War. Probably it had not, because it came 10 years after that war; but when President Buchanan vetoed the homestead act in 1857 there had been an effort again to move westward, to expand the country, and the Nation was in a more or less speculative period. Then note, members of the committee, that it was in 1853 to 1856 that the Crimean War broke. Never up to that time was there such a demand in Europe for the products of America. Here was the beginning of our great export trade. At the same time the famine broke out in China, and that enhanced the tremendous export trade of America to the Far East, and again a speculative spirit caught up our people.

Another crisis came in 1873, and a good many of our friends thought that was due to the demonitization of silver at about that time. I do not think so, but you and I may differ as to whether it had anything to do with it or not. But 1873 was after the period following the Civil War, which was followed immediately by the completion of the Pacific railroads, where we voted 130,000,000 acres of land as an inducement to build the roads, and a subsidy of $60,000,000 out of the Treasury for the purpose of building the roads. While I indorse what was done to build the great West, nevertheless it induced a wild speculative spirit among our people, and the crisis followed as an inevitable effect follows a cause.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is making a very interesting statement, and I want to hear the rest of it. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph in the bill be closed in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the committee for the additional time. I wanted to make these observations with reference to the period of speculation in the country. A crisis came to us in 1907. There has been also upon that question a great variety of opinion as to the real cause, but all will admit that in the years preceding 1907 we never had a greater era of industrial activity than at that time. Everywhere the steel business was at its very climax and the business of the country generally was on the acme, and the panic came at the very moment when the people were talking about the great prosperity of the country.

Mr. RICKETTS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Certainly.

Mr. RICKETTS. Can the gentleman tell us about the crisis of 1893?

Mr. FESS. There has been a great variety of opinion as to the cause of the crisis of 1893. The Republicans claim that it was the passage of a certain bill—the Wilson tariff measure—which went into effect in 1894; a bill which so disturbed enterprise that there was produced such a state of uncertainty that it brought on that panic. But whatever may have been the cause of that panic or crisis, all will admit that there was a period of speculation preceding it.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. PLATT. Is not this what happens in panics: The country has ample resources, people have long-time securities on which they can not borrow and can not realize?

Mr. FESS. No; that it not the fact, I think.

Mr. PLATT. This bill will prevent just that thing.

Mr. FESS. No; panics come when we are doing business on an unsound business basis and not because there is any difficulty in making exchange. I want to bring this statement to a conclusion and make it applicable to the present hour. The crisis following the Revolutionary War was induced by excesses that precipitated a speculative era. The same thing occurred in 1819, 1837, 1857, 1873, 1893, and 1907; and if ever there was a time when the world was wild with speculation, it is this minute, right now. [Applause.] I say to you gentlemen that instead of our passing laws inviting speculation, enhancing the speculative spirit, we ought to be passing laws to relieve the period of speculation. [Applause.] If we do not get back to a sound business basis, where business is done on rational grounds, this country will see, as surely as we are here, a crisis that will come suddenly and swiftly. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, like the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] who has just spoken, I regret very much to differ from the able chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee and his able associates. I would like to inquire of this House how much longer and to what extent is this question of legislation to be continually enacted in this House. Gentlemen who were present at the last session will remember that during the closing hours we extended the powers of the War Finance Corporation, authorizing it to use the enormous sum of a billion dollars for this very purpose, for the purpose of financing foreign trade and extending credit to the extreme limit of five years. And, further, that it might go on with that kind of power for one year after the time when President Wilson should by proclamation declare that peace had come.

Now, then, what has become of this money that the War Finance Corporation was authorized to use? Has the War Finance Corporation concluded that it ought not to advance any more, or has it exhausted this billion dollars in addition to the other credits we have given Europe? No gentleman on the committee seems to be able to answer that question. Perhaps they have not investigated it. Possibly they did not think it was necessary.

Mr. PLATT. I did not hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. My question was, What has been done with the money given to the War Finance Corporation for this same purpose?

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman can easily ascertain that by asking the War Finance Corporation, or by examining its reports. That is a Government institution, and we are trying to kill it and get it out of business.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman will not kill it by this bill; it will continue for one year after the declaration of peace by President Wilson. It will still have all its powers. The gentleman simply declines to consider the real question, which is, Are we going to extend an indefinite credit to Europe?

As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] said, it is the great expansion of credit which leads to inflation and speculation. Inflation to the man who has already received too much credit leads to more speculation. I think Europe has already received too much credit. [Applause.] Inflation to a man who has already received too much credit is like giving a man who has imbibed too much another drink. As soon as you give him that he wants another, and another, and still another, only to make his condition worse.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Is the gentleman in favor of an embargo on further exports to Europe?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am in favor of only letting Europe have as much goods as she can reasonably hope to pay for. Mr. Hoover has just stated that a great period of speculation in goods sent to Europe had sprung up, and the ports of Europe are clogged with supplies and material for which Europe can not pay.

Mr. WINGO. That is true, but which does the gentleman prefer—the plan of the committee, that says that we are going to leave all this to private financiering, or the plan proposed by Mr. Hoover, that the Government undertake to guarantee these credits? That is the choice that you have got to make, and the committee brings the bill to allow private financing.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, I have not got to assume either horn of the dilemma, and do not propose to do so.

Mr. RICKETTS. Is it not the law now and do not our statutes prohibit banks from purchasing the stock of any corporation?

Mr. PLATT. Oh, no; the law does not. The law allows banks to purchase stock in foreign banking corporations.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that that is my understanding of the law.

Mr. RICKETTS. They are allowed to purchase bonds.

Mr. PLATT. Our banks are required to purchase stock in the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That has no bearing on the question before us. As I have stated, any inflation of our credit is almost as bad or quite as bad as an inflation of currency, because it has nearly the same effect. It increases the normal amount of bank deposits by reason of the credit caused by the negotiation of such bills as this measure is intended to promote. It permits speculation which raises prices unduly and enhances credit to those who ought not to receive credit, and in my opinion this bill ought not to be approved.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to acknowledge, of course, my indebtedness to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] for the very comprehensive review of our financial troubles during our history as a Nation, and to call his attention to one error which he commits in making his first speech. He says that this was designed to enhance credits, to enhance the amount of money that was to be invested in this class of securities. He has not yet comprehended the intention of this bill. The proposition is not to increase, but it is to mobilize a small per cent of all of the bank investments of the whole United States into one great whole; that is, able to finance the carrying on of our foreign trade, not only with Europe but with China, Japan, and South America.

Everybody seems to have forgotten that a great amount of our goods go elsewhere than to Europe. The gentleman says that this is going to enhance the price of living, that it is going to help transport foodstuffs from this country, and in this he is joined by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. There is a great deal more wheat grown in this country than we will consume. Does the gentleman advocate the prevention of the shipping of that abroad; and if he does, what is he going to say to the farmer of the West, who made a noise last year because we fixed the price of his wheat at $2.26? There are to-day in the ports of this country cargoes of wheat that we do not need in this country, that are waiting right now until sufficient finances can be raised to finance the foreign exchange and to pay for it before it goes abroad, and the farmer at home is waiting for his money that he is to get for his wheat; and the man that buys it from him is waiting for his money in order that he may go and buy more wheat. If you want to go back to your constituents and say that you legislated for the purpose of putting down the price of the wheat and that your great congressional leader advocated defeating legislation which would enable the farmer to get $2.26 or $2.50 a bushel, then you will have to answer to the farmer.

The gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. GREEN of Iowa] has said that we constituted the War Finance Corporation to finance these things. We propose by this bill, and it does not come from the Democratic side of the House, to get the Government out of that and mobilize the wonderful resources of the banking institutions of this country and to make a financial institution that can handle the foreign trade. I have heard a heap of talk about the laboring man. Where is he? The laboring man who is organized, that you are all more or less afraid of, is the fellow who is in the factories of this land. He is making goods for foreign export, and whenever you restrict, according to the ideas of the gentleman who has spoken that way, the power of this country to finance its shipments to China, Korea, and Japan, and South America because they are on long-time credits, and begin to restrict the markets of their goods, you restrict the price that the manufacturer gets for them and you restrict the amount that the laborer will get; and whenever you break the foreign market of the manufacturers of this country you are breaking the market for the laborer and you are going to have to answer to him.

Where is the other laborer? He is in the wheat fields and the cotton fields and the grain fields, and whenever you take a course here that avowedly is taken for the purpose of preventing the fruits of his labor from having an open market throughout all of the world and a proper financial return for that, you have taken from him part of that which he had won in the cold and the heat, in the sun and the rain, of the western plains and of the South, and you are going to have to answer to him.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] was very solicitous about this bill, which helps to market wheat, corn, and cotton and manufactured goods, lest it cause the price of living to advance by raising the price of such articles owing to free markets for them. He shows no such solicitude when he, as chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, reports bills to this House. He has reported and passed through this House four bills, to wit, one to increase the price of surgical instruments and glass for certain eyeglasses. So that there is an extra charge coming to the man who loses his appendix to a doctor, or the child who has defective eyes and must wear glasses. He got the lame, the halt, and the near blind there. Second, bill to add $2,000 a ton to the tax on tungsten used to harden steel for tools, making the tariff about $2,150 a ton on that, increasing thus the cost of the tools of the mechanic who builds your house and makes and repairs your machinery. Third, bill to increase the tariff on buttons, raising the price of buttons on the clothes of the boys and girls, the men, and the women of every walk in life. Fourth, a bill to increase the price of zinc. This gets everybody who has a galvanized roof or bucket or cup or anything else galvanized. It specially raises the price of many necessary household articles for the poor. So after putting up the price of these necessary things for the benefit of manufacturers, he proposes to salve his conscience by trying to defeat this bill and beat down the price of the farmer's surplus, which he must sell in the markets of the world and in competition with the world, and of which there is a surplus in this country, which would cause ruin to the agricultural sections if it could not be sold abroad.

In this purpose the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], chairman of the Republican congressional committee, is an able aid. He voted for the tariff bills to raise the price of the products so protected and refuses to vote for this bill for fear it will maintain the present prices of farm products. A noble pair of brothers, with bowels of compassion for the protected manufacturer, but with a marble heart for the farmer who produces more than this country can use.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 2395, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, which, of course, is privileged. No quorum is present. The vote is automatic. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will summon absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 161, nays 85, answered "present" 2, not voting 182, as follows:

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

On motion of Mr. PLATT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all who spoke on the bill just passed may have the privilege of revising and extending their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

NATIONAL BANK SUBSCRIPTION TO UNITED WAR WORK CAMPAIGN.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I call up House joint resolution 87, and, pending going into Committee of the Whole——

Mr. GARRETT. Just a moment. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up House joint resolution 87, on which the gentleman from Tennessee raises the question of consideration. The question is, Shall the House now consider the resolution?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the resolution reported, so that we may know what it is.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 87.

Authorizing national banks to subscribe to the United War Work Campaign.

Resolved, etc., That it shall be lawful for any national banking association to contribute to the United War Work campaign in the same manner and under the same conditions as they are authorized to contribute to the American National Red Cross by section 1 of the act entitled "An act authorizing national banks to subscribe to the American National Red Cross," approved May 22, 1918.

Also the following committee amendments were read:

Strike out, in lines 4 and 5, the words "in the same manner."
In line 5 strike out the word "as" and insert the words "and limitations under which."

The SPEAKER. The attention of the Chair has been called to a precedent which decides that on Calendar Wednesday when the House automatically resolves itself into committee on a bill the question of consideration must be raised in the committee. So the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] can raise the question of consideration as soon as the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the gentleman from Connecticut will take the chair.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is this such a bill as requires consideration in committee?

The SPEAKER. It is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is too late.

Mr. TILSON assumed the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the House joint resolution No. 87, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 87, authorizing national banks to subscribe to the united war-work campaign.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, a partliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT. The title having been read, is it now in order to raise the question of consideration?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. GARRETT. Then I raise the question of consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the committee consider the resolution?

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GARRETT. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 83, noes 48.

So the committee decided to consider the resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] is recognized.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this resolution be limited to 30 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, it is not in order now anyway, and will not be until after there is general debate, to make the request.

Mr. PLATT. It is a very short resolution, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York make a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. PLATT. I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this resolution be limited to 30 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for one hour. The gentleman can reserve his time if he wishes to do so.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, this is a very simple proposition. Everybody remembers how in the middle of the war last fall the united war workers' organization was formed, combining the Salvation Army, the Young Men's Christian Association, the Knights of Columbus, the Jewish Welfare Board, the Library Service, the War Camp Community Service, with the indorsement of the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury, and how everybody was appealed to to contribute to the support of all of them, with funds allocated so that each one was to have a certain share. That campaign was carried on successfully, and I am informed that the Comptroller of the Currency, who has charge of the banks, gave to them tentative permission to subscribe to that fund as banks, with the statement that he would recommend ratification by Congress, which he did. Under the circumstances, I think he was right, and I believe that Congress should authorize the payment of the subscriptions. The banks had a prosperous year and the subscriptions made are a trifling part of their earnings. They have subscribed and are holding, I understand, something like $3,000,000, which the war workers practically have spent, borrowing as they needed the money. I can see no very good reason why, inasmuch as we gave the banks the authority to subscribe to Red Cross funds, we should not give them the right also to subscribe to this fund. It is the last time. It is one subscription. That is all. It seems to me it is rather a narrow idea to entertain that we should not grant this dispensation at this time.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CURRY of California. Then this bill is an attempt to validate an illegal act that was authorized by the Comptroller of the Currency?

Mr. PLATT. I will not say it was authorized. They asked him if they could subscribe, and the comptroller, as I understand it, gave them some kind of a warrant for thinking they could. He stated that their subscriptions must be tentative, subject to the authorization by Congress.

Mr. CURRY of California. I think it is time to stop that.

Mr. PLATT. Some bankers can probably tell you more clearly what was said. We had his letter before us when the bill was reported last winter.

Mr. CURRY of California. But this is to validate an illegal act.

Mr. PLATT. No. We gave the banks the right to subscribe for the Red Cross.

Mr. CURRY of California. Yes. But we did not give them the right to subscribe for this organization.

Mr. PLATT. This bill was pending at the time the subscriptions were made. The United War Work Campaign was being carried on, and the banks were led to believe that the legislation would be passed.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. The United War Work Campaign, as I understand it, is not a corporation. It is simply an informal working group of several big philanthropies that were active during the war.

Mr. PLATT. I think it was incorporated.

Mr. ROGERS. It occurred to me that as this bill was drawn——

Mr. PLATT. I think it was incorporated.

Mr. ROGERS. Then it should be named in capitals. The United War Work Campaign in the bill is made up of small letters. It does not seem even to have the title of any particular institution.

Mr. PLATT. They associated together for a specific purpose.

Mr. ROGERS. It occurred to me that there was a practical danger in this bill as it stands. The gentleman has explained that it is intended to be retroactive only in effect. Why can not any organization, by calling itself "The United War Work Campaign," be permitted under this language as it stands to receive a gift from any national bank? It seems to me this should be safeguarded in some way, even if it is basically a proper provision.

Mr. ANDERSON. Does the gentleman say this language is retroactive?

Mr. PLATT. It is intended to be, in a sense.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not think it validates anything that has been done heretofore. It merely authorizes contributions to be made hereafter.

Mr. ROGERS. It would not tie up a particular kind of recipient even for the future. Anybody can call himself "The United War Work Campaign" and take money under this language.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; I yield to the former chairman.

Mr. PHELAN. I think anybody can not call himself "The United War Work Campaign," because I am informed that is incorporated.

Mr. ROGERS. It was not incorporated by act of Congress, and certainly from the way this thing looks, just as a matter of cold type, if you like, there is no evidence of incorporation.

Mr. PHELAN. I was not in the committee at the time this resolution was taken up, but I think I can explain the situation. Last year, when this resolution was introduced, The United War Work Campaign was not a corporation. Therefore small letters were used. But before we attempted to bring up the resolution at this session it was incorporated.

Mr. ROGERS. Where?

Mr. PHELAN. In some State.

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly not by act of Congress?

Mr. PHELAN. Oh, no. But it has been incorporated, and it is a definite corporation. We have used the words in small letters because, I suppose, the resolution was copied from last year's resolution.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PHELAN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. That would not cure the objection to it, I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN]. The fact that it has been incorporated under the laws of a State makes it possible that that charter might be amended under the same law and granted to a new organization, so that that would not meet the objection urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. PHELAN. It is a definite proposition.

Mr. PLATT. Gentlemen can quibble as they please over this, but this money was contributed. The war is now over. The money is being held. The question is whether we shall release to the treasury of this organization the moneys that the banks are holding for them and are willing to give them. The bill limits contributions to the present war under the terms of the Red Cross act, to which reference is made in the bill.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. RAKER. Under the present law it would be illegal and a crime for a national bank to contribute money to this organization?

Mr. PLATT. I do not remember how the law reads. It would be illegal.

Mr. RAKER. There is a penalty for disposing of the funds of a bank for any purpose other than that for which the bank was organized, and if they spend any of the bank's money by contributing to such an organization they are violating the charter under which they are acting, and the charter could be taken from them. Is not that right?

Mr. PLATT. I do not know what the penalty is, but I understand they are not permitted to subscribe to charitable or any other objects.

Mr. RAKER. Does the gentleman mean that these banks have actually contributed the money now?

Mr. PLATT. They have agreed tentatively to contribute, upon the passage of the act, and the money is being held for the war workers.

Mr. RAKER. Have they actually disposed of it to the organization named?

Mr. PLATT. I have not heard of such a case.

Mr. RAKER. The report accompanying the resolution says the contributions by the banks have been made tentatively, upon the statement made by the Comptroller of the Currency, subject to the ratification by Congress. What right has the Comptroller of the Currency to allow any bank to violate the law and misappropriate the trust funds that it has in its possession?

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman knows that last year we were at war; that all of us were interested; that we all contributed all we could and tried in every way to obtain contributions.

Mr. RAKER. Surely.

Mr. PLATT. And we did a good many things then that we would not do in peace times. These banks have made these subscriptions with the understanding that Congress would validate their act.

Mr. RAKER. Did not the Comptroller of the Currency send out letters to the effect that the banks could contribute to the Red Cross, but to no other organization, subject to certain penalties?

Mr. PLATT. I think the Treasury did send out a letter saying that they could contribute to the Red Cross. Whether the comptroller sent out such a letter as the gentleman describes I am not sure. I have never seen it. But the case, as I have said, is very simple. During the height of the war every effort was made to collect this money, and it was a large sum. It was very difficult to raise it. Everybody knows that individual directors and stockholders of banks could have contributed, and doubtless many of them did contribute, but some of them were rather tightwads perhaps. The amount of the contribution made from each bank was a trivial matter, nothing affecting the solvency of the bank or its ability to earn dividends or anything of the kind. The amount of each contribution must be reported to the comptroller and also the earnings from which made. There is involved, I understand, about $3,000,000, which spread over the total of 7,700 national banks, with a capitalization of billions of dollars, is not a matter of very serious import. It will subject these war-work organizations, which have already used the money in large part, if not wholly, to pretty serious inconvenience if we force them to go out and find these contributions from some other source.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. PLATT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JUUL. I want to state that I am for this resolution. It seems to me that the only thing we can do is to ratify what these banks have already done. They subscribed to organizations that were doing a wonderful work for our soldiers, and it seems to me that we to-day are in the same position that the druggist was when his clerk called up to him through the speaking tube, "Is Clancy good for a drink?" "Has he had it?" "He has." "He is." [Laughter.]

These people subscribed this money in good faith. They were told by authorities that they believed to be good that they might go ahead and do it; and for us to sit here and say that the organization that has used these subscriptions must go somewhere and try to find the money to reimburse the banks would be entirely out of the question. It is as legitimate a proposition as the one that we passed here reimbursing manufacturers who had incomplete contracts. I think, gentlemen, that we ought in decency to help out the committee and pass this bill. I was not with the committee on the former proposition that they had up to-day, but I am with them on this one. It seems to me an honest thing to do to help these banks out and to help the organizations that have benefited by the subscriptions. Everybody thought we were doing right when we contributed to organizations of this kind. [Applause.]

I want to ask pardon of the chairman of the committee for talking in his time; but it would be the only chance I would get. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. PLATT. I am very glad to yield to the gentleman for his beautiful little speech. It could not have been said better. Now, I want to read just a few lines from a letter from Mr. John H. Crawford, who has been greatly interested in this work. He says:

These funds have already been tentatively contributed by the banks who only await the sanction of Congress to make payment. The welfare organizations had calculated on securing this money last fall and had arranged for its expenditure. The bill did pass the Senate.

You will remember that the bill did pass the Senate and was on the Unanimous Consent Calendar of the House, and would doubtless have passed if the session had lasted a little longer. Naturally it could not be passed by unanimous consent.

Mr. VESTAL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Not at present. Mr. Crawford says further:

But owing to the rush of business at the close of the session, it was not reached in the House. Consequently the work of these organizations has been sadly handicapped by this unexpected shortage of funds which they had not anticipated.

Now that states the situation in a nutshell, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. PLATT. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BEGG. I want to say to the gentleman that I am in entire sympathy with this bill, and hope it will be passed, and I would like to read to him an amendment that I would like to offer at the proper time if he thinks it will do the thing that I want to do.

Mr. PLATT. I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. BEGG. In line 4, strike out the word "contribute" and insert the words "pay a contribution," and following the word "campaign," in line 4, insert the words "of 1918," so that it will read:

That it shall be lawful for any national banking association to pay a contribution to The United War Work Campaign of 1918.

I would like to inquire when will be the proper time to introduce that amendment, if the committee thinks it all right?

Mr. PLATT. Personally I should be entirely willing to accept such an amendment. If anybody thinks there is any possibility of this being a continuing proposition, I am entirely against any such continuing proposition. This is merely to make good what was expected to be done.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think it is in the mind of the gentleman from Ohio and in my mind that the language of the resolution does not validate contributions heretofore made.

Mr. PLATT. If the contributions had been made in the sense of having been paid over, it would not, but these contributions have been held up pending action by Congress.

Mr. ANDERSON. Held up by whom?

Mr. PLATT. By the banks. They have been subscribed but not paid, to the great embarrassment of the organization.

Mr. ANDERSON. The subscriptions were as invalid as the payment would have been. As this act is now drawn, it would not validate the subscriptions or prevent a prosecution for making the subscriptions if they were illegal.

Mr. PLATT. I think the amendment which is proposed to be offered by the gentleman from Ohio would perhaps be an added safeguard, though I believe the Red Cross act safeguards the matter.

Mr. PHELAN. If the gentleman will yield, the purpose is to permit the banks to contribute what they agreed to do.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman from New York allow the bill to be read?

Mr. PLATT. It has been read twice—once to the House and once to the committee.

Mr. CANNON. I wish the gentleman would let me read it again; it is short.

Mr. PLATT. Very well.

Mr. CANNON (reading)—

Resolved, etc., That it shall be lawful for any national banking association to contribute to The United War Work Campaign, under the same conditions and limitations under which they are authorized to contribute to the American National Red Cross by section 1 of the act entitled "An act authorizing national banks to subscribe to the American National Red Cross," approved May 22, 1918.

Now, that does not validate what was done during 1918. It authorizes, if I understand the English language, subscriptions to be made now, after the passage of the act.

Mr. PLATT. They can make them now; that is all they want.

Mr. CANNON. They might go on and take in other united war-workers' organizations, and they could get another drive on.

Mr. PLATT. No; there is only one.

Mr. CANNON. It does not validate what they attempted to do, but it authorizes them to do this in the future.

Mr. MASON. Does not the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG], which authorizes them to pay the subscriptions, cure it?

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; the whole matter is thoroughly restricted in the Red Cross act, and this is under the same conditions of limitation.

Mr. GARRETT. If I get the time I shall undertake to point out reasons that apply to this that do not apply to the Red Cross. If the gentleman will yield in connection with what was said by the gentleman from Minnesota——

Mr. PLATT. I will.

Mr. GARRETT. I take it that technically the contributions have not been made; they have been promised but not made. They are still in the coffers of the several banks who have promised them.

Mr. PLATT. I think that is a fair statement.

Mr. GARRETT. Perhaps on that ground it will be construed that if they should make the contributions under this bill, which I do not think they ought to make——

Mr. ROGERS. Does the gentleman know that fact; does the gentleman in charge of the bill know?

Mr. GARRETT. If it is not a fact, every bank that has paid out money has violated the law of the land.

Mr. ROGERS. Apparently, as the chairman has said, acting in pursuance of the general permission of the Comptroller of the Currency——

Mr. GARRETT. I do not think so; I do not think the Comptroller of the Currency had any authority to grant permission.

Mr. PHELAN. I am certain that the Comptroller of the Currency never gave them any authority to contribute.

Mr. ROGERS. I only read the language of the report:

The contributions from the banks have been made tentatively by permission of the Comptroller of the Currency subject to ratification by the Congress.

Mr. PHELAN. I am sure the Comptroller of the Currency never authorized them to contribute.

Mr. ROGERS. What does the statement in the report mean?

Mr. PHELAN. I did not write the report.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I think the gentleman will find that the controller never did authorize it. I saw the letter from the controller issued some time last October, in which he said that the national banks could not contribute to any fund save and except the Red Cross, and he set out the act at large in the letter. It was a full-page letter, fully warning all banks that they had no right to contribute anything except to the Red Cross, because there was an effort to get the directors who had a little money to use the bank's fund instead of using their own money. That was the reason the letter was sent out.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time, and the gentleman may speak in his own time.

Mr. STEVENSON. I was just going to correct a statement made. The comptroller's letter which was exhibited last fall to the Banking and Currency Committee stated that they had no legal authority to make the contribution, but that he would recommend that this act be passed, and that they could make them tentatively until the act was passed, and then they could be paid, if Congress ratified.

Mr. PLATT. That is what the report means. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] is a little hypercritical.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the intent of the law—whether it is to authorize future payments of past pledges or to validate past payments?

Mr. PLATT. As far as the chairman of the committee knows, no payments have been actually made up to this time, and I think the gentleman from California is right, that the comptroller did send out a letter warning banks against making any actual payments, but did say that he would advocate the passage of this bill, and he did advocate it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I have just talked with the Y. M. C. A., and while they could not give me the exact facts as to whether it had been incorporated as a united war workers' association, they had been doing business with the Government, the Government had approved their budget, and they had received Government bonds, and the Government has recognized it as an entity for doing business.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule there is one hour of general debate in control of those in favor of the bill and one hour in control of those in opposition. Does the ranking member of the Committee on Banking and Currency desire recognition?

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] is opposed to the bill, and he is a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I expect only to use two or three minutes of the time and then to yield the balance of it to gentlemen who desire to speak. I do not want to make any captious opposition to this bill, but I have been opposed to it all of the time. I did not file a minority report. I merely want to state the reasons why I am opposed to it. I have been opposed to all of these contributions by banks because the funds of the banks are trust funds in the hands of the directors and I do not think it is a good thing to allow them to give them away. We may regulate the manner of their investment and we may widen the door so that they can make different investments, but when it comes to contributing them to charity I think it is opening a door that is unwise and, therefore, I have been opposed to all propositions of this kind.

I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] has stated very succinctly the principle upon which I am opposed to this legislation. I do not think that it is consistent with sound banking principles for the banks to contribute to organizations even of the worthy character of those embraced in this organization known as the United War Workers, and certainly I think it is extremely unwise for the legislative body to open the door to enable those who hold these funds in trust to contribute them without even consulting those whose funds they thus hold.

There is a distinction between the organizations represented in this United War Workers' association and the Red Cross. The American National Red Cross is incorporated by act of Congress. It is a Federal incorporation. Its purposes are clearly defined in the charter granted it by Congress. Therefore we know what it is. Any change in its purposes or in its attitude can only be had through the action of the Congress which created it by changing its charter. The United War Workers' organization is composed of a number of organizations, all of them voluntary in character, and, so far as I know, none of the individual organizations have been incorporated. So they are not subject to any regulation of law whatever by either the Federal Government or by any of the States. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] stated that the several organizations had been consolidated for the purposes of that campaign, if I understood him correctly, and the consolidated organization incorporated.

Mr. PHELAN. I was so informed when the matter came up in the last Congress by a man very closely identified with this campaign.

Mr. GARRETT. Does the gentleman remember in what State it was incorporated?

Mr. PHELAN. I do not think he told me.

Mr. GARRETT. It seems to me that would be information which this Committee of the Whole ought to have before passing upon the proposition.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would state to the gentleman that I do not think there was any incorporation or any consolidation in any legal sense, but the representatives of the Y. M. C. A., the Knights of Columbus, and other organizations formed an association and apportioned the funds to be contributed under the head of war work funds, and the contributions were made with the understanding that they might be apportioned as agreed to by this organization, but that was not arbitrary. Individuals might contribute to any one of the organizations.

Mr. GARRETT. I understand that. But I was speaking of the legal condition of this organization. I was just saying that the gentleman from Massachusetts stated to the committee a few minutes ago that it was his understanding that this United War Workers' organization was incorporated under the laws of some State.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not think it was.

Mr. GARRETT. Well, I do not know how that is, and I would like to know; but even if that be true, and accepting that as a fact, it remains that that is not a Federal organization. It is an organization created under the laws of a State. We know these various elements that enter into it, but we have no knowledge of what new entities may be admitted to it, and, of course, the authority of this act continues until peace is declared. It seems to me, therefore, by reason of the fact that it is proposed here to authorize the trustees of an express trust to take funds belonging to individuals without consulting those individuals and contributing them even for these worthy purposes is indefensible, and I fear the precedent that will be fixed, and particularly is that true when they are authorized to contribute to an organization with which the Federal Government had absolutely nothing to do, in whose organization the Federal Government had no part, and which, if incorporated at all, was incorporated under the laws of a State with a charter subject to be amended under the laws of that State at any time, or, if not incorporated, is but a mere voluntary organization.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Has the gentleman any knowledge as to the total amount of contributions that this bill would validate?

Mr. GARRETT. I have no knowledge. But the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT], if I understood him correctly—there was much confusion at the time—stated that it was about $3,000,000.

Mr. LONGWORTH. About $3,000,000?

Mr. GARRETT. That is my recollection; that is the way I understood the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In the gentleman's judgment, what would be the effect of the failure to pass this bill? Would there be any obligation on the directors of these banks, for instance?

Mr. GARRETT. Oh, I do not think so.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is, to make these contributions?

Mr. GARRETT. I do not think so.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It would be simply the loss to the associations?

Mr. GARRETT. It would be a loss of the contributions to the associations to whom they had been promised; but I assume, of course, that the directors in making the promises to those who called explained to them at the time that it was necessarily dependent upon the ratification by Congress.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman does not know that to be the fact?

Mr. GARRETT. Of course not; but I would naturally assume that would be so stated. Now, there is a question I desire to ask the gentleman from New York——

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I will.

Mr. McKEOWN. Is there any report of any kind showing what was done with the money collected that was legally contributed over the country as to whether they need the balance of this $3,000,000?

Mr. GARRETT. I know of none. Of course, that would not be a matter with which Congress would have anything to do. The gentleman means as to whether this money is actually needed. I do not know about that. Perhaps some gentlemen who are members of the committee can tell something in reference to it. I would like to ask some member of the committee, if I may, in reference to this language:

That it shall be lawful for any national banking association to contribute.

May I ask if the whole body of directors must pass upon it, or if the president alone or some official of the bank is authorized without a full directors' meeting to make the contribution?

Mr. PLATT. Does the gentleman ask me?

Mr. GARRETT. I ask the question of some member of the committee. This says:

That it shall be lawful for any national banking association to contribute—

And so forth.

Does that mean that the board of directors must meet and make a contribution, or what is the practice about that, if the gentleman knows?

Mr. PLATT. I think that is the practice. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to this fact—that each association is required to report to the Comptroller of the Currency within 10 days after the making of any such contribution the amount of such contribution and the amount of net earnings in excess of such contribution.

Mr. GARRETT. That is in the Red Cross provision. This says it is subject to the same terms——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. PHELAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I will.

Mr. PHELAN. I will call the gentleman's attention to the act permitting contributions to the Red Cross where it says:

Such sum or sums as the directors of said association shall deem expedient.

And inasmuch as the contributions made under this act are under the same conditions and limitations, I think that answers the gentleman's question.

Mr. GARRETT. I think that answers the question. But it does not answer the objection which I think is fundamental on this proposition. And at the proper time I shall propose an amendment which, if the resolution is to pass, I hope will surely be adopted.

I yield back the remainder of the time.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MORGAN. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope the gentleman will withdraw it.

Mr. MORGAN. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. STEVENSON. Now I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] if he desires it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I only desire half of the time granted to me.

I have listened to what the gentleman in charge of the bill has had to say, and I think if this bill passes at all it ought to be amended as was proposed by my colleague from Illinois. Then it would mean what the gentleman in charge of the bill says it does mean. As I read it, it does not legalize anything that has been done, but authorizes, after this act is passed, these various war-work organizations to receive contributions from the national banks.

We did lots of things during the war that we would not think of doing now that the war is over and the armistice has been signed. I did not favor this proposition in my heart, and I rather guess I did not vote for it. I either held my peace or voted nay on it when it was up in 1918. Why, think of it! Here is a bank with 5 or 7 or 10 or 40 directors, as the case may be—although I think none of them has as many as 40. These directors are created by the stockholders. In the great majority of our country banks—and it is even more true as to the city banks, I guess—there are small stockholders, widows, people with fixed incomes, many of them poor, who think all right and are willing to help along, and were willing to help along, although perhaps here and there was one who could not well afford it; and it was a proposition to take property of the orphan and the widow, in many instances many with a small fixed income, without their assent. Then, again, there were many stockholders who contributed individually all they felt they could afford to contribute while carrying other burdens. I do not believe, especially inasmuch as the armistice has been signed and peace has practically come, however long technically the war may last, that this legislation should be had for the future. If contributions were promised contrary to law or without authorization of law, that promise ought not to bind, by the action of a board of directors, the stockholders who, perchance, in most instances, as doubtless was the case, made individual contributions. And whether they did or not, this proposed action ought not to be validated.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum. [The Chair proceeded to count.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration House joint resolution 87, authorizing national banks to subscribe to the United War Work Campaign, had come to no resolution thereon.

COMMISSIONED PERSONNEL FOR THE ARMY—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. KAHN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted a conference report on the bill (S. 2622) to provide necessary commissioned personnel for the Army until June 30, 1920, which was ordered printed under the rules.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2622) to provide necessary commissioned personnel for the Army until June 30, 1920, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed by the House, insert the following:

"That until June 30, 1920, the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to maintain such commissioned personnel in addition to the officers of the Permanent Establishment and to retain at their temporary grades such officers of the Regular Army as in his judgment may be necessary for the proper performance of the functions of the Military Establishment: Provided, That additional officers so maintained shall be selected, so far as practicable, from officers and enlisted men who served during the emergency and are applicants for appointments in the Permanent Establishment: Provided further, That after October 31, 1919, the total number of commissioned officers, exclusive of retired officers and disabled emergency officers awaiting discharge upon completion of treatment for physical reconstruction, shall at no time exceed 18,000: Provided further, That no officer on the active list shall be detailed for recruiting service or for duty at schools and colleges, not including schools of the service, where officers on the retired list can be secured who are competent for such duty: And provided further, That hereafter officers retired for physical disability shall not form part of the limited retired list: And provided further, That 1,200 emergency officers shall be assigned to the Air Service, of whom not less than 85 per cent shall be duly qualified fliers."

And the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2622) to provide necessary commissioned personnel for the Army until June 30, 1920, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on:

The Senate receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the House with changes, the effect of which are as follows:

The first change enables officers of the Regular Army who at the present time are at the head of the construction, transportation, and other divisions of the Army to retain their present assignments at the head of those divisions, otherwise they would be demoted to their regular grades in the Army, and the temporary emergency officers who now are serving under them would outrank them and succeed to the command of the divisions.

By the second change, the date, October 30, is changed to October 31. This change is deemed desirable, as it was originally intended to have the date fixed as the last day of the calendar month.

The third change is intended to help retired officers and disabled emergency officers who may be in Army hospitals under treatment.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

TROOPS IN SIBERIA.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of War on House joint resolution 258, being a resolution of inquiry by Mr. RHODES, of Missouri, respecting certain troops in Siberia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the resolution, with the reply of the Secretary of War to the same:

House resolution 25.

Resolved, (1) That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested, immediately, to inform the House of Representatives, for the information of the House, the reasons for keeping United States soldiers in Siberia and how long such soldiers are to be kept there.

(2) The number of Japanese and Italian soldiers now in Siberia.

(3) Whether Great Britain and France have soldiers in Siberia; if not, why not?

(4) Has the Japanese Government defined its Siberian policy, according to the agreement with the United States, as announced by the State Department under date of August 5, 1918; and if so, what is that policy?

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, August 27, 1919.

The COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
House of Representatives.

GENTLEMEN: House resolution 258, by Mr. RHODES, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs to be printed, has been referred to me for comment. The resolution is in four sections, to which I reply as follows:

Section 1 requests that the Secretary of War immediately inform the House of Representatives the reasons for keeping United States soldiers in Siberia, and how long such soldiers are to be kept there. In reply I attach hereto a copy of a statement transmitted to the Senate of the United States by the President, under date of July 22, authoritatively covering the matter in question.

Section 2 of the resolution requests to be informed of the number of Japanese and Italian soldiers now in Siberia. The best information this department has as to the present size of the Japanese forces in Siberia is a deduction on the basis of organizations known to be stationed there. This gives a total of 46,000 men. Whether or not this number is larger or smaller than the actual number of Japanese soldiers in Siberia, this department has not the means of knowing.

The Italians have two infantry battalions, two sections of machine guns, one section of mounted artillery, and one section of military police, aggregating a total of about 1,450 men, stationed at Krasnoyarsk, and 20 staff officers at Vladivostok.

Section 3 of the resolution desires information as to whether Great Britain and France have soldiers in Siberia; and if not, why not. Great Britain has one battalion of about 1,050 men in the active Ural front district, 36 men at Omsk, 455 at Vladivostok; a total of 1,541 men.

The French have 119 men at Vladivostok, 324 at Omsk, and 1,045 in the active Ural front district; a total of 1,488.

Section 4 of the resolution asks whether the Japanese Government has defined its Siberian policy according to the agreement with the United States, as announced by the State Department under date of August 5, 1918. This department has no information on that subject.

Respectfully,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

AMERICAN TROOPS IN SIBERIA (S. DOC. 607).

The Vice President laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, July 22, 1919.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

SIR: For the information of the Senate, and in response to the resolution adopted June 23, 1919, requesting the President to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, of the reasons for sending United States soldiers to Siberia, the duties that are to be performed by these soldiers, how long they are to remain, and generally to advise the Senate of the policy of the United States Government in respect to Siberia and the maintenance of United States soldiers there, I have the honor to say that the decision to send American troops to Siberia was announced to the press on August 5, 1918, in a statement from the Acting Secretary of State, of which a copy is inclosed.

This measure was taken in conjunction with Japan and in concert of purpose with the other allied powers, first of all to save the Czechoslovak armies, which were threatened with destruction by hostile armies apparently organized by and often largely composed of enemy prisoners of war. The second purpose in view was to steady any efforts of the Russians at self-defense or the establishment of law and order in which they might be willing to accept assistance.

Two regiments of Infantry, with auxiliary troops—about 8,000 effectives—comprising a total of approximately 10,000 men, were sent under the command of Maj. Gen. William S. Graves. The troops began to arrive at Vladivostok in September, 1918. Considerably larger forces were dispatched by Japan at about the same time, and much smaller forces by others of the allied powers. The net result was the successful reunion of the separated Czechoslovak armies and the substantial elimination in eastern Siberia of the active efforts of enemy prisoners of war. A period of relative quiet then ensued.

In February, 1919, as a conclusion of negotiations begun early in the summer of 1918, the United States accepted a plan proposed by Japan for the supervision of the Siberian railways by an international committee, under which committee Mr. John F. Stevens would assume the operation of the Russian Railway Service Corps. In this connection it is to be recalled that Mr. John F. Stevens, in response to a request of the provisional government of Russia, went to Russia in the spring of 1917. A few months later he was made official adviser to the minister of ways of communication at Petrograd under the provisional government. At the request of the provisional government, and with the support of Mr. John F. Stevens, there was organized the so-called Russian Railway Service Corps, composed of American engineers. As originally organized, the personnel of this corps constituted 14 skeleton division units as known in this country, the idea being that these skeleton units would serve as practical advisers and assistants on 14 different sections of the Siberian Railway and assist the Russians by their knowledge of long-haul problems as known in this country, and which are the rule and not the exception in Siberia.

Owing to the Bolshevik uprising and the general chaotic conditions, neither Mr. Stevens nor the Russian Railway Service Corps was able to begin work in Siberia until March, 1918. They have been able to operate effectively only since the railway plan was adopted in February, 1919.

The most recent report from Mr. Stevens shows that on parts of the Chinese-Eastern & Trans-Baikal Railway he is now running six trains a day each way, while only a little while ago they were only able to run that many trains a week.

In accepting the railway plan it was provided that some protection should be given by the allied forces. Mr. Stevens stated frankly that he would not undertake the arduous task before him unless he could rely upon support from American troops in an emergency. Accordingly, as provided in the railway plan and with the approval of the interallied committee, the military commanders in Siberia have established troops where it is necessary to maintain order at different parts of the line. The American forces under Gen. Graves are understood to be protecting parts of the line near Vladivostok, and also on the section around Verchne Udinsk. There is also understood to be a small body of American troops at Harbin. The exact location from time to time of American troops is, however, subject to change by the direction of Gen. Graves.

The instructions to Gen. Graves direct him not to interfere in Russian affairs, but to support Mr. Stevens wherever necessary. The Siberian Railway is not only the main artery for transportation in Siberia, but is the only open access to European Russia to-day. The population of Siberia, whose resources have been almost exhausted by the long years of war and the chaotic conditions which have existed there, can be protected from a further period of chaos and anarchy only by the restoration and maintenance of traffic on the Siberian Railway.

Partisan bands under leaders having no settled connection with any organized government, and bands under leaders whose allegiance to any settled authority is apparently temporary and transitory, are constantly menacing the operation of the railway and the safety of its permanent structures.

The situation of the people of Siberia meantime is that they have no shoes or warm clothing; they are pleading for agricultural machinery and for many of the simpler articles of commerce upon which their own domestic economy depends and which are necessary to fruitful and productive industry among them. Having contributed their quota to the Russian armies which fought the Central Empires for three and one-half years, they now look to the Allies and the United States for economic assistance.

The population of western Siberia and the forces of Admiral Kolchak are entirely dependent upon these railways.

The Russian authorities in this country have succeeded in shipping large quantities of Russian supplies to Siberia, and the Secretary of War is now contracting with the great cooperative societies which operate throughout European and Asiatic Russia to ship further supplies to meet the needs of the civilian population. The Kolchak Government is also endeavoring to arrange for the purchase of medical and other Red Cross supplies from the War Department, and the American Red Cross is itself attempting the forms of relief for which it is organized. All elements of the population in Siberia look to the United States for assistance. This assistance can not be given to the population of Siberia, and ultimately to Russia, if the purpose entertained for two years to restore railway traffic is abandoned. The presence of American troops is a vital element in this effort. The services of Mr. Stevens depend upon it, and, a point of serious moment, the plan proposed by Japan expressly provides that Mr. Stevens and all foreign railway experts shall be withdrawn when the troops are withdrawn.

From these observations it will be seen that the purpose of the continuance of American troops in Siberia is that we, with the concurrence of the great allied powers, may keep open a necessary artery of trade and extend to the vast population of Siberia the economic aid essential to it in peace time, but indispensable under the conditions which have followed the prolonged and exhausting participation by Russia in the war against the Central Powers. This participation was obviously of incalculable value to the allied cause, and in a very particular way commends the exhausted people who suffered from it to such assistance as we can render to bring about their industrial and economic rehabilitation.

Very respectfully, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 1362. An act to authorize Hiram I. Sage, a citizen of Baldwin County, Ala., to construct and maintain a bridge across the Perdido River at or near Nunez Ferry.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported on September 2, 1919, that they had presented to the President for his approval the following bill:

An act (H. R. 7594) providing for the appointment of one general for the Armies of the United States.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 21 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday, September 4, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the secretary of the Territory of Hawaii, transmitting a copy each of the laws and journal of the House of Representatives of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, regular session of 1919 (H. Also, petition of Charles B. Headly, Chicago, Ill., urging the passage of the Gronna-Baer bill; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of Carl Milde, St. Louis, Mo., urging the passage of bill introduced by Congressman BACHARACH, of New Jersey, for a bonus of $360 for honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of William H. Crawford, Washington, D. C., urging the passage of bill authorizing Federal banks to contribute to the united war work campaign; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Also, petition of James M. Dean, Xenia, Ill., urging the early passage of House bill 435, bearing an increase in pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, petition of Washburn-Crosby Co., Minneapolis, Minn., containing protest against House bill 7482, changing the standard of weights on flour, meal, and corn products for human foods and commercial feeding stuffs, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Also, petition of St. Josephs Benevolent Society, Chicago, containing protest against the passage of the proposed Federal department of education bill; to the Committee on Education.

Also, petition of S. E. Bradt, Springfield, Ill., favoring Congressman KAHN'S measures relating to continuance of transfer of surplus war materials for use of States in road building, especially features covering parts for motor vehicles; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of the Bulletin Co., Cairo, Ill., urging the defeat of the efforts to repeal the zone system of charging for second-class postage; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Also, petition of C. F. Baum Co., Chicago, Ill., protesting against House joint resolution 121; to the Committee on Labor.

Also, petition of St. Ferdinand (Czech) Society, C. W., Chicago, protesting against the so-called Smith-Towner bill; to the Committee on Education.

Also, petition of Senator M. R. Carlson, urging passage of House bill 7705, dealing with the tariff on buttons of shell and pearl; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, September 4, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we seek Thy guidance and blessing for the duties of this day. We bless Thee for the assurance that in the upper and real realm of life there is no conflict of interest, that there are no clashing of duties. We pray Thee to give to us that clear vision of life and responsibility and privilege and glory that we may work together for the uplift of humanity and the glory of Thy name. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Saturday, August 23, 1919, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Labor, transmitting a list of useless papers on the files of the Department of Labor devoid of historic interest or value and requesting action looking to their disposition. The communication and accompanying paper will be referred to the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, and the Chair appoints the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] as the committee on the part of the Senate. The Secretary will notify the House of Representatives thereof.

IRRIGATION PROJECTS ON INDIAN LANDS (S. DOC. NO. 84).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of July 8, 1919, certain information relative to the various irrigation projects or settlements on Indian reservations or tracts of land allotted to Indians, which, on motion of Mr. CURTIS, was, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

LAWS OF HAWAII.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the secretary of the Territory of Hawaii, transmitting, pursuant to law, a copy each of the laws and journal of the House of Representatives of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, regular session of 1919, which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a joint resolution passed by the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana ratifying the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women, which was ordered to be filed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2395) amending section 25 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the act approved September 7, 1916, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 1362) to authorize Hiram I. Sage, a citizen of Baldwin County, Ala., to construct and maintain a bridge across the Perdido River at or near Nunez Ferry, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a memorial of the General Conference of the Missionary Church Association, remonstrating against universal military training, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CURTIS presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Moundridge, Kans., remonstrating against universal military training, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of Victor Post No. 293, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Kansas, of Fort Dodge, Kans., praying that a pension of $50 be granted to veterans of the Civil War and $30 to the widows of deceased veterans of the Civil War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Local Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Holton, Kans., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Chanute, Belleville, Newton, Topeka, Junction City, Abilene, and Holton, all in the State of Kansas, praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Harris, Kans., praying for the repeal of the so-called "luxury" tax, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I present a memorial of certain ex-soldiers and sailors, veterans of American wars, remonstrating against the ratification of the treaty with France and the league of nations. I ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Petition of veterans of American wars to United States Senate.

Whereas a treaty with the Republic of France has been submitted to the United States Senate for its ratification wherein it is provided that in case of any unprovoked movement of aggression against France the United States of America pledges itself to come, with military assistance, immediately to the aid of France;

Whereas France is not a State of the Union nor a territorial possession of the United States of America;

Whereas such debt as the United States of America may have owed to the Republic of France has been fully paid by the life blood of the American youths who now sleep the last sleep in French soil;

Whereas the American blood of youths of the United States of America, the land of freedom, is never to be shed except to provide protection for American homes, American freedom, and American liberties;

Whereas the conscripting of American youths to be sent to die for France would be the destruction of American freedom and American liberty, and in fact would be the creation of military slavery in America: Now, therefore,

We, the undersigned who have served our country in the time of war in its Army, Navy, and marines, now petition the United States Senate not to ratify said treaty with France, but ask that said treaty, together with the covenant of the league of nations, be both rejected by the United States Senate, as both of them are destructive of the rights, liberties, and freedom of the American people as guaranteed to them by the Constitution of the United States.

Case Bradford, second lieutenant, Headquarters Company, Three hundred and sixty-fourth Infantry, World War; Earle Stuart Rhode, corporal, Company L, Fourth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, Spanish-American War; Emile S. Labaig, corporal, Battery A, One hundred and forty-fourth Field Artillery, World War; John G. Fagg, sergeant, Company H, United States Signal Corps, Philippine Insurrection; John Murray, private, Company E, Twenty-first Infantry, Spanish-American War; J. Harry Smith, corporal, Company A, Casual Reserve Officers Battalion, World War; J. Wiley Wallace, battalion sergeant-major, Company A, Headquarters Battalion, General Headquarters, American Expeditionary Forces; O. Bischoff, private, Company A, One hundred and twenty-first Infantry, World War; M. H. Tippinger, private first class, Repair Unit 303, Motor Transport Corps, World War; R. V. Ortman, private, Fifteenth Service Company, Signal Corps, World War; Paul W. Bradford, quartermaster, Navy, World War; Robert Hine, private, Infantry, World War.

Mr. McKELLAR presented petitions of sundry business men of Chattanooga, Dayton, Whitwell, Rockwood, Soddy, Spring City, Oneida, Wartburg, and Oakdale, all in the State of Tennessee, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for Federal control of the meat-packing industry, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. NEWBERRY presented petitions of sundry citizens of Grand Rapids, Ludington, Clare, Almont, Kalkaska, and Petoskey, all in the State of Michigan, praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Rotary Club of Battle Creek, Mich., praying for universal military training, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Pontiac, Mich., praying for the return to private owners of the railroads of the country, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of sundry postal clerks of Lansing, Mich., and a petition of sundry letter carriers of Detroit, Mich., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. ELKINS presented a petition of sundry citizens of Clarksburg, W. Va., and a petition of sundry citizens of Sistersville, W. Va., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of New Martinsville, W. Va., and a memorial of sundry citizens of Petroleum, W. Va., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Local Lodge No. 104, International Association of Machinists, of Huntington, W. Va., praying for the passage of the so-called Sterling civil-service retirement bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

JAPANESE INTERESTS IN CHINA.

Mr. BORAH. I have a letter from the American Chamber of Commerce of China, dated Shanghai, August 7, 1919, upon the Shantung matter. I ask that it may be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SHANGHAI, August 7, 1919.

Mr. PHILIP MANSON,
New York, N. Y., United States of America.

DEAR SIR: It is very gratifying indeed to the American business man in China to learn that China and the great problems involved in America's relations with the Pacific are now receiving such close attention on the part of the Government, press, and people of the United States.

Potentially the United States now stands in the best position to take a predominating position in the foreign trade of China, providing the great problems that have handicapped us in the past are now settled—settled in accordance with the best interests of China and America and of the entire world.

You are, of course, aware of the decision of the Paris peace conference in awarding to Japan the former German port of Tsingtao and all former German interests in the Chinese Province of Shantung. The announcement of this decision has precipitated a turmoil in China that is quite likely to develop serious consequences. The Chinese have launched a boycott against all Japanese goods sold in China, and the latest available figures indicate that Japan's great trade in China of more than $400,000,000 in 1918 has been reduced at least 50 per cent in the short space of three months. Shantung Province, besides being one of the most important seacoast States of China, is the birthplace of Confucius, the Chinese saint, and for this reason is more or less "holy ground" to the Chinese people.

It is difficult for the American people to realize the feeling that this decision has provoked in the minds of the Chinese people. It has had about the same effect that the giving of the State of California or of

New York State to a foreign power would provoke among the people of the United States. Germany's control in Shantung Province, while irksome, had nothing of the present effect, because Germany was on the other side of the world and the weight of the iron hand in China was light.

Japan is an Asiatic power, and with her control established in Shantung Province on the China mainland, the Chinese people see the fate of Korea, Formosa, and Manchuria before them. When Japan first intervened in Korea she announced that it was for the purpose of establishing the independence of the country. Now, after 20 years, the Korean people are engaged in a life-and-death struggle to gain their liberty from Japan.

China changed from an absolute monarchial form of government to that of a republic about seven years ago. The country is going through much the same difficulties in organizing a new government that America experienced and that all countries have experienced in past history. We have no special brief to offer for China in this connection for the country has been hopelessly exploited by its own "tuchuns" or officials of the older class. The development of a stable government has been delayed and handicapped because of the incessant meddling of the Japanese who lend money to both sides and whose intrigues have served to keep the country in an eternal mess since the revolution.

Our main reason for bringing these matters to your attention is to show you and the members of your organization that America has a very deep and vital interest in the development of China. About 20 years ago Japan, from the standpoint of foreign trade and internal development, was approximately in the same condition that China is to-day. From the standpoint of rapid development, Japan had a great advantages over China, since she possessed a strong central government and a strong feeling of nationalism. Commissioners which Japan sent abroad to study conditions in other countries, fixed upon the German system as a model, and the general plan of governmental, educational, police, and military reorganizations finally decided upon was the German system and was directly dictated by Bismarck.

The adoption of the efficient German system in Japan had its advantages in the past, but now in the light of a new understanding it has its distinct disadvantages. Japan is now dominated by a militarism that is potentially just as dangerous as was the German militarism that America helped to crush. Japan is now working to fix her control on the Asiatic mainland. The Korean peninsula furnished the first stepping stone and then followed Manchuria. Shantung Province and Fukien Province of China are now to follow unless something is done by America to prevent it. With China's unlimited resources of minerals, foodstuffs, and man power under the control of the Japanese militarists, the next war is bound to be in the Pacific and America is certain to be drawn into it. With the great distance involved and with the almost certain racial element involved, it doesn't require much imagination to foresee the future.

There is a small liberal democratic element in Japan that has potentialities for the future if America will but take a decided stand for right and justice at the present time. With a decided stand on the part of the American Government the forces of democracy in both Japan and China will be strengthened and the people themselves will solve the problem.

In the archives of the State Department at Washington is to be found a complete record of Japanese underhand intrigue in China since the beginning of the war. In the correspondence of the American legation at Peking and the American consulate at Tsingtao is all the information that America needs for "proof" as to Japan's real purposes in China. It is to the future vital interests of the American people that these matters be made public.

America has always stood for the open door in Asia. America's millions have been dumped into China for years for the education of the thousands of Chinese young men and women. All these efforts will be wasted unless America takes a very definite stand for justice in the Pacific. China, with her great territory in excess of that of the United States, may become America's greatest market in a space of 10 years. Or it may be completely closed to us if we fail to pursue the right policy.

As representative American merchants actually in the field, we appeal to you to bring this vital matter to the immediate attention of your congressional representative in order that he may call for the records and get them before Congress where they may be read into the minutes.

Very truly, yours,

AMERICAN CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF CHINA.
By J. B. POWELL, Secretary.

DEFLATION OF CURRENCY.

Mr. GRONNA. I have here an article printed in the Manufacturers' Record entitled "There can be no deflation of currency without disaster." I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THERE CAN BE NO DEFLATION OF CURRENCY WITHOUT DISASTER.

[From the Manufacturers' Record, Baltimore, Md.]

Prof. Thomas Nixon Carver, a widely known political economist and former president of the American Economic Association and professor of economics at Harvard, through a large number of daily papers has recently discussed the danger in any attempt to force down high prices very much along the line of what the Manufacturers' Record has been saying since the armistice was signed. We have insisted that any serious attempt to deflate the world's currency for some years to come for the purpose of breaking down high prices and high wages would bring on a chaos worse than that from which Russia is suffering.

Prof. Carver, in closing his review of the situation, takes exactly the same ground, and warns the country of the necessity of keeping level headed and doing the best we possibly can to adjust ourselves to the situation, and that only in this way can business and civilization itself be saved. In his statement he said:

"Individuals throughout history have found two methods of prospering, the one by terrorism and sabotage, the other by making themselves so useful that others could not get along without them. The one method was the favorite of the former German Kaiser, and is used every day by the holdup man in our streets. It brings permanent prosperity to nobody. But if we adopt the second method, everybody prospers.

"We are now at the parting of the ways, but unfortunately there are tendencies in this age of violence which may lead us along the wrong path, not only toward a financial panic, but toward the destruction of civilization itself.

"If, however, we can keep level heads, accept the economy situation, and jack up salaries and prices where necessary to the price level already reached by most commodities and wages, it is probable that we can save the day and that business and civilization can forge confidently ahead without the fear of suffering from too abrupt deflation or a serious panic."

Every man who advocates the lowering of prices by the deflation of the currency for several years to come, or who continually drives against high wages or the high prices for foodstuffs paid to farmers, is definitely doing his utmost to bring on a Bolshevistic chaos which would engulf the world, whether he realizes it or not. We might just as well undertake to say that there was no European war as to undertake to ignore the result of that war in the world-wide conditions which demand high wages and high prices.

It is entirely true that there has been much profiteering, and in many cases prices have been entirely too high, but the hysteria which is sweeping over the country is endangering our civilization, for it is creating an intense spirit of bitterness and causing people everywhere to believe that all business of all kinds is a species of thievery.

The great majority of American business men are honest and are doing an honest, legitimate business. There are conditions prevailing in many industries where high prices are fully justified, and certainly the decreasing volume of food production of this country in comparison with population, taken in connection with the world's tremendous demand for foodstuffs, justifies the farmer in getting a high price for his product. This is especially true in view of the high wages that are being paid to farm hands. Heretofore farm hands were not paid nearly one-half as much as they should have received. Henceforth they will rightly demand high wages, and this will demand a higher cost of farm products on the farm, without regard to the profit that may be added by the handlers of food between the producer and the consumer. An attempt to drive prices below a very profitable figure for the farmers, based on high wages for farm labor, would merely serve to decrease the food production of the country and bring us within the next year or two squarely up to a food famine, which would be infinitely worse than present conditions and which might in itself lead to chaos beyond anything we can now imagine.

The politicians in Washington and elsewhere are, to a large extent, playing a political game pure and simple. Each one is trying to outdo the other in order to make political capital for himself or his party at a time when honest sincerity, based on intelligence, should prevail if men want to save this Nation.

FARMERS' UNIONS.

Mr. GRONNA. On the opposite page of the Manufacturers' Record there is an article entitled "When the labor unions have taught the farmers to follow their example chaos will be here." I ask to have it printed in the RECORD also.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHEN THE LABOR UNIONS HAVE TAUGHT THE FARMER TO FOLLOW THEIR EXAMPLE CHAOS WILL BE HERE.

[From the Manufacturers' Record, Baltimore, Md.]

No man is entitled to success except through work.

Inefficiency and laziness have no claim upon mankind for maintenance.

The world owes no man a living unless he is willing to work to get it.

The farmer and his wife and his hired hand must work from daybreak to long after dark. The writer of this knows from experience the meaning of farm work. He was a farm boy, and at 13 the feeding and milking of half a dozen cows, often dragging the fodder from under heavy snow and ice; the feeding and the currying of two horses; and the feeding of a dozen hogs and the cutting up of a fair supply of wood for the day was part of his regular morning job before breakfast, and he thanks God for the experience thus gained, which is not unlike the experience of a vast majority of American farmers from boys to old men; and the women on the farm, as a general proposition, have a harder job than the men.

It was the writer's good fortune—or bad fortune, as some may count it—to spend a couple of nights and a day some time ago on a dairy farm 20 miles from Baltimore in midwinter, and, desiring to keep along with the family life, instructions were given to be awakened in time for the family breakfast. The call came at 4 o'clock in the morning on a bitter winter day. There was no fire in the room, nor in the house, except in the kitchen or dining room. Crawling down to the dining room, half frozen, the family had gathered for breakfast. When that was over it was still dark, but the farmer and his hands went out to do the milking, which was done by the light of lanterns. The milking finished, the horses were hitched to a big wagon and a load of milk was taken some 3 or 4 miles to the nearest depot to catch the early morning train.

The writer accompanied the driver on the trip, spent a few moments thawing out at the depot stove, then rode back and was at the farmhouse again before the first rays of the sun commenced to illuminate the earth.

The next night the same routine, and what this farmer was doing—and he was a man considered fairly well to do for the farmers of his section—was only an illustration of what all the neighboring farmers were doing and what a large proportion of the farmers of the entire country are doing 12 months of the year, with the exception of a comparatively few who may be called gentlemen farmers, whose land is of sufficient area or whose wealth is sufficiently great to justify an easier life. The farm hands are doing this all the time, and the farmers' wives are likewise doing it a greater part of the time.

Does anyone for a moment imagine that the farmer is going to keep on doing this kind of work when he is being taught by the labor unions of the country and by the Government that all that a man has to do to live in ease and get high wages is to put his demands before the Government and insist that he will bring on a nation-wide strike if his wishes are not instantly complied with? It is a very well-to-do farmer indeed whose income is equal to that of the bricklayer, the carpenter, the railroad mechanic, or the railroad conductor. They have no such income as these men, though they work from 50 per cent to 75 per cent longer hours. Their labor is under greater difficulties, for much of it has to be done amid snow and ice, and regardless of weather conditions, while the mechanic and the railroad men are to a very large extent indoors and free from the hardships of weather.

The labor unions of the country are, by their example, teaching the farmers that they, too, should cut their hours of labor to eight per day or less, and while reducing their working hours and the volume of their product should steadily increase their income. It matters not that there is a spirit of dishonesty in a system such as this. What care these laboring men, misled by demagogues who value nothing except their individual wealth, based on robbing others, about a matter of honesty of effort!

The farmer has long borne the burden of the world's tasks. He has been the real burden bearer. In greater numbers than any other class in the country, he has in wealth less to show for his long hours and his hard labor. His rebellion against these conditions, which is inevitable unless the Government takes the lead in compelling a change from present methods of labor-union work and labor-union demands, will mean an enormous decrease in the food production of the country and an increase in prices which will be startling.

Imagine for one moment what would happen if the farmers of the country should go on a strike and permit the loss of one wheat crop or one corn crop. There would follow such financial and industrial panic as the world never saw and civilization would stand face to face with absolute starvation. All the blatant outcry of politicians, all the wild theories put forth in Washington and by demagogues everywhere, all the wild denunciation by newspapers and by the pulpit would be without avail; the farmer would simply have accepted the lesson which this Nation is industriously teaching its people through its forbearance with union-labor leaders. The union-labor leaders are bringing about a situation which threatens the ability of their people to buy a single pound of foodstuffs except at a price many times as high as that which now prevails, and even then starvation would rule everywhere, for the supply would be wholly inadequate to save millions of people from death by starvation.

This is the road to which the labor unions, heartily supported by the Federal Government ever since the war began, are heading the Nation.

RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. GRONNA. I present a memorial from the Amalgamated Federation of Railway Mail Clerks, which I wish to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

KEOKUK, IOWA, August 20, 1919.

Hon. ASLE J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GRONNA: We wish to call your attention to the present condition of the Railway Mail Service and to request an early and earnest effort on your part to alleviate these conditions.

As you perhaps know, our railway service is the most important service of our Government and a service on which every business of the country depends. It is the chief fundamental on which every business is built and without which no industry could operate. It differs in every respect from every other class of labor, and differs in every way from any other position under the jurisdiction of the Post Office Department on account of the study, scope, and the grilling, hard work in the car. This service has been made the target of every cruel fling of the Post Office Department, and we have had enough study and grief heaped upon us to discourage the most courageous of men. It is impossible to state all these abuses, as it would require a letter of extraordinary length, but we will endeavor to give you a general outline of the situation as it at present exists.

The salary paid clerks in the Railway Mail Service is and always has been the lowest salary paid for the same amount of mental and physical effort. We are required to do more memorizing and to have more concrete knowledge of our studies than anyone in the world; yet we do not receive as much salary as an ordinary laborer. The salaries of railroad men running in the same trains will show how we are underpaid, and a table of salaries paid these men is given below:

Freight brakemen, about $150 to $190 per month.
Passenger brakemen, about $170 to $210 per month.
Conductors, about $210 to $300 per month.
Engineers, about $260 to $350 per month.
Firemen, about $180 to $200 per month.

In addition to this, these men were granted a bonus as back pay from the time their controversy with the Government began. They receive time and one-half for overtime. Can secure a pass over their line or other lines by making application. These men have again asked for an additional increase of 85 per cent, claiming it was impossible to live on their present wage as stated above. How do you expect the railway mail clerk, who has the same expense as these railroad men, to exist on his meager salary?

Not any of these men do one-half the work we do, and they get about one-half time off, with nothing to do but rest. The railway mail clerks put in long, strenuous hours on the road and then during the time off duty study as much as some lawyer prior to trying some big case. But very few of these railroad men are educated men, and they are in no more danger than the clerks. People who know claim that it requires more knowledge to run an automobile than a locomotive. Clerks who have fired some of the largest locomotives in the past claim that the work in a railway post office is much more strenuous. The only knowledge required of a conductor is to read a few simple train orders and his book of rules. Passenger brakemen, riding the cushions, with no more knowledge required than to call stations and to sell and resell newspapers, on which they make a big additional profit. Then compare the foregoing with the salary of a railway mail clerk, who must memorize more than a college professor drawing a salary of $5,000 to $15,000 a year and work at high speed under severe nervous tension, distributing mail matter while the train is in motion.

Then, considering other classes of labor, we find hod carriers drawing 70 to 75 cents per hour and carpenters with a wage scale of 80 cents to $1 per hour; plumbers, $1 per hour; and other classes of labor in proportion; and these jobs could be considered as child's play in comparison with the study and service required of a railway mail clerk.

The most severe study is required of railway mail clerks than any other class of labor. For example, the writer has been examined on the following territory, which is only an ordinary case. Committed to memory the exact location of every post office, every railroad and junction point in the following States: North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, Iowa, Illinois, and the north one-half of Missouri. These States have about 7,400 offices. The time of all trains and mail connections were memorized. All changes in the supplies of post offices and change in train schedules were committed to memory. In addition to this we are examined on the postal laws and regulations and must keep memorized all the changes in law and regulations. In the past we have been examined on the postal laws and regulations once a year, and on other subjects every six months, and the examination requirements have been as follows: Give the connections of all trains and the best connection for all post offices. Take space basis and give all the rules and regulations governing space. Take examination on circular and parcel post massing scheme, giving the correct terminal for every State in the Union. Postal laws and regulations we read the question and write the answer. We have about 600 questions on this subject.

We presume you will say as others have said, that no human being could memorize so much, but we do it and must make a grade of at least 98 per cent or be demerited and required to appear for a reexamination. In all case examinations we must case at least 25 cards per minute or receive minus points for any average less than this. A total of 700 minus points subjects the clerk to removal from the service, and we receive minus points for every error, either in examinations or at work in the car or for any deviation from orders or regulations.

At work in the car it is not unusual for a clerk to distribute 60 to 70 letters per minute or 40 to 50 papers or packages, and nearly all this work is done while the train is in motion. Oftentimes we must handle and be responsible for as much money as a bank during the course of a day's business, and this in addition to our regular work of distributing mail matter. Records are kept of all service performed and daily and monthly reports made. We must maintain a regular office and study in our homes or elsewhere for the purpose of handling work in connection with the service. There is no difference between the main lines and the branch lines as far as the work is concerned. The heavy lines have more mail and more men to handle it, and the study requirements are about the same; therefore a change must be made in the classification of railway post offices so as to place the clerks on more of an equable basis. The lines are at present divided into three classes, with a different salary for each, although the work is the same. This classification was drawn up this way with the idea of making as many low-salaried clerks as possible.

When clerks in the higher grades lay off the clerk in the next lower grade takes his place, but does not receive any more salary. Railroad men, when they run for another in a higher-salaried position, receive the same pay as the man for whom they are running. Clerks running extra during the heavy holiday season do not receive any pay therefor, but must perform this service gratis. This condition should be immediately remedied.

Although the best men are selected by a physical and mental test for this work, it usually greatly affects the health in about six years. The fast and heavy work with the irregularity and nervous strain soon make a telling effect on the clerk's health.

The Post Office Department has fought substantial increases in salary, and when Congress allowed us an increase over their protest it was but a mere trifle. Then in 1918 the Postmaster General eliminated all meritorious promotions, and this beat all clerks out of $100 who were due for this promotion. This year he issued the same orders. Promotions have been held up in order to prevent the clerk from advancing another grade and receiving more salary. It is almost unbelievable the number of schemes that have been practiced on the clerks, and it is remarkable that we have any service at all. The Postmaster General says it will be impossible for a clerk to receive more than $100 increase during the year 1919.

In 1918 Congress allowed us $200 increase and the Postmaster General issued orders that no clerk would receive his meritorious promotion of $100 this year, so with the small increase of $300 during the past seven years, the Postmaster General has prevented all meritorious clerks from receiving but $100 more than they were receiving with the classification regulations of 1912. Since Congress has allowed us $100 increase this year, the Postmaster General has not only eliminated all meritorious promotions, but he has issued orders bringing up technical points to prevent a clerk from receiving this amount. He brings up other unnecessary requirements and his order reads in part, as follows: "Clerks whose records are otherwise satisfactory and who have not passed satisfactory examinations to the extent indicated within the three-year period shall be promoted conditionally, and it will be necessary for them to meet these requirements on or before December 31, 1919, or they will be reduced to the former grade or the maximum successive grade." A great many clerks will be unable to meet these new and unnecessary requirements prescribed by the Postmaster General and will therefore lose this year's increase also. This is but one of the numerous tricks played on the clerks to prevent them from receiving any increase in salary and to forestall any move made by Congress in this direction. Every time an increase has been allowed the Postmaster General has endeavored to evade the law and prevent us receiving the same. The clerk who was due for his meritorious promotion during the years of 1918 and 1919 will not receive the same, and if he fails to meet the new requirements as stated above he will be receiving exactly the same salary as prescribed in the regulations of 1912, namely, Congress has granted us an increase of $300 since 1912 and the Postmaster General has sought to prevent us receiving this amount. Do you wonder that the clerks are stirred to the limit and have been forced to take immediate steps to protect themselves.

According to law we are not permitted to strike to remedy our conditions as other Americans; therefore, with our hands tied we must take such punishment as is inflicted. Some clerks are even afraid to make a protest or to even criticize for fear of being dismissed from the service, yet we call this the land of freedom. This strike law should be repealed or Congress should take a hand in obtaining immediate justice for us. We brag of our big, rich Government. Why not pay a decent salary to those who perform a service on which all business depends. We can raise money for anything and everything else, why not be interested in the affairs of our own Government and pay at least a living wage. The railway mail clerks should be the highest paid men in a train and among the highest paid men in the United States. As it is, we receive about one-half the amount received by some of the trainmen. What a shame this is to have Government men who have studied sufficiently to have received several degrees, drawing less salary than ordinary unskilled labor. We should take more pride in our Government than this, and we are confident had you known of these conditions you would not have tolerated the same.

The tenure in office of the present Postmaster General and Second Assistant Postmaster General has been autocratic to say the least. The clerks are disgusted with such work, and ask that an immediate change be made. Just lately the Second Assistant Postmaster General issued an order forbidding clerks warming their food over kerosene or alcohol stoves. As far as it is known, no fire has ever resulted in such a case.

The baggage man cooks his meal in these cars, the lamps burn close to the ceiling in these cars, and the stove at times is fired to a tremendous heat, and yet we must not light anything therein that would make it possible for us to have a warm meal.

The writer has pursued sufficient studies during the nine years in the Railway Mail Service to have studied four courses in medicine and five courses in law, yet our study is without end, and we are almost without pay in comparison with a doctor or lawyer. Our salary has always been held down by a few aspiring politicians and always will be unless we can induce our Congress to put a stop to it and pass such laws as will hold these fellows in check

We request an immediate salary increase, as follows: $1,000 as a minimum flat increase effective July 1, 1919; $500 as a bonus for each of the years 1916, 1917, and 1918. This bonus is only part of our living expenses over and above our salary for these years and does not include the meritorious promotion money the Postmaster General withheld.

It has been difficult to keep new men in the service, and the regular men have had to bear the brunt of it. We have had a string of new men coming into the service but leaving on account of hard work, severe study, and low wages.

Every newspaper and every publisher and all business is vitally interested in this issue, for it is on account of our services that the prompt dispatch of mail matter to destination is made possible. Almost every letter you write is routed by the railway mail clerk. Every newspaper and parcel-post package is routed by these same clerks. Mail is not routed in a post office, as is the general supposition, but is routed by the railway mail clerk in the car. Mailing clerks in the first and second class post offices are required to study some territory, but the study scope is not great.

Clerks have had to deny themselves of food and clothing, and the last few years the situation has grown continually worse. They have had to take on any additional work they could, although this is forbidden, in order to subsist. In many cases the little children have been sent to find work or the wife of the family has had to take up other work. In fact, the Railway Mail Service is and always has been just an existence where it should have been a paying occupation. A man must have sufficient food and clothing and his mind free from worry over financial matters to perform such gigantic tasks.

The Postmaster General says there has been no deficit in connection with the service, but a large surplus fund accumulated. How was this large surplus accumulated? You will know after reading this letter. The public would rather pay more postage and have decent salaries and conditions provided for their employees.

The clerks, after following a watchful-waiting policy for several years, expecting that Congress would grant us a substantial increase in salary and would pass remedial legislation curbing the authority and abuses of the Post Office Department, are reaching a state of desperation. Never have we seen so much unrest in any organization. Their living expenses have far exceeded their salaries and back debts have mounted up, with no money to pay. These debts must be met, and we ask immediate action, as we have reached the last lap of endurance. If we do not receive an immediate increase in salary and better treatment, we will be forced to seek other occupations. We believe that in bringing this appeal to you that you will hurry to aid us in getting immediate action in Congress. The railway mail clerks of the United States, 18,000 strong, call on you for immediate action. The backbone of the Postal Service and the backbone of every business that uses the mails, is calling on you for immediate action. We are depending on your aid in preventing chaos in the service. The business of the country is depending on your aid. We have told you of the conditions in the service that require immediate action. We have done our duty. Will you aid us? Hoping to hear from you soon, and thanking you in advance for your efforts in our behalf, we are,

Very respectfully,

AMALGAMATED FEDERATION OF RAILWAY MAIL CLERKS.

UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have here a copy of a resolution adopted by the National Tuberculosis Association, which I should like to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It is very brief.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution adopted by National Tuberculosis Association at their annual meeting, Atlantic City, in regard to universal military training.

Be it resolved, That the National Tuberculosis Association, through its executive officers, take immediate steps to secure the cooperation of all other great health organizations, especially the American Medical Association and State and Territorial health officers in placing before the American people a united demand for the adoption of universal military service as a public-health measure.

THE IRISH QUESTION.

Mr. ASHURST. I present resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Robert Emmet Branch of the Friends of Irish Freedom, held at Lowell, Ariz., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BISBEE, ARIZ., August 13, 1919.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the Robert Emmet Branch of the Friends of Irish Freedom, held at Brophy Hall, Lowell, Ariz., on August 10, 1919, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Whereas President Wilson, in his famous 14 points, has stated that all peoples shall have the right of self-determination; and

Whereas the United States of America and her associates fought and won the war in order that this ideal might be realized and put in practice; and

Whereas Ireland, by an overwhelming majority, has voted in favor of and is now struggling to establish a free republican government: Be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States be petitioned to recognize the republic of Ireland and thereby materially assist her in taking her place among the nations of the earth as a free, self-determined people; be it further

Resolved, That we are unalterably opposed to the covenant of the league of nations as it now stands, especially article 10, which we believe should be eliminated; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to the State of Arizona's Representatives in Washington.

Respectfully submitted.

P. M. KELLEY,
J. E. GRADY,
THOMAS FEENEY,
MAURICE MCKENNA,
JAMES M. RYAN,
Committee.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McLEAN, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (S. 2811) for the relief of the York County Savings Bank, of Biddeford, Me., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 165) thereon.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (S. 2875) to amend section 7 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1919, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 166) thereon.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to which was referred the bill (S. 2457) to provide for a library information service in the Bureau of Education, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 167) thereon.

Mr. PAGE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 131) to provide that petty officers, noncommissioned officers, and enlisted men of the United States Navy and Marine Corps on the retired list who had creditable Civil War service shall receive the rank or rating and the pay of the next higher enlisted grade, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 168) thereon.

Mr. JONES of Washington, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 1473) granting pensions to certain members of the former Life-Saving Service, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 169) thereon.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I simply wish to give notice at this time that on the conclusion of the consideration of the so-called prohibition bill I shall move to take up for consideration Senate bill 2472, proposing an amendment to the Federal reserve act—the export finance measure—which I introduced, and which was reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency, and has been on the calendar for a number of weeks.

I may say that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] has introduced several amendments to the bill which I presume represent his objections to the measure. I have not had an opportunity to go over them in detail, but I am rather inclined to think that we can get together on most of them.

I have had so many urgent requests from manufacturers and producers throughout the country that there should be consideration given to this important measure, and from the Secretary of the Treasury and the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, to whom I think some courtesy is due, that I sincerely trust that at the conclusion of the consideration of the prohibition bill we may at least be enabled to bring this bill before the Senate for such discussion as it may inspire. I will not take the time to discuss the measure at this time, but simply wanted to give the notice so that any Senators particularly interested in the measure may in the meantime prepare any thoughts in concrete form which they may desire to present.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to say that while I am very anxious to see the bill passed to which the Senator from New Jersey has called attention, and just as soon as possible, there is also on the calendar House bill 7478, with reference to banking, that I trust we may be able to get up. I hope it will not take a great length of time to dispose of it.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I simply want to say in reply to the Senator from Georgia that inasmuch as we seem to be in accord on the general thought connected with both measures, I am quite sure there will be no difficulty whatever in getting together for their consideration.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I wish to refer to the notice which has just been given by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] to the effect that he will move to have the bill (S. 2472) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, considered by the Senate after the unfinished business shall have been disposed of. I simply want to say that every member of this body is familiar with the abnormal and almost demoralized condition of foreign exchange. It is the duty of Congress to do anything that can be done wisely and safely to restore and stabilize exchange. This bill, in the opinion of your committee and in the opinion of the Federal Reserve Board and others who have given it consideration, is a step in the right direction; and I sincerely hope that the Senator from New Jersey will be able to get the bill considered by the Senate in the immediate future.

There is another bill, which has been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency, which has been referred to by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], being House bill 7478, which should receive early consideration by the Senate. It has already passed the other House. It proposes to extend the limit of credit to an individual or to a corporation from 10 to 25 per cent of the capital and surplus of the loaning bank, if my recollection is correct, in the sale and distribution of basic and staple commodities.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It proposes to extend the limit of credit as to those secured by warehouse certificates to 25 per cent.

Mr. McLEAN. Such bills are, of course, secured by warehouse receipts or bills of lading. It merely gives to the seller of the product the best possible means of distributing his goods and permits the use of the best possible form of credit.

It seems to me that there should be no objection to favorable action on both of these pending measures, and I hope that the Senate will give them consideration soon.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator from Arizona will permit me to supplement what the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] has said, I desire to say that the bill to which he has just referred and which has passed the other House unanimously——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I must insist on the regular order, if the Senator will pardon me. We ought not to consume the morning hour in these discussions. I regret to make this objection, but we must have the morning hour.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Reports of committees are still in order.

AMERICAN LEGION.

Mr. NELSON. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 6808) to incorporate the American Legion, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. I do not think it will lead to any extended debate.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following persons, to wit: William S. Beam, of North Carolina; Charles H. Brent, of New York; William H. Brown, of Connecticut; G. Edward Buxton, jr., of Rhode Island; Bennett C. Clark, of Missouri; Richard Derby, of New York; L. H. Evridge, of Texas; Milton J. Foreman, of Illinois; Ruby D. Garrett, of Missouri; Fred J. Griffith, of Oklahoma; Roy C. Haines, of Maine; John F. J. Herbert, of Massachusetts; Roy Hoffman, of Oklahoma; Fred B. Humphreys, of New Mexico; John W. Inzer, of Alabama; Stuart S. Janney, of Maryland; Luke Lea, of Tennessee; Henry Leonard, of Colorado; Henry D. Lindsley, of Texas; Ogden L. Mills, of New York; Thomas W. Miller, of Delaware; Edward Myers, of Pennsylvania; Franklin D'Olier, of Pennsylvania; W. G. Price, jr., of Pennsylvania; S. A. Ritchie, of New York; Theodore Roosevelt, jr., of New York; Albert A. Sprague, of Illinois; John J. Sullivan, of Washington; Dale Shaw, of Iowa; Daniel G. Stivers, of Montana; H. J. Turney, of Ohio; George A. White, of Oregon; Eric Fisher Wood, of Pennsylvania; George H. Wood, of Ohio; Mathew H. Murphy, of Alabama; Andrew P. Martin, of Arizona; J. J. Harrison, of Arkansas; Henry G. Mathewson, of California; H. A. Saidy, of Colorado; Alfred M. Phillips, jr., of Connecticut; George N. Davis, of Delaware; A. H. Blanding, of Florida; Walter Harris, of Georgia; E. C. Boom, of Idaho; George G. Seaman, of Illinois; Raymond S. Springer, of Indiana; Mathew T. Tinley, of Iowa; W. A. Phares, of Kansas; Henry De Haven Moorman, of Kentucky; T. Semmes Walmsley, of Louisiana; A. L. Robinson, of Maine; James A. Gary, jr., of Maryland; George C. Waldo, of Michigan; Harrison Fuller, of Minnesota; Alexander Fitzhugh, of Mississippi; H. C. Clark, of Missouri; Charles E. Pew, of Montana; John G. Maher, of Nebraska; J. G. Scrugham, of Nevada; Frank Knox, of New Hampshire; Hobart Brown, of New Jersey; Charles M. De Bremon, of New Mexico; C. K. Burgess, of North Carolina; Julius Baker, of North Dakota; F. C. Galbraith, of Ohio; Ross N. Lillard, of Oklahoma; E. J. Eivers, of Oregon; George F. Tyler, of Pennsylvania; Alexander H. Johnson, of Rhode Island; Julius H. Walker, of South Carolina; M. L. Shade, of South Dakota; Roane Waring, of Tennessee; Claude V. Birkhead, of Texas; Wesley E. King, of Utah; Charles Francis Cocke, of Virginia; H. Nelson Jackson, of Vermont; Harvey I. Moss, of Washington; Jackson Arnold, of West Virginia; John C. Davis, of Wisconsin; A. H. Beach, of Wyoming; E. Lester Jones, of the District of Columbia; Lawrence Judd, of Hawaii; Robert R. Landon, of the Philippine Islands; and such persons as may be chosen who are members of the "American Legion," an unincorporated patriotic society of the soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Great War, 1917-1918, known as the "American Legion," and their successors, are hereby created and declared to be a body corporate. The name of this corporation shall be "The American Legion."

SEC. 2. That said persons named in section 1 and such other persons as may be selected from among the membership of the American Legion, an unincorporated society of the soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Great War of 1917-1918, are hereby authorized to meet to complete the organization of said corporation by the selection of officers, the adoption of a constitution and by-laws, and to do all other things necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act, at which meeting any person duly accredited as a delegate from any local or State organization of the existing unincorporated organization known as the "American Legion" shall be permitted to participate in the proceedings thereof.

SEC. 3. That the purpose of this corporation shall be: To promote peace and good will among the peoples of the United States and all the nations of the earth; to preserve the memories and incidents of the Great War of 1917-1918; to cement the ties of love and comradeship born of service; and to consecrate the efforts of its members to mutual helpfulness and service to their country.

SEC. 4. That the corporation created by this act shall have the following powers: To have perpetual succession with power to sue and be sued in courts of law and equity; to receive, hold, own, use, and dispose of such real estate and personal property as shall be necessary for its corporate purposes; to adopt a corporate seal and alter the same at pleasure; to adopt a constitution, by-laws, and regulations to carry out its purposes, not inconsistent with the laws of the United States or of any State; to use in carrying out the purposes of the corporation such emblems and badges as it may adopt; to establish and maintain offices for the conduct of its business; to establish State and Territorial organizations and local chapter or post organizations; to publish a magazine or other publications, and generally to do any and all such acts and things as may be necessary and proper in carrying into effect the purposes of the corporation.

SEC. 5. That no person shall be a member of this corporation unless he served in the naval or military service of the United States at some time during the period between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, both dates inclusive, or who, being citizens of the United States at the time of enlistment, served in the military or naval services of any of the Governments associated with the United States during the Great War.

SEC. 6. That the organization shall be nonpolitical and, as an organization, shall not promote the candidacy of any person seeking public office.

SEC. 7. That said corporation may acquire any or all the assets of the existing unincorporated national organization known as the "American Legion" upon discharging or satisfactorily providing for the payment and discharge of all its liabilities.

SEC. 8. That said corporation and its State and local subdivisions shall have the sole and exclusive right to have and to use in carrying out its purposes the name "The American Legion."

SEC. 9. That the said corporation shall, on or before the 1st day of January in each year, make and transmit to the Congress a report of its proceedings for the preceding calendar year, including a full and complete report of its receipts and expenditures: Provided, however, That said report shall not be printed as public documents.

SEC. 9½. That as a condition precedent to the exercise of any power or privilege herein granted or conferred the American Legion shall file in the office of the secretary of state of each State the name and post-office address of an authorized agent in such State upon whom legal process or demands against the American Legion may be served.

SEC. 10. That the right to repeal, alter, or amend this act at any time is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURT OFFICERS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. OVERMAN. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 597) providing for an increase of salary for the United States marshal and district attorney for the western district and for the United States district attorney for the eastern district of Louisiana. I call the attention of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] to the bill.

Mr. RANSDELL. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, has the Senator from Louisiana requested unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill at this time?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BORAH. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill goes to the calendar.

CONFERENCE OF LABOR AND CAPITAL.

Mr. KENYON. I report from the Committee on Education and Labor a concurrent resolution which I ask to have read, and then I shall ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. I think there will be no objection to its consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 9) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Whereas the President of the United States has called or is about to call a conference of the representatives of labor, capital, and agriculture for the purpose of discussing questions relating to these great interests as affecting each other and the public,

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States indorses the action of the President in calling such conference, and pledges to him its earnest support and cooperation for the success thereof.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of the Senate transmit a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, in connection with the resolution which was reported by me and agreed to, I ask to have printed in the RECORD the resolution adopted by the joint committee on labor of the Senate and the House of Representatives with reference to the matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Whereas a number of bills are pending before the Senate and House Committees on Labor looking to the calling of a conference between the representatives of labor and capital; and

Whereas this joint meeting of the two committees was called to consider said bills; and

Whereas since the arrangements for this meeting have been made the President of the United States has given notice that he will call a conference of the representatives of labor, capital, and agriculture relating to said interests: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House Committees on Labor, meeting in joint assembly, That we heartily indorse the action of the President in calling such conference, and pledge to him our earnest support and cooperation for the success thereof.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred, as follows:

A bill (S. 2944) granting a pension to John C. Pierce; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 99) amending the joint resolution extending the time for payments of purchase money on homestead entries in the former Colville Indian Reservation, Wash.; to the Committee on Public Lands.

FEDERAL AID FOR ROADS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I introduce a bill and ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The bill (S. 2932) making additional appropriations for the purpose of carrying out the Federal road-aid act approved July 11, 1917, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that the communication accompanying and supporting the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the honorable the Congress of the United States:

Representatives of the State highway department of the following States, Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, Missouri, Oklahoma, Arkansas, and Texas, met in conference in Kansas City, Mo., on July 30, 1919, to discuss highway problems. It developed that the Federal aid allotted to the States for highway construction is insufficient to meet the call of the people.

We therefore urgently request the extension and continuation of Federal aid to the States in the construction of highways as now obtains in the appropriations already made, and believe that further appropriations as the policy of the Government will ultimately give to the entire country a complete system of national highways without further legislation.

Each State has laid out a complete system of roads connecting all main market centers and adjoining a like system with the adjacent States.

The immediate call for additional appropriations is due to the fact that many States have already obligated themselves to the several counties for the entire amount of Federal aid allotted to them by the appropriation passed in February, 1919, and have on hand, in some cases, petitions and bond issues for additional roads equal to the amounts already set aside.

Before July 1, 1920, all of the present Federal appropriation will have been obligated by the several highway departments, and without additional appropriations definitely made the incentive for the people to continue road building is gone.

In most States bond issues by the several counties have been carried entirely upon the promise of Federal aid, and in the States where highway departments have already been compelled to give public announcement that all the Federal aid is exhausted further bond issues can not be voted, and continued road petitions will be stopped, unless further assistance by Congress is assured.

The appropriations already made by Congress to spur on road building and give employment to many classes of labor have been most enthusiastically met by the people, and often to such an extent that many petitions are now on file with State highway departments which can not be given consideration.

One of the great incentives in State road building with Federal aid has been the assurance of Federal supervision in construction, and if additional aid is not given many projects can not have this supervision, which is so much desired.

Feeling that Congress is fully alive to the necessity of substantial road building as one of the great requirements of the time to facilitate transportation for the marketing of crops and to intensify all kinds of rural development, we would most respectfully request that an additional appropriation for Federal aid in highway construction be made immediately, said appropriation to be as follows:

The sum of $100,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921.
The sum of $100,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922.
The sum of $100,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923.
The sum of $100,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1924.

All sums to be apportioned and extended in accordance with the provisions of the Federal-aid act approved July 11, 1916, as amended by the Post Office appropriation bill passed in February, 1919, and that each State shall be entitled to its full apportionment until one year after the expiration of the last appropriation allotted to that State; i. e., until June 30, 1925.

Respectfully submitted.

HENRY J. ALLEN, Chairman.

HEIGHT OF BUILDINGS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. PHELAN. I introduce a bill to regulate the height of buildings that may be erected on land confronting Meridian Park on the south in the city of Washington.

The bill (S. 2945) regulating the height of buildings that may be erected on land confronting Meridian Hill Park on the south was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask to have printed in the RECORD the papers accompanying the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE COMMISSION OF FINE ARTS.
Washington, D. C., September 4, 1919.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR PHELAN: An apartment house is about to be constructed on W and Sixteenth Streets, opposite Meridian Hill Park. The height of the building will be at elevation 209. The elevation of the terrace wall of Meridian Hill, over which the view of the city is obtained, is 198. The apartment house would rise 11 feet higher than the highest point in the park. Add the necessary ventilator and elevator shafts, which are always ugly, and there is another 12 or 15 feet.

Congress purchased Meridian Hill largely because it commanded a view over the city. That was and should be its chief attraction. The land cost $490,000. The expenditures for improvements to June 30, 1918, were $105,000. The contemplated expenditures are equal to the value of the land. This money will be largely thrown away if the park is dominated by an apartment house and the view of the Capitol, the Monument, the river, and the Virginia hills is cut off.

The building laws of the District of Columbia should be changed to protect all the parks from the domination of private structures. The laws now aim to protect public buildings and the Union Station Plaza. There is no reason why the laws should not protect the parks as well.

Sincerely yours, CHARLES MOORE.

BAR HARBOR, August 26, 1919.

MY DEAR COL. RIDLEY: I am much distressed about that sky scraper of an apartment building which they have started to build fronting the Meridian Hill Park, which will practically cut off the superb city view, and the only city park in town that commands a city view.

A bill was introduced in Congress some three years ago to regulate the height of apartment buildings on certain residence streets.

I think it would have passed last session had it not been for a new bill that was introduced—a better, as for that, but what a dawdling!

It seems to me that if you and others would stir up a certain amount of dynamo you could stop this building, or, if not, see that the height is not over 70 feet. If this apartment is built up to the old regulation of 85 feet, then practically add another story in the way of balcony, chimneys, roofing for gardens, etc., to the stone-wall obstruction of view.

It is surely a national loss to ruin that little Meridian Hill Park in its finest feature—the superb city view. Do stir up the town and stop it.

Most sincerely, yours, MARY F. HENDERSON.

ENGINEER COMMISSIONER
OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, June 9, 1919.

Col. C. S. RIDLEY,
1729 New York Avenue, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COLONEL: Referring to your letter of June 3 concerning roof elevation of projected apartment house south of Meridian Hill Park, I beg to advise you that the elevation at the southeast corner of Sixteenth and W Streets is 124 feet, while the allowable height under present regulations for an apartment building on Sixteenth Street is 85 feet to the highest part of the roof, thus making a roof elevation of 209 feet.

Yours, very truly,

C. W. KUTZ,
Lieut. Col., Corps of Engineers, U. S. Army,
Engineer Commissioner, District of Columbia.

OFFICE OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS,
June 3, 1919.

Gen. CHARLES W. KUTZ,
Engineer Commissioner, District of Columbia,
District Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL: Referring to the apartment house which is to be built south of Meridian Hill Park on Sixteenth Street, I find that the elevation of the terrace wall over which the view to the south is given is 198. It has been my impression that the apartment house would be high enough to stop the view from the terraces, but I am uncertain as to the exact elevation of the top of the apartment house. It will certainly be very desirable to keep it below the elevation given above.

Very truly, yours,

C. S. RIDLEY,
Colonel, United States Army.

ENGINEER COMMISSIONER
OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, March 10, 1919.

Mr. CHARLES MOORE,
Chairman the Commission of Fine Arts,
1729 New York Avenue NW., Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MOORE: I have your letter of March 8 concerning a proposed apartment house at the foot of Meridian Hill Park.

No request for authority to build such a structure has yet been submitted, but if it is submitted the commissioners will be obliged to approve the plans, provided they conform to existing law and regulations, which, as you know, authorize a maximum height of 85 feet above the sidewalk in a residence district such as this.

My objection to special legislation for Sixteenth Street is that it will retard rather than assist in the establishment of zoning regulations. In other words, the need for regulation on Sixteenth Street is a lever which will help us to secure the more comprehensive authority which we desire.

As to the suggestion that a tentative zoning map be prepared, I beg to advise that a commission of five members is now studying the question as to the form which a zoning law should take. To determine the adequacy of any proposed law, the commission will tentatively apply it to various sections of the District, but until an enabling act is passed, vesting in the commissioners or in some independent commission the power to promulgate zoning regulations, it seems most unwise to make public tentative plans, as every property owner dissatisfied with the proposed lines of demarcation would use his influence to defeat the legislation.

Very truly, yours,

C. W. KUTZ,
Lieut. Col., Corps of Engineers, U. S. Army,
Engineer Commissioner, District of Columbia.

SEPTEMBER 16, 1919, A LEGAL HOLIDAY.

Mr. McCUMBER. I introduce a joint resolution making Tuesday, September 16, 1919, a legal holiday in the District of Columbia. I will state that the object of the joint resolution is to allow the banks to close on that day. Under the present law banks in the District of Columbia can not close on any day except a legal holiday, and this is to make that one day a legal holiday, inasmuch as the President has already made it a legal holiday for the departments and the business establishments of the District will be closed for that particular occasion. Such a thing has been done several times before, I understand, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 100) making Tuesday, September 16, 1919, a legal holiday in the District of Columbia was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas arrangements have been made for a grand review of the First Division of the American Expeditionary Forces in the District of Columbia on Tuesday, September 16, 1919; and

Whereas the President by proclamation has declared that day a legal holiday in so far as the governmental departments are concerned; and

Whereas the various business houses and other institutions in the District of Columbia have made arrangements to close in order that their employees and others may participate in the celebration; and

Whereas under the laws governing the banking business in the District of Columbia it will be impossible for any of the banks to close on that day without action of Congress declaring the day a legal holiday: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That Tuesday, September 16, 1919, being the day of the grand review of the First Division of the American Expeditionary Forces, is hereby made a legal public holiday in the District of Columbia to all intents and purposes in the same manner as is Christmas, the 1st day of January, the 22d day of February, the 30th day of May, the 4th day of July, and the first Monday in September, as are now by law public holidays.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—PAUL HUBNER.

On motion of Mr. NEW, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying the bill (S. 2694) for the relief of Paul Hubner, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, there having been no adverse report thereon.

SALE AND DISTRIBUTION OF SUGAR.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there seems to be a shortage of sugar, not only in Washington but all over the country. I have received a letter which throws some light on the subject from a well-known citizen of my State, a writer of recognized ability and known all over the State. It is self-explanatory and bears directly on the question; at least, it gives one very important viewpoint. I ask that it may be read by the Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

LINCOLN, NEBR., August 30, 1919.

United States Senator G. W. NORRIS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In relation to the alleged shortage of sugar in Nebraska I want to remind you that there are four large beet-sugar factories operating in Nebraska. One of them has been in operation 30 years.

During all these years, with the exception of a short time in 1918, not a pound of Nebraska sugar was ever offered for sale in Nebraska. It is notorious that Nebraska sugar has always been sent east, generally to New York, while Nebraska dealers have been compelled to buy sugar from San Francisco and pay freight to the Missouri River. This was, of course, to "equalize prices" by adding freight charges to all sugar put on the market. It could be done only by a conspiracy between the factories, the railroads, and the jobbers, and the outrage applied to all parts of the United States.

In past years I have visited at Belize, British Honduras, and at Pearl City and Bluefields, Nicaragua, and there personally inspected invoices of beet sugar bought by the Central American dealers in which the New York price was shown as $2.90 and $3 per 100 pounds. At that same time Nebraska people, in a beet-sugar State, were compelled to pay from 7 to 10 cents per pound for beet sugar.

On August 7 of this year I attended a reception and dinner tendered to 125 newspaper men and women by the managers of the beet-sugar factory at Gering, Nebr. The dinner was served in the warehouse of the sugar factory. The sugar for the coffee was on the table in the original cartons, which showed that it came from New Orleans.

I asked the management what had become of their own sugar and was told that the supply manufactured last fall and winter had been shipped to Michigan, Ohio, and States farther east.

It would be interesting in connection with this to learn what became of the beet sugar manufactured in Michigan. And, above all, it would be interesting to learn if the sugar manufactured in Nebraska is actually shipped away, or if it is instead kept in the warehouses of the factories and the big wholesalers at Omaha and Lincoln, to be finally distributed to the smaller jobbers and local dealers under fictitious San Francisco freight bills. An inquiry might even show that some of this sugar is now concealed in storage in Nebraska.

Please consider these facts and suggestions in connection with the telegrams you are now receiving from the wholesalers claiming a sugar shortage in our State.

Yours, respectfully, FRANK A. HARRISON.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can not state what the Food Administration has done in relation to the distribution of sugar from Nebraska the last year. The Food Administration may have ordered every pound of the sugar that was manufactured in Nebraska to be shipped out of Nebraska to some other point and New Orleans sugar shipped into Nebraska, but I do not believe it.

I wish to say to the Senator that the Food Administration has had and has the distribution of every pound of sugar manufactured in the United States for the years 1918 and 1919. The administration has purchased it, paid for it, and the sugar manufacturers have nothing whatever to do with the distribution of it nor with the price which it is sold for.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to say that a careful reading of this letter will disclose the fact that much of it refers to a time when the Food Administration was not in existence.

Mr. SMOOT. I was about to refer to that part of the letter.

Mr. NORRIS. It likewise gives an exception during the years when sugar made in Nebraska was consumed in Nebraska, and that was when the Food Administration was in control for a short time, it being a time when it did not make any difference whether the sugar was shipped or not, because the price was definitely fixed. There was, therefore, no reason why they should ship sugar produced in Nebraska into Michigan and ship sugar from San Francisco into Nebraska, even if that were actually carried out. The writer of the letter intimates that it might not have been always carried out, but it was pretended to have been done in order to add the freight. There was a time, as the writer of the letter says, when the Food Administration had control, when there was some Nebraska sugar consumed in Nebraska. I think that is explained by the fact that the price was definitely fixed. Of course, there were other times, one of which he mentions particularly, when the Food Administration did have control and when they were having a dinner right in the factory, and the sugar they used in their coffee came from New Orleans—at least, it was so marked.

It seems to me that that condition only demonstrates economically in that line, and I presume it is true of others, there is something absolutely wrong in the method of handling a product of consumption which all people must have.

Mr. SMOOT. I was coming to the question of the distribution of sugar before the Food Administration took it up. I can not conceive why the sugar manufacturers of Nebraska should want to ship their sugar to Chicago and lose the freight charges from Nebraska to Chicago, and in such a case that is exactly what they would do. Take the sugar that is manufactured in Utah. The price there is the same as the price at Omaha. In order that the manufacturers may find a market for their surplus sugar they must find an eastern market, and to do so they must meet the eastern price, and in doing so they must pay the freight between Salt Lake City and Chicago; and the Nebraska manufacturers of sugar would have to lose the freight from wherever the manufactory was located to Chicago if it was shipped there.

Mr. NORRIS. That may be what they actually do, but why should they say to the consumer, for instance, "This sugar has come from San Francisco, or from New Orleans," when, as a matter of fact, it was made right in the place where they were using it?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no manufacturer of sugar in the United States who would not prefer to sell his sugar locally. The only sugar that the manufacturer gets full market price for is the sugar sold in his local market. I do not know why this statement was made as to the years past. I believe the sugar manufacturers of Nebraska want to make every dollar out of sugar that they can.

Mr. NORRIS. There is not any doubt of that.

Mr. SMOOT. They would not ship it to Chicago if there was a local demand for it, for if they did they would lose the amount of freight paid.

Mr. NORRIS. But the writer of this letter says that they have shipped it and are continuing to ship it.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

Mr. SMOOT. I know that business men will not rob themselves of a profit, and the writer of the letter virtually says that that is what they are doing in Nebraska.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona calls for the regular order.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I send to the desk a letter which I have just received from Rev. Carl Reed Longbrake, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of the town of Renton, in the State of Washington. It contains, I believe, some valuable and very sound and sensible suggestions with regard to an important matter that is now pending before the Senate, and I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary may read it.

There being no objection, the letter was read, as follows:

RENTON, WASH., August 23, 1919.

Senator MILES POINDEXTER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have been following very closely the arguments in the Senate for and against the proposed league of nations covenant. A very careful reading of the covenant when first published convinced me that the Senate would do wrong to ratify it. A few months ago a great majority of the people were undoubtedly in favor of the league as outlined in that document, but they were ignorant of what it contained. Propaganda had prejudiced them in favor of the league as the attainment of a great ideal, and when the league covenant was published even men of a high grade of intelligence proclaimed themselves in favor of it at every opportunity, when they had not even taken the trouble to read it carefully, some of them not at all. Here is an instance. I was a commissioner to the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church, United States of America, which met in St. Louis last May and passed a resolution favoring the proposed league. I personally questioned a large number of men as to their attitude, and almost universally found that though they were by a large majority enthusiastically in favor of the proposed covenant, only a few claimed to have given it a careful reading, and a number of its adherents had not read it at all, while nearly all who had read it carefully were opposed to its adoption. All opposition to it was considered by its adherents to be due to party politics.

But now, thanks to the courageous stand of yourself and others of the Senate who refuse to abdicate their high office and become rubber stamps, the public is becoming informed, and sentiment has swung the other way, so far as I can see.

Though I have read the accounts of the Senate debate on the question, what seems to me one of the strongest arguments against the proposed league I have not seen mentioned. As you know, our American melting pot has not been melting any too well. Even under present conditions, or rather those preceding the war, we have found it difficult to train our foreign born and many of the children of foreign born in real Americanism. If we should join this league, requiring that our Government have a hand in the settlement of every European dispute, will it not result in the people of the several nationalities represented here banding themselves together for the purpose of wielding political power here for the benefit of their mother country? Will they not be inclined to bring political pressure to bear upon our Government in the interests of the country from which they came? Will they not vote at presidential elections for the candidate who seems most to favor the cause of their fatherland in some international dispute? Will not this be a strong incentive to keep alive the old-country interests and traditions, grouping our people according to national origin, and thus greatly hindering their Americanization?

I believe 40 per cent of our population are foreign born or children of foreign-born parents. You will know if these figures are correct. I contend that any policy tending to make these people more conscious of their origin and more loyal to their mother country will be disastrous to America. We don't want the De Valeras from every country in Europe over here appealing to their own race to stand by the mother country, regardless of America's interests, and advising the rest of us what we ought to do. England, France, Italy, Japan, etc., are racially united, and have nothing to fear along this line. But America, a new Nation, made up of many nations, has reason to continue to follow Washington's advice, to keep aloof as much as possible from European politics. If we don't, we may find that instead of a country we have an international boarding house.

I wonder that I have seen no account of this argument being used in the Senate. It may not be good politics to use it, but I have tried it on several persons and found it convincing, and pass it to you for what it may be worth.

Success to you in your fight for an undivided America, free from disgraceful entangling alliances.

Sincerely,

C. R. LONGBRAKE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I simply wish to say in line with the suggestion made in the letter that I received a telegram this morning representing a certain organization of a certain race in Europe denouncing in unmeasured terms the action of the President in directing our peace commission to take certain action in Paris, and stating that they have 4,000 votes in the State.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I crave the indulgence of the Senate for a moment to say to the writer of the letter which has just been read at the desk that evidently he is not informed. Some of the foreigners of which the writer of the letter complains are the most efficient and insistent elements in asking us to reject totally the treaty, and they appear to be cooperating with him. I call the attention of the Senator from Washington to that fact.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota evidently misapprehends the letter. There is nothing whatever in conflict with the letter in the statement which has just been made by the Senator from Minnesota; on the contrary, the very situation concerning which the Senator from Minnesota exhibits so much impatience is what is condemned by the Rev. Mr. Longbrake in writing the letter. What he says is that a ratification of the league covenant will align the various elements of foreign blood composing a part of the population of the United States on the one side or on the other side of every act the United States may be called upon to perform in the various and multifarious duties which will devolve upon it under the league of nations. Every time that the United States is called upon to perform an act in connection with the government of the Saar Valley or in the determination of the boundaries of the Jugo-Slavs or in the mandatory guardianship of the Armenians the people who are interested in those countries will line up at the doors of Congress and at the White House in the interest of the mother country. That is what he complains of, and it is the very condition which the Senator from Minnesota describes.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I wish to call the Senator's attention to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on our desks this morning. Over one-half of it is devoted to matter that was presented to the Committee on Foreign Relations representing a foreign interest in no way connected with the treaty.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That shows, Mr. President, how much trouble the league of nations has got the United States into already. It is just an omen of the difficulties that are in store for us in the future if we do not get out of it as soon as possible.

Mr. NELSON. I would say rather that this RECORD shows into how much trouble the Committee on Foreign Relations are getting us.

NATIONAL ECONOMIC LEAGUE.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD the vote of the national council of the National Economic League, taken on the peace treaty on the resolution which follows:

Resolved, That the United States should ratify the treaty with Germany, including the league of nations covenant, without complicating, delaying, or invalidating reservations.

This is not to be construed as excluding such interpretations of the treaty and covenant as may be thought necessary to clarify the American position, provided no danger is thereby created of delay or of furnishing ground for Germany or other signatory to declare that the ratification by the United States is not complete and binding.

Under that, Mr. President, I should like to have appear the following:

OFFICERS AND EXECUTIVE COUNCIL OF THE NATIONAL ECONOMIC LEAGUE.

President: William H. Taft, former President of the United States.

Vice presidents: Charles E. Hughes, former Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States; Frank A. Vanderlip, former president of the National City Bank of New York; Lindley M. Garrison, former Secretary of War; and David Starr Jordan, chairman emeritus Leland Stanford, Jr., University; Jacob Gould Schurman, president of Cornell University; Roscoe Pound, dean of Harvard Law School; Franklin K. Treasurer: Harvey S. Chase, certified public accountant.

Secretary: J. W. Beatson, 6 Beacon Street, Boston.

The purpose of the National Economic League is to create an informed and disinterested leadership for public opinion—a leadership that is free from any possible partisan bias or class interest and that will be accepted as representing simply the best thought of this country—and to provide the educational means of developing a public opinion that will respond to such leadership.

The National Council of the League contains in its membership (at present about 2,500) presidents and professors of universities, judges, lawyers, bankers, merchants, manufacturers, farmers, labor leaders, etc. The aim, however, has not been so much to make it inclusive of classes and interests as representative of the informed and unbiased opinion of the country.

Any question or requests for further information regarding the league may be addressed to J. W. Beatson, secretary, 6 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

I ask to have that appear in the RECORD as it is printed in the document I hold in my hand, and I ask also to have, following that, the vote classified by States, the number of yeas and the number of nays from each State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

VOTE OF THE NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE NATIONAL ECONOMIC LEAGUE ON THE PEACE TREATY.

Resolved*, That the United States should ratify the treaty with Germany, including the league of nations covenant, without complicating, delaying, or invalidating reservations.

(*This is not to be construed as excluding such interpretations of the treaty and covenant as may be thought necessary to clarify the American position, provided no danger is thereby created of delay or of furnishing ground for Germany or other signatory to declare that the ratification by the United States is not complete and binding.)

CONFIRMATION OF GEN. JOHN J. PERSHING.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am informed that the President of the United States has sent to the Senate the nomination of John J. Pershing to be a general of the Army. I ask unanimous consent, sir, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that nomination as in open executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course I do not object to the consideration of the nomination in open executive session; but I desire to ask the Senator why the consideration of this matter should be had in open executive session when the Senate has been so strenuously rejecting such a course of procedure with reference to all other nominations?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the purpose of my request is to develop the fact—and I think it is a fact—that the Senate is unanimously in favor of the confirmation of this nomination. I took the pains of polling the Committee on Military Affairs, which, the Senator from Idaho will remember, had already reported unanimously the bill which made it possible for the President to make this nomination, and to inquire from what Senators I could encounter yesterday afternoon and yesterday evening whether it would not be a fitting tribute for the Senate to confer upon Gen. Pershing in thus confirming his nomination in open executive session.

Mr. BORAH. I think it is a splendid idea; and every argument in favor of considering this nomination in open session is equally potent for having open sessions in confirmation of all appointees to the Government service. There is no possible argument in favor of considering nominations for important offices with closed doors; and I trust that Gen. Pershing, having served his country so well abroad, has assisted us in establishing a precedent which will not hereafter be broken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from New York? The Chair hears none. The Chair lays before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, September 3, 1919.

To the SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES:

Under the provisions of an act of Congress approved September 3, 1919, I nominate the officer herein named for appointment in the Regular Army of the United States.

GENERAL OFFICER.

Gen. John J. Pershing, United States Army (emergency), to be general, with rank from September 3, 1919.

WOODROW WILSON.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nomination will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate at any length in discussing the propriety of this nomination and the propriety of its confirmation by the Senate. Nothing that I could say would add to the knowledge that the Senate already possesses of the great achievements of Gen. Pershing. Suffice it to say that he was the captain of the greatest expeditionary force known in history; that that force, measured in the number of men and in the distance over which it was transported, surpasses anything of its kind in the way of a military effort. Gen. Pershing was its responsible commander. Upon him rested the entire burden of the successful management of that tremendous undertaking. He so managed that undertaking, he so commanded that force, and brought it in contact with the enemy in such a decisive manner as to bring the war to a successful conclusion, and I doubt not that the Senate, as well as the people of the country generally, rejoice in honoring him for having performed such a tremendous task at such a crucial moment in the history of the world.

From the Committee on Military Affairs I now report back favorably the nomination and request its confirmation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the nomination?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I ask that the Senate, in acting upon this nomination, do so by a rising vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to its present consideration? The Chair hears none. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination, the request being for a rising vote? All in favor will rise. [A pause.] The nomination is unanimously concurred in by the Senate of the United States. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.] The President of the United States will be notified of the action of the Senate, and the Senate resumes its legislative session.

RELATION OF LABOR AND CAPITAL.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, a bill has been introduced and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce relating to the control and regulation of wages and the prohibition of strikes on railroads engaged in interstate commerce. Pertinent to that matter, which will be considered now by the full Committee on Interstate Commerce, I desire to address a few remarks to the Senate.

Industrial wars between labor and capital must ultimately find a solution that will stand for industrial peace without resort to force to settle the matters in dispute or we must admit that the advance of civilization has come to a halt.

The great difficulty that confronts the country in the settlement of its labor disputes is the fact that up to the present time we have found no sound basis on which to rest the settlement.

At times, particularly in the distant past, capital has contended that labor had no right to advise capital how to run its business. On the other hand, labor has contended that it was fighting its way from industrial slavery to industrial independence and that it must have a free hand with which to work out its destiny; and labor to-day contends that there must be no restraint placed on the right of collective bargaining with the employers of labor, even though the result of the system in some cases will lead inevitably to industrial war.

In an effort to respond to this sentiment, the Congress of the United States has gone so far as to enact into the law of the land the statement that "the labor of a human being is not a commodity or an article of commerce." This declaration has been regarded by some leaders of labor as the Magna Charta of the wage earners. Yet, so far as I have been able to ascertain, no court in this land has ever held that the labor of a human being is a commodity or article of commerce.

But it can not be denied, notwithstanding the express declaration of the Congress, that labor is a thing of value and is both bought and sold. Being a thing of value, not unlike property of value, it is entitled to its rights, and these rights in the last analysis should be recognized and protected by the law, just as property has been recognized and protected by the law for centuries past.

We regard ourselves as the product of a highly enlightened age, and yet we accept complacently and almost as a matter of course many relics of barbarism. We have not abandoned wars or the preparation for war, although we talk of a league to keep the peace and of a court composed of the great nations of the world to maintain peace for the future.

Ten centuries ago our ancestors on the Continent of Europe indulged in private war for the settlement of individual wrongs. We have only moved by slow degrees from the place where force and violence were the determining factors in the control of property to where law was substituted to protect the rights of man.

It has been true in the advance of all civilization. It was as much true in the ancient Grecian and Roman civilization as it was true in the dawn of civilization among the tribes and nations of northern Europe.

It may be worth while to consider the evolution from the day when the rights of man were maintained by the sword to the day when their determination was prescribed in judicial tribunals established by governments.

In the analysis of the process that led to the protection of property by law instead of by force we may find the light that will show us the way to the correct determination of the harassing questions that are now disturbing the industrial world.

A thousand years ago our ancestors in England lived mostly without law. The blood feud gave protection to the clan by insuring speedy vengeance on those who violated the rights of its members, and not until the days of Alfred the Great was the right to pay the price of peace established as an amende to take the place of force and violence.

Finally the Norman civilization wiped out private vengeance and reprisals which the Saxon kings had tolerated and established in their places a public administration of justice, even though the law was crude and force was not entirely abandoned.

For centuries after the Norman era in England, although murder and theft were declared to be crimes and justice administered in the courts, the landowner possessed the right to dispossess his tenant by force or personally take possession of his property and sell it to pay the rent. To-day we would regard such a procedure by a landowner as unwarranted, and the courts of the land would restrain him from taking such a radical and forceful step.

We have at least reached an era so far as the protection of property is concerned where there is no property right that is not recognized and where the courts provide a remedy to protect every such right.

Yet in this age of advanced civilization we hesitate to protect with the law the right—the principal right—of man—the right that must always go hand in hand with liberty of person and freedom of action—the right of a free man to earn a living wage. Without this right labor must always occupy a servile position or must maintain the right itself by force.

We must recognize that labor and capital are still largely left to settle their controversies by the primitive methods of strikes, boycotts, and lockouts, merely restrained in a slight degree by the law that is intended to protect property and not intended to protect the right of labor.

These remedies have been difficult to control in the past, and often have resulted in the attempt to reach a determination by brute force on one side or the other instead of an appeal to reason.

The toilers of America have been left to a large extent to extort economic justice by refusing to work, and have often carried their appeal to force so far as to destroy both life and property when other laborers were willing to take the places they had left vacant. In the past decade this condition has prevailed in many parts of our country, and it seems to prevail without the desire either on the part of labor or on the part of capital to accept a more civilized method of settling their disputes.

If only the employer or the employee were involved in the controversy, the Government might continue to blind its eyes to the rights involved in the disputes, the justice that should prevail, and allow force on one side or force on the other side to prevail in the final settlement, but each day combined capital broadens its field of action and each day union labor extends its field of control.

The labor battle of the past involved a narrow field. To-day it is threatening to become nation wide in its scope, and a controversy that had a limited effect on those not actually involved in the past to-day seriously threatens the happiness and prosperity of all the people of the Nation.

Must the Government continue to view this question from the standpoint of the contending parties or has the time come when the rights and the happiness of all the people demand that primitive force must give way to the law of civilization and permanent courts must determine the rights of labor as well as the rights of property?

It must be admitted candidly that when courts were established to protect life and property the blood feud passed away from civilized communities; the clan was no longer necessary for the protection of the rights of individuals and a forward step to freedom was achieved. The same will be true when tribunals are established to determine disputes between labor and capital. Competitive bargaining will no longer exist. Wages that increased or diminished by force will be a thing of the past. Labor values will be recognized and protected by law. I do not wish to be understood to assert that labor has not been recognized by law in the past. We have employers' liability acts, restriction of hours of labor, and laws providing for conditions of work, all passed in the recognition of the right of labor to be protected in its efforts to secure a daily wage. We have had laws passed appointing boards of conciliation and arbitration and some have gone so far as to advocate the compelling of labor to work pending the settlement of labor controversies, but nowhere and at no time have we had a recognition of the fact that labor is a thing of value, and that as a thing of value it should have its rights under the law and should be protected when its rights are assailed or jeopardized; that it should not be allowed to invade the rights of others in protecting its own position.

I recognize that self-preservation is the first impulse of human life; that when a workingman is oppressed, that when his legal and economic rights are denied he is face to face with the question as to whether he shall endure the wrong, whether he shall let his rights be trampled underfoot, or whether he shall struggle and force better living conditions for himself and family. Until the law itself provides a way out, violence will be the last resort of the workingman when he is compelled to suffer gross inequalities.

Mankind almost universally approves of violence which is used to avenge or beat off injustice when there is no other remedy. Without public justice, superior in power and force to that of all offenders, there can be no peace, no safety, no mutual intercourse.

To establish justice, to secure individuals and society in the enjoyment of their rights, is the great duty of governments and the principal reason why they are instituted among men. The ultimate goal of civilization will not be reached until a remedy is given by law for the violation of every right, and every injury can find a place for redress within the courts of our land.

In one of his opinions a great English justice once said:

> It were a vain thing to imagine that there should be a right without a remedy, for want of right and want of remedy are convertibles.

Our own Chief Justice Marshall declared—

> The very essence of civil liberty consists in the right of every individual to claim the protection of the laws, whenever he receives an injury. One of the first duties of government is to afford that protection.

Can we in this enlightened age fail to recognize a new province for law in the substitution of peaceful methods for the settlement of labor disputes in place of violent redress for economic injuries?

I do not contend that we can arrive at the ultimate goal of our desire immediately. I do not favor laws that will compel labor to work by compulsion; nor do I believe that strikes will be immediately done away with and become a thing of the past, no matter what laws we place on the statute books. The Norman law, establishing a court to protect life, did not in the next hour end the blood feud, but ultimately law triumphed and force was abandoned.

In the measurement of any scheme to fairly settle disputes between labor and capital we have to consider its operation from a threefold point of view, namely, the elevation of labor, the orderly development of industry, and the peace of society.

Some contend that through the gates of collective bargaining labor and capital can walk hand in hand to a solution of the wage problems for their mutual benefit, but this is a mere theory that has failed to work many times in the past.

The theory overlooks the fact that the fixed policy of capital is to pay out in wages exactly what is required to maintain production at a given rate, and that labor's unappeased desire is to collect the greatest wage obtainable for the service rendered. Because of the conflict that arises at this point of difference labor organizes in order that it may accomplish collectively what it can not accomplish individually. Capital, responding to its own selfish desires, meets organization with organization, force with force. The rule of reason is not part of the final settlement, and right and justice cease to be factors worthy of consideration.

From the very nature of things collective bargaining can not be a very satisfactory solution to work out the differences that arise between capital and labor, especially in railroad disputes, when prompt and adequate service is of first importance to all the people.

When collective bargaining fails to solve the problems in dispute, strikes and lockouts are the next steps ahead.

Surely with the people or their representatives in the legislative bodies of the land must rest a wiser and better solution of our industrial problems, looking to the elevation of labor, the promotion of commercial progress, and the establishment of industrial peace.

In a published article Mr. A. B. Garretson, president of the Order of Railway Conductors of America, has said:

> The real difficulty in the solution of these questions lies in the fact that nearly every remedy that is offered deals only with the effect of conditions. In the treatment of industrial strife it would be well to follow the general trend of medical schools for the past century. Formerly the mission of the doctor was only to cure. In later years greater effort is given to the prevention of ills, and until this course is pursued and the cause of industrial unrest is removed it will be found that the effort to abolish the diseases is without result.

Mr. Garretson is clearly right. We will accomplish but little in our efforts to mend an industrial dispute after issues are joined. We should establish permanently the rights and duties of labor and capital each one to the other, and both to the public, and then we will have established a situation that can be worked out at all times without a resort to force as the final arbiter.

The problem that is now before the Senate for consideration is one not only involving the general rights of labor but also the industrial peace of the Nation.

Under our dual form of government the Congress can only act within the scope of its delegated power, and there is a definite limitation on our power to act in reference to the general problems we have under discussion. Most of these problems fall within the jurisdiction of the States and must be worked out by State legislation.

The problem before us relates to the rates of wages and hours of labor of men engaged in interstate railway transportation.

The Constitution of the United States gives the power to the Congress to regulate commerce among the several States, and by a long line of decisions the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the power to regulate commerce carries with it the power to regulate the instrument of commerce.

Under these decisions an Interstate Commerce Commission has been established by the Federal Government and granted power to fix reasonable rates for the transportation of commodities among the several States. Our jurisdiction to control the matter now before the Senate rests on the determination of the question as to whether the men employed in the movement of interstate railway trains are an instrument necessary to the movement of commerce among the States. If so, the Congress has jurisdiction of the matter, and to my mind the man is as much the instrument of commerce as the train itself, which the courts in numerous cases have held that the Congress has the power to regulate.

If under the commerce clause of the Constitution we have the power to fix the rate of transportation of commodities from one State to another, to prescribe the manner in which the locomotives and cars shall be constructed and operated, surely we have the right to prescribe what shall be reasonable hours for the men employed in this line of industry to work and what is a reasonable compensation in the way of wage for the service rendered.

The avoidance of railway strikes and lockouts in the future is of far greater importance to the Nation than the settlement of ordinary industrial disputes. In the latter case the issues involved are largely confined to the two contending sides—the employer and the employee—and the public at large, as a rule, has only a remote interest in the controversy, but in disputes between labor and capital engaged in transporting the commerce of the country, the public's interest is vastly greater than that of the owners of the property or of the wage earners in their employ.

The steam railroads of the United States on June 30, 1916, had in their employ approximately 1,700,000 persons, and paid out in wages $1,500,000,000. Since that time the employees of the railroad systems of the United States have increased to over 2,000,000 men, and the compensation paid in wages has increased a billion dollars.

At the time mentioned a general railroad strike throughout the United States was impending. The President of the United States called on the Congress to avoid the strike by affirmative legislation, fixing the rate of wages on the interstate railroads of the country. This legislation was advocated and approved by the representatives of the railroad employees. Legislation was passed, its constitutionality was tested in the Supreme Court of the United States, and the court has affirmed the validity of the act. So that there can be no doubt that a precedent has been established for the Congress to regulate the wages on the interstate railroads of the country.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption at this point?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would really prefer to finish my speech. When I am through I shall be very glad indeed to yield to the Senator for a question.

It has long been recognized that Congress has the power to regulate the rates for the transportation of persons and commodities on the railroads, and it is also recognized beyond cavil that the Congress has the power to delegate the regulation of these rates to a commission after prescribing the conditions on which the regulation shall be based. If we can delegate the power to regulate the rates, it must be true that we can delegate the power to regulate the wage scale and establish a court, a board, or a commission for that purpose. We prescribe that the railroads of the country shall collect only reasonable rates for the transportation of freight. It seems to me that it is clear that the Congress has the power to require that the railroad systems of America shall pay to their employees fair, reasonable, and just compensation, to be prescribed by a commission.

Having the power to act, the question confronts us as to whether the time has come when the Congress should exercise this power and appoint a commission to determine this grave and pressing question. The successful solution of the wage problem on the interstate railroads of the country is most essential to the Nation's economic life and of vital importance to every citizen of the land. The solution of the problem directly reflects itself into the productive business of the entire Nation, for it must be borne in mind that an increase of the rate of pay to men employed in transportation is almost sure in the end to translate itself into increased freight and passenger rates that must be paid by the public and borne by the commerce of the country.

No greater disaster could come to the homes of the people of America than a general continental railroad strike. Had the contending parties to the controversy in the threatened strike of 1916 insisted on strike conditions as the final and only solution of their differences it would have meant the absolute and complete paralysis of the commerce and industry throughout the United States, with all the attendant loss of property and personal suffering that such conditions must inevitably produce. The blood feud of the Saxon era stared us in the face. The Congress of the United States, to avoid disaster, compelled the railroad companies to pay the price of temporary peace. The gravity of the situation for the moment passed away and industrial peace was maintained in the land, but there has been no final solution of the problem. The difficulties and the dangers of the past have not been remedied. The parties to the controversy have reached no final settlement, and the Congress of the United States is considering to-day the problems involved in an effort to place on the statute books remedies that will prevent industrial disaster for the future.

Much might be said in reference to the rights of labor and the burdens of commerce on each side of the controversy that confronts us, but I think it is idle for us to discuss those phases of the question at this time. I take it that all will concede that it is impossible for the Congress itself to work out a fair solution of these problems, and it is only by the establishment of certain fixed principles that may act as a compass to guide the way in the future and by the establishment of tribunals to represent the Government in solving these problems that we can find the real way out.

To enact a law for compulsory arbitration at this time appears to be both impracticable and undesirable. In New Zealand, where the law for compulsory arbitration had its birth, it is generally admitted to have proven a failure. In line with this view of the subject we find that before the beginning of the Great War there were more than 300 boards of conciliation in existence in Great Britain, and yet British official reports show that despite the efforts of these many conciliation agencies there were in the year 1913, 1,497 strikes or lockouts in Great Britain, with attendant time losses of nearly 12,000,000 working days. On the other hand, it must be admitted that conciliation and arbitration acts have mitigated the evils that grow out of labor disputes, but it is clear that they have only scratched the surface, and that beneath the surface the controlling factors of force and violence are found in control of the labor situation. The industrial equation is as far from solution to-day as it was in the beginning. Was not Mr. Garretson right when he said:

> Modern methods should be directed to preventing the disease, not primarily to curing the patient.

Then how can the problem be solved fairly to all concerned—labor, capital, and the public?

There is but one way out, in my judgment, and that is to appoint a tribunal with the power to adjust these matters, which has the time to consider and the opportunity to know the facts. Such a tribunal must not only have the power and be prepared to do what is right and just by the labor employed on the railroads but must have authority and power to see that property is not confiscated by its decisions. For, should you confiscate the property of the transportation companies of America, you would break down the channels of transportation as effectively as you would break them down in a strike, with the resultant injury to the people of the United States. A tribunal of this kind must also have the authority and opportunity to consider the rights of the shippers and travelers of America, who in the last analysis will bear any increased burden that falls on the carriage of property or persons over the transportation lines. This tribunal must have authority and power to protect the rights of the whole people of the United States against the recurrence of lockouts and strikes.

What body, then, is most capable of determining all these questions and fairly adjusting them to the interests of all parties concerned? A board of arbitration to be appointed by the employers and employees of the railroad companies of the United States will only look to the matters in dispute between the contending parties, and will not have in mind the ultimate rights of the people. The general courts of the land are not equipped either with the knowledge or the power to obtain information in reference to the cardinal facts that must decide the controversy. If you want a final and just solution of such a controversy, you are practically driven to leaving the decision to a governmental commission that has full and ample opportunity to investigate the rates of wage, the earning power of the transportation companies, the cost of living, the burden that rests on the shipping public, and after a fair and full investigation, to determine what is a fair, just, and living wage for the men and to how great an extent a fair, just, and living wage may be increased to enable the toilers to secure the higher ideals of life and living; second, how far this charge can be placed on the capital of the corporation without breaking it down, destroying the value of its securities, bankrupting its property, and taking away from the investing public a fair return for capital invested; third, how far an increased charge for labor, interest, or supplies can be handed down to the public without doing injustice to the shipper and traveler and without becoming a menace to the development of the industry of the country. All of these questions must be determined by a court or an independent commission, but their findings, except so far as they may determine the rate for transportation that must be paid by the railroad companies and the rate of wage that must be received by the men if they continue their employment, will be academic, because they will have no power to operate on the side of the problem in which the general public is interested. The power to determine what are just and reasonable rates of transportation of persons and property over the interstate railroads of this country is fixed by law, and any increase or decrease of these rates must be made under the law of the land. Therefore it is essential that the board or commission that is given the power to adjust the wage scale of the men must also have the power to reflect its findings into the rates charged for the transportation of persons and property over the railroads. The board or commission that is created for the determination of these grave questions must determine whether the rates for transportation shall be increased and whether a charge made against the railroads for increased wages shall remain a charge on its capital, or whether, in justice and fair dealing, it shall be handed on to the shipper and the traveling public. It is therefore clear to me that the same power that has the right to fix the rates of transportation should have the right to fix the rates of wage and the hours of labor on the great transportation companies of the United States, and that this power and this duty should be given irrevocably to a governmental commission or board in order that it may do justice between employer and employee. The granting to a governmental commission or board of the power to determine the hours of labor and the rate of wage will solve the problem for the future. Men will not strike against the just decisions of the Government. After a fair determination of the controversy by an impartial tribunal, public opinion will force the contending parties to accept the verdict rendered as final. It must be done in the interest of the men involved, the industry of the people, and the peace of the Nation.

Now I yield to the Senator from Idaho, if he desires to ask me a question.

Mr. BORAH. I rather think the Senator has answered the question which was in my mind when I attempted to interrupt him. I understand the Senator is not advocating compulsory arbitration?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all. I think the policy of arbitration has failed; but I do think that in governmental matters, in matters that the Government controls, the time has come when the Government should fix a just and fair wage and make strikes impossible.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, the Government can establish a wage; but, as I understand, the Senator relies entirely upon the power of public opinion to enforce the wage.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I said public opinion would enforce it and it will do so; but I think, to be perfectly candid with the Senator, that a universal strike on the great interstate commerce carriers of America is unthinkable, and that it should be prohibited by law just as you prohibit a man from burning his house for fear he may set fire to his neighbor's house.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Or committing treason.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Or any act that has a tendency to destroy the peace or the happiness or the lives of the whole American people. I think the time has come when the Congress, if it does its full duty to the American people, should not hesitate or equivocate on this question. My contention is that if Congress proposes to say that men engaged in interstate commerce shall not have the power of collective bargaining or to go out on strike and use force against force, then it is the duty of the Government to establish a fair, just, and independent governmental tribunal that will fix a just, fair, and living wage, and not only a living wage, but a wage that reflects the position in society of the men who are involved in the controversy.

Mr. BORAH. But how would the Senator compel the men to accept the wage which was fixed, in case it was unsatisfactory?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would not attempt to do that. The Committee on Interstate Commerce has reported a bill which makes it a misdemeanor for two or more men to enter into a conspiracy for the purpose of interfering with a transshipment of interstate commerce in the United States. I think it is just as legitimate to pass a law to say that men shall not conspire to stop the food trains, the bread trains, the milk trains in America as it is to say that a man commits a crime against the United States Government if he burns a bridge across a stream that connects two States.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, Mr. President, if it is a conspiracy and is of the nature of an act which can be by law made a conspiracy and a criminal offense, I can follow the Senator's argument; but can we say to two men that they shall not have an understanding between themselves as to what wage they shall demand and in case it is not satisfactory they together shall not quit?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; and I would not have that done. I would not for one moment think of telling a man that he could not quit his work or 100 men that they could not quit their employment; but I am not in favor of allowing any man or men to interfere with the orderly movement of passengers and commodities among the States.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me for a brief statement in that connection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. The provision to which the Senator has referred contained in the bill reported by the subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate Commerce to the full committee and introduced a day or two ago by the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], recognizes and expressly preserves the right of employees to quit at will; that is, employees as individuals may quit at will for any reason; but it penalizes combinations or agreements among them to restrain, hinder, or prevent the movement of commodities or persons in interstate commerce. The provision is directed against the combination, but that provision does not seek to prevent a laborer from quitting work whenever he wants to.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator from Arkansas before he leaves the subject, Do I understand that the provision to which the Senator has reference in his bill would cover a case where 50 men or 100 men in the employ of a railroad company agree among themselves that they would not work for a certain wage?

Mr. ROBINSON. No; the provision of the bill is that the conspiracy must be for the purpose of preventing the movement of persons or commodities in interstate commerce, or must have that effect. Strikes which would not go to the extent of preventing the movement of persons or commodities in interstate commerce would not be penalized under the bill, nor would agreements which would not accomplish that purpose.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, then, the crime which the Senator has provided against in the bill would consist of a combination with intent to interfere with interstate commerce?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; or a combination which has that effect.

Mr. BORAH. If you go that far, it occurs to me that then you have reached the other dangerous point—that is, of saying that 100 men shall not agree amongst themselves that they will not remain in the employ of the railroad for a certain wage, because for them to quit would be to affect interstate commerce. You remove all question of intent, which would practically deny them the right to quit work.

Mr. ROBINSON. The right of the individual to quit at any time for any reason that he chooses is recognized and preserved. The right of two or more persons to combine together for the purpose of tying up commerce is penalized, and I think of necessity should be, for the reason stated by the Senator from Alabama. The regulation of commerce is a Government function; it is the duty of the Government of the United States to keep the channels of commerce open, and if it fails to do that the Nation can not live. This Nation can not live without commerce. The paramount right of the people to live must be recognized in our laws. At the same time there is no purpose on the part of anyone that I am familiar with to deny to a laborer the right to quit work if he thinks the wage is not sufficient; but in our view of the matter he has no right to combine with other laborers to prevent commerce, and thus force the people of the country to recognize a demand which the Government or the people may regard as unjust.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I construe the Senator's position, it amounts to this, that if a certain number of men who had had their wages fixed by a tribunal should nevertheless, acting together, jointly quit work it would then be proper for a court, for instance, to enjoin them from ceasing work, and compel them to go ahead under the wage.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; there is no provision in the proposed law that would authorize any proceeding of that nature. The combination is defined as a conspiracy, and it must be either for the purpose of tying up commerce, preventing, hindering, or restraining the movement of persons or property in interstate commerce, or have that effect. Any combination among the employees for the purpose, for instance, of compelling Congress to legislate, which would have the effect of preventing the movement of trains in interstate commerce, would be a conspiracy as defined by this act, even though it did not relate to the subject of wages.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think there is any difficulty about the question. Of course, I take it that there is no man who stands on the floor of the Senate who would be in favor of any law that would compel any citizen of the United States, whether identified with capital or with labor, to work unwillingly at a task. That is not the purpose here. There is no law proposed that would prevent any number of men engaged in interstate commerce from quitting their employment if it was not satisfactory to them; but that is a very different question from a conspiracy to tie up commerce for the purpose of continuing employment, and working out by force their personal desires, instead of having a determination in the courts of the land. That is the view I am trying to express.

Mr. BORAH. I think I understand the Senator's position; but when you come to effectuate the Senator's proposition and the proposition to which I have just been referring as a practical proposition in the courts you will arrive at the same destination. For instance, suppose the brotherhoods are dissatisfied with the wages which have been fixed, and that under an order issuing from headquarters they cease work; you must in some way or other, if you are going to arrive at any result at all, have some method by which to enforce this wage which you have fixed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no. Here is the result as it will work out: If there are no forceful strikes, if the hand of violence is not engaged, and men quit work and refuse a wage that a governmental tribunal has fixed as just, reasonable, and fair, there will be no doubt that other men will seek that employment. Inconvenience may arise, but the hour need not be far off when the trains will move again. The difficulty that arises from these great strikes and lockouts is that violence stands behind the quitting of the men, and no other man who desires to work is allowed to take the place of the man who quits work, and you have the same Saxon blood feud in the labor situation that you had in reference to property rights a thousand years ago. That is all I am trying to point out.

Now, as to the solution of the problem, as I said, a thousand years ago when we adopted a court of law instead of a court of force it did not work out at once. Force continued to be used for a century or two in different ways. It took time to solve the problem; but when you once establish in this Nation the principle that the Government intends to act, that the Government intends to protect the right of labor, and then see that labor keeps within the law, the question will solve itself. Men will not strike against a just wage fixed by the Government, and if they did the public sentiment of the people in the communities in which they live would make their condition so intolerable that they could not afford to do it. Public sentiment would drive them to accept the just decision of a Government tribunal. What I am contending for here is that the Congress must meet, either to-day or in the years to come, the issue that stared us in the face in 1916, and that has continued to stare us in the face every day since—that labor, in order to get what it believes to be its just rights, is going to use force if necessary, because it has said so, and that force means the destruction not alone of the business of the country but of the lives, the peace, and the happiness of the people of the United States; and I say the Congress that is passive and has not the courage or the ability or the initiative to meet this situation and establish by law a way to solve this question as against the archaic method of force is neglecting its duty.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no doubt at all as to the authority of the United States Government to punish violence, with respect to interstate commerce and anything else over which the United States Government has jurisdiction; but what I am trying to find out is whether or not you are also going further and proposing that the mere quitting of work, whether it is by one man or by a thousand, will constitute an offense which may be punished or such an act as the courts will enjoin?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator from Idaho doubt the power of Congress to make it a crime, after the Interstate Commerce Commission has fixed a wage, for two or more men to conspire together to stop the interstate commerce of the country unless that wage is increased?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator says "for two or more men to conspire."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, for two or more men to arrange or plan or agree.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Or combine.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Or agree or combine to induce a large number to quit and to stop the interstate commerce of the country unless that wage is raised. Does the Senator doubt the power of Congress to pass legislation of that kind?

Mr. BORAH. I will state it in my language, and then state my doubt. I do not know that I exactly agree with the Senator, but I am not sure that I followed his language exactly. I do doubt the power of Congress, as a matter of law, and doubt the wisdom as a matter of policy, to say to a hundred men or a thousand men: "You shall not quit work," even though they quit work with an understanding provided the quitting is because they are not satisfied with the wage. I do not think you can say to one man or a thousand men, if they are dissatisfied with the wage, that they shall nevertheless continue at their task.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. BORAH. You can say to those same men when they do quit work that they shall not by force of violence interfere with anybody else who wants to go to work; but you can not say to the individual, whether he acts by himself or is accompanied by a thousand, that he shall not himself quit work.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But does the Senator doubt the right of Congress by law to make criminal an arrangement or agreement between a large number of men to quit at the same time with a view of stopping interstate commerce?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator puts in there the proposition "with the view or intent of interfering with interstate commerce"; but suppose these men say, "We are not concerned with interstate commerce one way or another. We are simply concerned with a sufficient wage to take care of ourselves and our families. We will not work at this wage. You can go ahead with your interstate commerce if you can find other men to run the trains, but we ourselves are dissatisfied, and will quit." Can you prohibit their quitting?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; but can you not forbid them by law to make an arrangement or an agreement collectively to quit?

Mr. BORAH. I doubt it, sir, unless you put in that the additional proposition that it is done with the intent and the purpose of interfering with interstate commerce. You must have there the intent to accomplish that illegal and unlawful end; but it is not illegal and it is not unlawful for men to quit work, whether they quit singly or whether they quit collectively.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does not the Senator believe that the legislation would be fully effective if it expressed a provision that the agreement was with intent to interfere with interstate commerce, because does not the Senator know that the movement is within and has been avowedly within the purpose of interfering with interstate commerce?

Mr. BORAH. I can conceive, Mr. President, of men quitting work, both individually and collectively, without the intent to interfere with interstate commerce being the impelling or compelling motive. They would have no other object than to secure their wages. They would have no other intent than to secure their wages.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Could there not be another purpose—to stop interstate commerce and thereby force the raise of their wages?

Mr. BORAH. Of course, there could be that; and if you should demonstrate to the satisfaction of a court that they had quit with the intent of interfering with interstate commerce, they would undoubtedly come within the jurisdiction of our legislative power and of the court. But suppose the men are simply dissatisfied with their wages. They put it upon that basis, and they quit. Suppose that a thousand of them quit at the same time. Can you drive a thousand men back to work any more than you can a single individual?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Suppose they undertook from one end of the country to the other, simultaneously, to call all the men off and to stop every train in the country?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In order to force legislation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In order to force a raise of wages. Could there be any doubt about the purpose to stop interstate commerce to force up the wage?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is now speaking of a case which he makes out himself. That is to say, you have satisfied the court with evidence that these men quit not only for the purpose of securing wages but for the purpose of interfering with interstate commerce.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. For the purpose of securing the increased wage.

Mr. BORAH. Now, if you are able to satisfy the court that the men have quit work for the purpose of interfering with interstate commerce, I would concede your proposition; but that will be a difficult thing to prove, and your law will be very ineffective, because the men will say, "We are not desirous of interfering with interstate commerce. We simply say that your wages are too low. We can not live at those wages. We are going to seek work somewhere else." You can not compel them to go to work.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator one question. The Senator's argument is, I take it, that this can not be done because it can not be effectively done. I do not understand the Senator's argument to mean that he is opposing a Government tribunal to solve this problem, instead of having it solved by force, if such a tribunal could be satisfactorily worked out.

Mr. BORAH. No; I should favor a governmental tribunal to adjust the question of wages, to call the employer and the employee together, and to avoid strikes and force just as often as possible, and I agree with the Senator; but what I am saying is that I do not believe it is wise, and I do not believe we have the power to go so far as to say that if they are not satisfied with the judgment of that tribunal we shall punish them through the criminal processes of the law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say this to the Senator: I think that the Government should be a just government, it should be a fair government, but it must be a strong government, or it is no government at all; and where the Government fixes the conditions and principles under which its citizens shall live as a governmental right, then it is a very weak government if it does not use its strong arm to see that all men live within those principles and those conditions; and so that does not bother me. I would not have any law on the statute books that forced a man to work at any time, at any place, if he wanted to quit as a man; but that is a very different thing from a set of men conspiring for a purpose of their own to accomplish that purpose regardless of the mandate of the law, and I would prohibit such a conspiracy by law. But what I say is this: Aside from the penal provisions of the law, I say that the Committee on Interstate Commerce has adopted the right plan, of a resort to law instead of a resort to force. Why? I assume that any wage scale that is reflected into the lives of these men, coming from the Government, will be a just and reasonable wage. If it is not in the beginning, public sentiment will make it so in the end.

Mr. BORAH. The elections will, if public sentiment does not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely; so that there is more danger, when you establish a governmental board, of its running away on the high scale than of its being too small on the low scale. But if you establish this board, and fix the wage by the Government, and the men attempt to strike, who are they going to strike against? Against the Government. They can not strike against the railroads.

Mr. BORAH. They do not strike against anybody. They simply quit work.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If that is all they have done, that is their right; nobody can complain of that, and another man will take their place. If the wage is adequate, then a man will be found to take their place, and that will end the controversy, perhaps with some inconvenience, but ultimately end it.

Mr. BORAH. In the common, ordinary employments of life somebody else might take their place, but when you come to running a railroad, engineers and brakemen, and so forth, and the men quit to-day there is no engineer, there is no brakeman standing around who can run that train to-morrow.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that I have a great deal more confidence in the loyalty, the patriotism, and the character of the men engaged in railroading and in interstate commerce as the employees of the railroads than he seems to have, because, while they may have advocates that want to go to extremes, I believe that among the mass of these men their only desire is for justice and fair play, and sometimes they are led into strike conditions and disastrous conditions, because it is the only way they see out. But I believe that the hour that the Government establishes a fair and just tribunal where these men may have their day in court 90 per cent of them will be willing to accept the findings of the court, and that will end all controversy, and if the other 10 per cent want to quit the opportunity will be given to them and other men will take their places.

Mr. BORAH. Of course I have not said anything, nor have I inended to say anything to reflect upon the loyalty of the employees of this country.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not mean that the Senator had done so.

Mr. BORAH. I do not conceive that that is involved in the controversy. If the men are satisfied with the wage which is fixed, of course the matter is easily settled, because they will accept it and go ahead. But I have assumed that a situation might arise where the men would not be satisfied, and the question in which I was interested was to know what the Government was going to do when it found that kind of a situation at hand.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I think that is a very far-flung assumption. Some conditions in recent events have shown dissatisfaction with the wage scale, and why? Because the cost of living has risen under that wage scale and made it ineffective when it was effective in the beginning when established by the Government. The Government for 125 years fixed a wage scale for a vast number of employees. During that time men have quit because they did not think they received an adequate wage and have gone into other lines of industry or other business and other men have taken their places. We have had no organization for strikes, no organization to try to prevent the Government from functioning, and when we follow this program and establish tribunals of law, not the employer's tribunal that is interested in the earnings of the company, not the tribunal of labor that would be holding the balance in the scale itself, but a disinterested tribunal that stands in the place of a court and administers exact and even-handed justice, I say the great body of the American people will always be ready to accept the decision of that court cheerfully and abide by its decision, and if they do not it will not be a question of a conspiracy to interfere with the transportation of commerce, but it will be a question of each individual trying to find better employment for himself.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

NATIONAL PROHIBITION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 6810.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages, and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

Mr. STERLING. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill be read for action on the committee amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota asks that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. STERLING. I now yield to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

RELATION OF LABOR AND CAPITAL.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not desire, in view of the fact that the unfinished business is before the Senate, to continue the discussion further than to say that of course I have no objection to the establishment of tribunals which will have for their object and purpose the adjustment of wages, and I am going to hope with the Senator from Alabama that those wages will always be so adjusted and fixed that they will be satisfactory to both the employees and the employers.

But I have been interested in the proposition that in case conditions should continue as they have existed in this country in past years and there should be dissatisfaction upon the part of the employees, as to whether or not the Government is going to undertake to go further and say that men through some process shall be compelled to remain at their work under some form of compulsory arbitration or arbitrary action, direct or indirect. I do not think we have any such power, and I do not think we should undertake to use any such power.

Now, Mr. President, just a word further. So long as the labor question remains a wage question we shall always have difficulty, and there will always be force entering into the settlement of these propositions. If it is simply a question of fixing wages and the laboring men of the country are excluded from participating in the business or cooperating in the building up of business and enjoying its prosperity in case it is prosperous, we shall always have force. If we are to settle the labor question, we must get back of a tribunal and far back of the question of adjusting wages, and determine to what extent and how far we can go in bringing labor and capital together by giving labor an actual interest in the business in which it may be engaged.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from South Dakota if he will temporarily yield to me?

Mr. STERLING. I would not like to yield for any prolonged discussion. I desire to proceed with the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know how long it will be prolonged by somebody else, but it will not be very long prolonged by me. I wish to make a few remarks apropos of what has just been said.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will occupy but a few minutes, I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, Shakespeare is authority for the statement that "there are dogs and dogs." There are also strikes and strikes. When a lot of men strike because their living conditions are intolerable or because their wages are not sufficient, that is a thing with which we are approvingly acquainted, and with which we must continue to be acquainted in the future as long as the conditions arise which bring the strike into operation, but we are beginning lately to learn a European habit, and it is chiefly against that European habit that the provisions of the bill reported from the subcommittee of the Interstate Commerce Committee would operate.

Men are no longer striking simply because they are not getting enough to give them a good standard of living, a wage sufficient. They are striking out of "sympathy" with one another, making "sympathetic strikes" to enforce general propositions that have nothing to do with their individual conditions, and they are also beginning to threaten to strike in order to force the Congress of the United States to do things that they are afraid the Congress does not want to do. Quitting work is one thing and all right. Attempting to coerce the Congress and the public by closing up the avenues of consumption, and interstate commerce, and cynically suggesting "starvation or surrender" is another thing and all wrong and intolerable. In other words, we are faced with the situation of a class undertaking to usurp the place of the elected representatives of the people who were sent here by the people to legislation for the people.

There was the other day a threatened strike unless Congress adopted the Plumb plan in connection with the running of the railroads. I also saw, which was still more ominous, a publication of a resolution passed by some "Private Soldiers' Legion," which I am sure did not really represent one soldier in a thousand—unanimously adopted "resolutions" indorsing the Plumb plan and demanding that the Congress should adopt it—"a union of working men and soldiers," literally an imitation of a Russian soviet repeated in America.

Mr. President, it goes without saying that no man can be held to work in America unless he wants to work. The thirteenth amendment settles that question forever. No man can be held to "involuntary servitude except for crime." No court would uphold any act that undertook to do that, a constitutional menace. But the public has its rights, and I for one am tired of these combined insolences of capital on the one hand, threatening the public now and then and menace to its life and its happiness with lockouts, and the equally insolent combinations and instruments of labor upon the other side, threatening the same thing with strikes, neither considering the great public—res publica—constituting nine-tenths of the people.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] says that provided a man does not announce it as his purpose that he is going to interfere with interstate commerce, he has a right to quit, no matter what the conditions are; in other words, he can just say, "My purpose is so and so, and darn the consequences. I choose to ignore the consequences." Everybody knows as a matter of practical common sense that if the railroad labor of this country struck in order to enforce legislation it would starve half the babies in New York and Chicago, but the response would be made, "I have nothing to do with that; that is a mere consequence; it is an incident. I am just seeking a higher wage." That even might be right if it were true, but not when we know that that is not what is being sought. When we know that men are merely using this cloak of a higher wage as a means whereby to enforce an end, and that that end is to legislate for these United States—to usurp the place of the elected representatives of the people, to coerce legislation—a profoundly startling theory—startling in America at any rate, though no longer startling in Russia—that one has a right to use any power or might that one has to overturn the institutions of the country.

We happen to have a Government under which it has been decreed, at any rate, whether we can make good or not, that the Senate, elected by the States, and the House of Representatives, elected by the people, shall legislate, and we have retained to the public the right to replace them with other men if they do not legislate according to the will of the people.

Now, I say that to come forward at any time and propose a law to the people of the United States and then to say, covertly or openly, or at any rate to say really, no matter how, "If you do not pass this or that law we are going to starve the babies in Chicago and New York and Baltimore and New Orleans; we are going to cut off interstate commerce; we are going to put an end to communication and transportation," is treason against the people and the institutions of these United States—aye, worst of all, treason against humanity. I say that when this committee brings in a proposition to make a commission which shall represent not capital alone, not labor alone in any given industry, but all the capital and all the labor of the United States, spelling the people of the United States, spelling "the public," this much-despised essential thing between these constantly antagonized forces, and when it invites them both to come forward to that sort of a tribunal and lay their claims before it, we are undertaking an imitation of the league of nations to keep the peace of the world, to wit, a league of industries and classes to keep industrial peace in the world. What could be more sacred? What could better represent what St. John called "reasoning together in brotherly love"?

I say there can be no fair objection to it. A man has a right to quit work, yes, with a reason—bad reason, good reason, no reason—but he has not a right, by combination or class conspiracy, to tie up the industries, the mails, the commerce, the bread and the meat, and the baby food of the United States in order to reach some ulterior legislative purpose.

You might just as well face it and not camouflage it. You have got to fight this thing some day, and, as far as I am concerned, I would rather fight it while I am alive than to leave my children to fight it when I am dead. God knows I have always stood with "the under dog" since I was a child. Talking in the cloakroom the other day somebody spoke about having no discrimination on the ground that a man was poor against the man who was rich. I said, "I will make those discriminations every day; I make them in private life, and I will make them in my public life, whether in income-tax laws or elsewhere, because equal and fair justice requires that you shall make a greater allowance for the man who needs than for the man who has enough." But that is a different proposition from having somebody usurp the governmental functions of the people of the United States. If any man is dissatisfied with the acts of the representatives of the people here in Washington or in the States, he can go before the people, not only his class, whether capitalistic or proletariat, but before all the people, and reargue his case.

Mr. President, I say that the school-teacher, the preacher, the lawyer, the doctor, the country blacksmith, the country carpenter, the one-mule farmer, all these people which, taken together, constitute some 80 or 90 per cent of the population of the United States, though unorganized and unthreatening, have some rights, and that combined capital and combined labor have no right to "grind them to pieces between the upper and the nether millstones."

I, moreover, do not believe that the labor of the United States wants to do it where it is fairly represented. I believe that certain extreme men, getting temporarily in control by accidental position, have lately misvoiced the sentiments of labor in the threats to which I have referred. I said threats. I mean threats. They were threats; they were meant to be taken as threats; and they meant that you and I should cow like an humble dog in our place in the Senate and House of the United States, whine like a whipped cur and say, "Of course, if you demand it I shall forget that my fathers and my forefathers were gentlemen and independent thinkers, and I will do what you say."

If anybody tries that game in America, he is going to make a mistake. We have got something that Russia did not have. We have a middle class of self-respecting citizens who upon occasion and due provocation will fight and can fight and know how to fight. They are not to be bullied and are not to be cowed, whether by the trusts upon the one extreme or by socialistic Russian sovietic misrepresentatives of labor upon the other. Any man has a right to quit work. I have a right to quit this seat right now and go to the cloakroom and probably would be performing more of a public service if I did. I could not be made to come back and sit here either. But everybody knows that what we are hitting at here is not to prevent a man from quitting work for a real good reason, or for no reason at all, even just simply because he feels like quitting—but we are aiming at preventing gigantic conspiracies for the purpose of coercing legislation and usurping the place of the duly elected representatives of the people, the temporary rulers of this country—temporary because they can be replaced at the next election.

The difference between a good representative and a bad representative is that a bad representative wants to stay here forever and is willing to pay any price to stay, while the good representative wants to do what is right and trusts that the people will have sense enough to understand it if he has sense enough to explain it, and, if they do not, then is willing to suffer the fortunes of war and go by the board. If he is a good sport, he goes smilingly, but at any rate he is not going to be a craven and a coward and a poltroon. I will do like old Nick Cox did once when some fellow came to him and told him he "had to do" a thing that he already wanted to do. He said, "If you had let me alone, I believe I would have done it; but if you come and threaten me, maybe I will and maybe I won't, but I will not do it now." That is my feeling about it. Whenever any man comes to me and tells me I have to do a thing, my reply is, "Well, maybe I will, maybe I will not; but I will not do it now, after you have told me that I have to do it."

Then we hear talk about "a general strike." That is a totally different thing from a legitimate strike. I am working, let us say, in a machine shop; I am not getting enough and I want to strike. Here is a man working in some other business who acknowledges that he is getting a very high wage and is living under very good conditions; and, yet, making an idol and fetish of the class feeling, the man in the other place and men in 20 other places, too, all otherwise satisfied with their conditions, say that they are going to strike to help the first one out, regardless of the public.

That is not all, Mr. President. It is coming to this: The policemen, the very guardians of the law, the conservators of the peace, whose business it is to put down riot and outlawry wherever they present themselves, are forming gigantic unions for the purpose of striking against the law and joining other unions, so as to satisfy the members of these other unions that there will be no police interference if they violate the law.

That is not all. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] a few minutes ago said that the Government has on its rolls three-fourths of a million of public employees of one sort or another, and when any one of them is dissatisfid with his wage he can quit and somebody else will come in and take his place. That is the universal observation and the experience of all of us; our constituents are haunting us every day to get these places; and yet we are told to-day that we are to have unions among the employees of the Government to strike against the Government, with 100,000, aye, with 750,000 men and women outside of Government employment seeking that employment all the time if they can get it. Quit work! Of course, anybody has a right to quit work. Any 20 men have the right to quit work, any 100 men or any 10,000 men have the right to quit work; but when they conspire together to use their right to quit work as a means to the accomplishment of an unjust and treasonable end it is a different proposition, whether the end be to stop the functioning of the Government or whether the end be to stop interstate commerce or whether the incident to the end be the starvation of the babies who can not get their daily supply of milk in the great cities.

I do not believe for one minute that that sort of spirit is going to spread in America. I do not believe it for two reasons: First, because I do not believe that 3 per cent of the laboring men in this country would intelligently, wittingly, and knowingly tolerate it; and, second, because I do not believe that the other 97 per cent of the people of these United States are cravens and cowards enough to endure it, even if organized labor wanted to inflict it upon the country. Nor do I believe that organized labor does want it, and I know something about organized labor. I know it in a better way than you people in the North do, because I have never been interested in it politically; it does not cut any figure with me in that sense one way or the other. So I have had them talk to me fully. I stood in the other House for 20 years bearing their standard and fighting their battles, and every leader of them will say so to-day who was then a leader and knew anything about it.

I believe with all my soul that this world has got to come to some sort of new arrangement in industrial affairs, I do not know what. I have been for a long time of the opinion that the present arrangement could not be satisfactory for the advancement of civilization throughout the ages. I am willing to cooperate in every way in the world—shorter hours, larger pay whenever just and right; and whenever there is any doubt about it, I am willing to solve it in favor of labor.

But, Mr. President, I want to sound the alarm to-day. I want to sound it in the name of the middle class—the so-called despised "bourgeoise," as the half-educated, half-insane Russian fools delight to call it. I want to sound it in the name of the traditions of the American Republic and of its ideals; I want to sound it in the name of the courage of our forefathers. That alarm is this: That there is real danger that a lot of people may be misled by the passivity of the indifferent public into the idea that they can by mere threats of sympathetic or general strikes, with legislative purposes in view, whip, scourge, and control the representatives of the people. There are some of them that they can whip, scourge, and control—miserable cowards—and whose places have always been filled here. Anybody could bulldoze them any day in the morning who would make them think that they would lose 300 votes; but they do not represent the House, they do not represent the Senate, and, above all things, they do not represent the great middle class of America, who elect the Members of the House and the Senate.

It is to the middle class that civilization's progress has been due. The two other extremes have always been sources of danger to progress. Anglo-Saxony and its civilization here and in Great Britain, Canada, New Zealand, South Africa, and Australia owes its being in the very forefront "of the files of time" to the fact that its middle class, in one way or another, has always governed it and that they have stood like an impartial arbiter between the two extremes; one seeking profit at the price of blood, if necessary, and the other seeking class rule at the price of blood, if necessary.

Mr. President, it is not without reason that the history of England and the history of the United States display the fact that the main rulers, sages, thinkers, governors, and popular favorites of those countries have been country gentlemen, beginning with George Washington and coming all the way down, and where they have not been country gentlemen some other sort of gentlemen; at any rate, members of the middle classes, and always men who wanted the United States and England to be governed in the interest of the public and not in the interest of any particular class. Even in Great Britain the time passed 50 years ago when a class could govern the country. That time never existed in the United States, whether in colonial days or after we attained our independence. We have never tolerated it in the past, we shall not tolerate it now, and we shall not tolerate it in the future.

I said I wanted to sound an alarm. Let it be rather a warning. Oh, somebody may say, "Well, what right have you to speak for them? You are assuming it." Yes; I am. I am assuming it because I am one of them and because I know them historically and at this time; and I shall continue to assume the spokesmanship of the great unselfish, arbitral middle class of this civilized country. The very difference between a civilized country and one that is yet semibarbarous is that the semibarbarous country has no middle class which is capable of self-assertion and the civilized country has. Self-asserting means fighting if absolutely necessary and unavoidable in order to preserve liberty, limb, life, or even property from violence, theft, robbery, or confiscation. But in this country, thank God, even school-teachers, although they are paid less than janitors, even preachers, paid less than porters, even lawyers, even doctors, even the little retail merchants in the cities, even the clerks who sell goods have a voice in this Government and, thank God, furthermore, they are men, as they have proven upon the battle field and will if necessary prove in the clash of civil life.

Mr. President, there is one thing the Senator from Idaho said which I desire to notice. He said that it is true "when any other class of people go out on a strike and quit work you can go get other men to take their places, but you can not do that in the case of railroad labor." That, Mr. President, is just where these labor agitators are making their mistake. Thirty years ago that was true; but that is not true now. There is hardly a farmer's lad who does not know how to run an engine. It may have been a traction engine that he practiced on, but the same principle applies to the locomotive. There is hardly a little gamin de pavé in any of our cities that does not know how to run an automobile of some sort. The old tyranny that the expert laborer held over the world has gone glimmering.

All that this committee provision would really accomplish is this: It would provide a fair, impartial arbitral tribunal to settle industrial disputes peaceably rather than by force. It would call upon both sides of the dispute to submit to the result of the arbitration, and it would call upon them in the name of the public and in the name of civilization and human progress and human love, as against human hate and human retrogression. The man who is not willing to leave a quarrel between himself and another man to a fair arbitration is seeking some selfish, illegitimate purpose. I will leave any quarrel between you and me to fair arbitration, unless it has ceased to be a quarrel and has become an insult to my wife, my family, or my country. No man can object to any mere matter of money being settled by arbitration.

And what have the workingmen got to fear from it? Anything? Ah, the other fellow has got something to fear perhaps, but they have not. Can you imagine a public tribunal created by a political administration that will not solve every doubt between capital and labor in favor of labor? Honestly, really, can you imagine that sort of a tribunal existing? Where there is no doubt it might decide in favor of capital or in favor of the employer, but where there is the slightest doubt they would always decide in favor of the employee. What has Congress itself done in the last several years? What have the great boards done that have been settling all such questions? So far as I now remember, every single dispute decided by a public functionary except one has been decided in favor of the contention of labor.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Am I not right about it? Does the Senator from Colorado remember of but one contention that was decided against labor?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not even remember that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I remember the last one a few days ago, decided bravely by Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. THOMAS. What I wanted to suggest to the Senator was that he also remembers that in the passage of the Clayton bill Congress exempted agriculturists and laborers or workmen and wage earners from the operation of that law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I remember that, and I voted for it.

Mr. THOMAS. I did not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And I voted for it at the time under the idea that I was helping the under dog, who needed help and who otherwise would not get it; but things had not assumed, then, the position they have now assumed of having men threaten us that unless we enacted certain legislation they would enact it by force of nonintercourse and starvation of women and babies. I was right then under the conditions then confronting me, and I am right now under the conditions now confronting me.

As I was saying, I do not remember but one case—and that took the courage of a statesman—where a public body called upon to decide questions between employer and employee did not decide in favor of the employee, and that was here the other day when President Wilson made his address to Congress and told the railway employees substantially that they could not have in detail what they demanded with threats. They were so perfectly astonished at the idea that a man who was supposed to be a politician, because he was an officeholder, told them they could not have what they wanted that they went into a state of paralysis for two or three days. They will not be hurt by a public arbitral tribunal. If anybody will be hurt it will be the other side, and the other side can better afford to be hurt than they can, and, therefore, I am in favor of the tribunal.

Mr. President, when Jefferson Davis was living, slave owner though he was, he made it a rule upon his plantation that no slave should ever be punished unless he was convicted by a jury of six of his fellow slaves. In a condition of slavery he carried through that rule of justice, and a better-managed plantation never existed than Brier Field under the two brothers—old Joe Davis and Jeff Davis. I mention that because it is rather an extreme illustration of the fact that if you obey the old Latin maxim, "fiat justitia, ruat coelum"—"do justice though the heavens fall"—then everything else will come out right. Nothing can come out wrong so long as men seek to be just to one another. If all men sought justice we would have the millennium upon earth in less than a week after men found out that that was the rule. All of our misfortunes and unhappiness grow out of our sins or our follies or our greed or our injustices. What is the goal humanity is seeking in this midway light of semicivilization toward a final enlightenment? What is it? Why, Mr. President, it is simply to substitute justice for force. And what is the voice of justice? Common sense and impartiality. Some voice somewhere that shall at least have common sense and that shall also have impartiality with just a little bit of sympathy with the under dog—always that sympathy—because that is necessary to complete justice, as God's mercy does, and to fulfill human love.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, anxious as I have been to bring this bill on for consideration by the Senate, I do not think I regret for a moment having yielded to the Senator from Mississippi, nor do I think the Senate regrets that I yielded for the purpose of hearing the splendid, true American speech that he has just made.

Mr. President, this bill has three different subjects, covered by what are known as Titles I, II, and III of the bill.

Title I deals with the enforcement of war prohibition, as it is called.

Title II deals with the enforcement of prohibition under the constitutional amendment.

Title III relates to industrial alcohol.

It perhaps may be of interest just to sketch briefly the legislation and the proceedings, administrative and otherwise, leading up to the fact which we term the war prohibition act.

As is known by all, there was first the food-control act of August 10, 1917. In that act there was an authorization to the President to regulate or prohibit the production of malt or vinous liquors. In pursuance of that act there were several proclamations by the President, one of December 8, 1917, forbidding the production of malt liquor, except ale and porter, containing more than 2.75 per cent of alcohol. Then a proclamation of September 16, 1918, prohibiting after December 1 of that year the production of malt liquors for beverage purposes, including "near beer," whether or not such liquors contained alcohol. Third, a proclamation by the President of January 30, 1919, permitting the use of grain in the manufacture of beverages which are not intoxicating; then another proclamation of March 4, 1919, which prohibited the production only of intoxicating malt liquors for beverage purposes. Before that, however, there was the act of November 21, 1918, passed and approved 10 days before the signing of the armistice; and I want to call attention to the provisions of that act, because they are material in the consideration of Title I of the pending bill.

The act of November 21, 1918, provides as follows:

> After May 1, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war, and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States, no grains, cereals, fruit, or other food product shall be used in the manufacture or production of beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor for beverage purposes. After June 30, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States, no beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor shall be sold for beverage purposes except for export.

The following is the penalty provided for the violation of the law:

> Any person who violates any of the foregoing provisions shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding one year or by fine not exceeding $1,000, or by both such imprisonment and fine.

Mr. President, this is material in view of the definition contained in the bill for wine and beer, the sale of which is prohibited by Title I. The bill provides as follows:

> The words "beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors" in the war prohibition act shall be hereafter construed to mean any such beverages which contain one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume.

As I recall, the proclamation of the President prohibiting the manufacture of beer containing more than 2.75 per cent of alcohol was interpreted to mean 2.75 per cent of alcohol not by volume but by weight. I think it has been ascertained that beer containing 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight means about 3½ per cent of alcohol by volume.

The law of 1918 has been decided to be constitutional by many courts—first, by the District Court for the Southern District of New York, before which cases were brought against brewing companies. It has been so decided by each of the judges of the circuit court of appeals to whom the cases before the district judge were taken on writs of error, but in their decisions reference is made to the quantity of alcohol to be found in beer, and I want to call attention, first, to two or three statements made by Judge Hand. He says:

In respect to the question of constitutionality the only matter before me is whether prohibition of the liquor traffic, including suspension of all brewing, bears any substantial relation to the conduct of the war, either in contributing to the support of armies or to their safe or efficient demobilization. With the wisdom of the measure I have nothing to do. Everything that could be argued in this case was present even to a stronger degree in the case of Purity Extract Co. v. Lynch, supra.

A case that he had theretofore cited in the course of his decision, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States and found in Two hundred and twenty-sixth United States Statutes, where it was held that the sale of a malt liquor containing no alcohol whatever might be prohibited by the terms of an act aimed at the prevention of the traffic in intoxicating liquors, and that the act was constitutional.

Further, he says:

It is widely believed that prohibition makes for health, strength, and efficiency, physical, mental, and moral. It is also widely believed that prohibition of all malt liquors, regardless of alcoholic content, is necessary for the adequate enforcement of a prohibition law and for suppressing various evils that accompany the saloon. Whether or not this idea is a mistaken one, it would be going much too far to say that there was no substantial or rational relation between these means and the conduct of the war or the return and demobilization of our armies. I can have no doubt that the construction of the act contended for by the Government, if in fact correct, would be within the power of Congress.

The case thus decided by Judge Hand in the district court, from whose opinion I have read this extract, went to the circuit court of appeals, and I call attention to some expressions bearing upon this point by one of the judges of the circuit court of appeals. It may be said that each of the three judges of the circuit court of appeals sustained the constitutionality of the act of September 21, 1918.

Judge Rogers says in his opinion:

The acts of Congress now under consideration contain no definition of what per cent of alcohol makes liquor intoxicating. In a number of the States the statutes prohibit the use of all "alcoholic" liquors for beverage purposes. In a large number the standard of intoxicating beverage is fixed at one-half of 1 per cent.

My recollection may be at fault, but I think there are now about 14 States that have passed prohibition laws making one-half of 1 per cent of alcoholic content the standard. Any liquor exceeding that is to be deemed an intoxicating liquor within the meaning of the act.

And for nearly 20 years the Bureau of Internal Revenue has treated beer containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol as a malt liquor, and the brewers of the country have acquiesced in this definition of beer. And it is reasonable to expect that the present Congress in enacting a prohibition enforcement bill under the eighteenth amendment will define what is intoxicating liquor, and, if it does, it may fix the standard at one-half of 1 per cent in accordance with the rule established for so many years in the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

So what I say and what I quote here refers not only to war prohibition, covered by Title I of the bill, but it refers also to prohibition under the constitutional amendment.

The court continues:

But in the absence of some definitive legislation the meaning of the term "intoxicating liquors" must be a question of fact and not of law, and the court can not undertake to say, as matter of law, that liquor which contains 2.75 per cent of alcohol by weight is not intoxicating. And neither the opinion of my associates nor the opinion of the district judge contains anything to the contrary—

And so forth.

Mr. President, we have in the law of 1918 simply an act prohibiting, as it were, the sale of intoxicating beverages. That is all—no definition whatever as to what constitutes an intoxicating beverage; no words in the act construing the term "liquor" or the term "intoxicating liquor." So that the law has been rendered most difficult of enforcement by reason of the fact that there is no definition of intoxicating liquor.

It has been contended, of course, that beer containing 2.75 per cent of alcohol is not intoxicating; but, Mr. President, the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee, having under consideration this bill, had before it the sworn affidavits of some of the most eminent physicians in the United States, among them Dr. Kelley, of Johns Hopkins University, of Baltimore, to the effect that beer containing 2.75 per cent or even a much less per cent of alcohol was intoxicating; and Dr. Kelley further states that the only safe course is to provide that beer or any liquid containing to exceed one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol should not be permitted to be sold as a beverage.

So we have defined these terms in order that we might have an enforceable law on the statute books. Being enforceable and being enforced it will have the effect of creating a wholesome respect for law as such. The inevitable result of a law standing on the statute books unenforced is, of course, to create disregard for and disrespect of the law.

The law of November 21, 1918, was lacking in other respects. In addition to not having provided a definition for intoxicating liquor there were no means for its enforcement except by criminal action in all instances. I think it has been found by experience throughout the several States that the remedy by injunction is one of the most effectual methods of enforcing any prohibition law. I think it has been adopted really in nearly all the States of the Union, and so in this bill under title 1 we have provided one additional remedy, the remedy by injunction, authorizing the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and his agents and assistants to report violations of the law to the district attorney of the district in which the violation occurs, and if it is found that there is a manufacture or sale of beer, which by the act is declared to be a common and a public nuisance, if it is found that such nuisance exists, then the prosecuting attorney is authorized to proceed by injunction to enjoin and abate that nuisance.

As to title 2, covering war-time prohibition, we have practically reenacted, or restated rather, the provisions in regard to the authority and power of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the same as in title 1 of the bill. We have also given in that title the remedy by injunction and then we have provided the distinctive prohibitions against the manufacture, the sale, the bartering away, the furnishing, the receiving, the possession of intoxicating liquors as defined in the act.

The enforcement is aided by a system of permits to be issued by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who has the general supervision of the enforcement of the law, permits for the manufacture for the purpose allowed by the bill, permits for the sale and purchase for the purpose allowed by the bill, permits for the physician to prescribe as allowed by the bill; no permit being required of the person who purchases on a prescription given by a physician.

I think perhaps it may be said of the work of the Committee on the Judiciary that we have in a sense liberalized the bill as passed by the House. We have stricken out what the committee regarded as some unduly unnecessary restrictive provisions. We have meanwhile, too, preserved, as we think, all the essential features of the bill as passed by the House. I call attention briefly to a few of the amendments suggested by the committee—some of the more important, at least from the quantitative standpoint—from the standpoint of the number of lines or words stricken out.

One important amendment is the striking out of one entire section, called section 7½, relating to the place where a physician must keep his office, and so forth; and, if I may, I will call attention a little more specifically to that section:

SEC. 7½. No physician authorized to issue any prescription for liquor under this act shall have or shall keep his office, or shall examine any person with the purpose in view of prescribing liquor or issue any such prescription, in any drug store, pharmacy, or place where liquor is sold under authority of this act, or in any room, apartment, booth, or place immediately connected therewith, except that such physician shall have had his office in such drug store, pharmacy, or place for a period of at least one year immediately preceding and prior to the going into effect of this act.

It will be seen, I think, on a reading of the section that it is considerably involved, that it seems to be somewhat contradictory in its terms. Then we thought that, in addition to that, it was unnecessarily restrictive and that no real useful purpose would be accomplished by it.

Another proposed amendment strikes out in section 10 the requirement that a record of the manufacture, purchase for sale, sale, or transport of any liquor shall be kept, showing the facts, and so forth. This is related to another section, which requires the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to keep a record in his office of all the statements, the records of permits issued, the records made by a carrier, the records made by a manufacturer, the records made by a seller of the liquor, the records made by a pharmacist. It was proposed by the House that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall keep a copy of these in his office. We thought there was no necessity for that. These records must be kept and the bill so provides, but we further provide that they shall, any or all of them, be open to inspection at any reasonable hour.

We provide further that certified copies of any records required to be kept under the law shall be admissible in evidence in any cases where they are appropriate or needed.

Another provision stricken out is in section 13, requiring an affidavit that the liquor obtained of a carrier shall not be used in violation of the law. A person seeking to get liquor of a carrier who is ready to deliver it must first have with him a verified permit to purchase, to get the liquor. We thought it was an unnecessary burden to require of the person getting the liquor to have in addition to his verified permit, which had been issued by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, an affidavit showing that the liquor would not be used in violation of law. He could only get it in the first instance under a permit which would allow him to use it in accordance with the law.

We have stricken out a part of section 17 in regard to advertising as contained in the bill as passed by the House. It was a very long section and there were a great many words employed in defining and describing the different kinds of advertising. The committee thought that unnecessary and that we could use a few comprehensive words at the beginning of the section by way of amendment that would include every possible kind of advertising. This is what we said:

SEC. 17. It shall be unlawful to advertise anywhere, or by any means or method, liquor, or the manufacture, sale, keeping for sale or furnishing of the same, or where, how, from whom, or at what price the same may be obtained.

Another amendment is in section 19. Let me call attention to that section. It reads as passed by the House:

SEC. 19. That it shall be unlawful for any person knowingly to permit his employee to procure liquor for or give direction or information by which liquor can be unlawfully secured by any person, and no person shall solicit or receive from any person any order for liquor or give any information of how liquor may be obtained in violation of this act.

Your committee considered that section quite fully and thoroughly and thought that the first part of the section prohibiting any person from knowingly permitting his employee to procure liquor for or give direction, information, and so forth, might lead to a system of personal surveillance and espionage that would be extremely annoying without accomplishing any corresponding good.

We leave in the latter part of the section, which provides that—

No person shall solicit or receive from any person any order for liquor or give any information of how liquor may be obtained in violation of this act.

We strike out section 20 relating to drinking liquors on trains, boats, and other public vehicles. Why did we do that? The prohibition amendment to the Constitution, of course, authorizes legislation prohibiting the manufacture and sale, the transportation, the importation or exportation of intoxicating liquors. But section 20 provided—

That it shall be unlawful for any person to drink liquor as a beverage in or to be intoxicated upon any car, train, automobile, boat, or other public conveyance. Any conductor or person in charge of any car, train, automobile, boat, or other public conveyance may upon view of the offense arrest any person therefor who is being conveyed in or by such car, train, automobile, boat, or other public conveyance, and turn him over to the proper officer, to be proceeded against according to law.

Mr. President, the committee doubted whether an authority to prohibit the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquor would confer upon us the power to prohibit a person from drinking liquor on a train or from being intoxicated upon a train. Furthermore, even if we had such authority, we thought that it was a matter that would be taken care of to great extent by State legislation. I am not certain as to that, but I think any conductor of a railroad train has himself authority to arrest any disorderly person upon the train. If there is any disorder arising out of drinking upon a train, he would have authority to arrest the offender and turn him over to the authorities at the nearest town reached by the train.

We strike out section 23½, having reference to having in possession, traveling to solicit orders, and so forth, guilty of a nuisance, and providing the remedy by injunction in such case. That is, we strike out all of section 23½ which relates to that. We strike that out for the reason that each and every offense named in section 23½ is an offense subject to criminal prosecution. We believed that the provisions of the bill authorizing prosecution for the manufacture, for the sale, for having in possession, for furnishing to anyone whatever, would be ample, and that it would be of no great benefit in the enforcement of the prohibition law to add a provision enjoining the particular individual from doing the acts named. Of course if he maintains a business of manufacturing, maintains a business of selling, he is subject to other provisions of the bill which allow an injunction against maintaining the business of manufacturing or of selling.

We have stricken out a good part of section 23, as follows:

That when it appears in any criminal proceeding that any common nuisance as defined herein exists it shall be the duty of any officer authorized to enforce this act to proceed promptly in a court of equity to abate such nuisance, and the final conviction of the defendant in such trial shall be conclusive evidence against such defendant of the facts adjudged therein as to the existence of the nuisance.

The objection the committee had to that provision is simply that the proceeding by injunction is made mandatory under the terms of the bill. We believe in any given case upon a conviction of a person charged with the unlawful use of intoxicating liquor it should be left discretionary with the officials to proceed by injunction or not as they choose.

It might be very palpable in any given case that criminal prosecution was sufficient, that the individual forever afterwards would be deterred from violating the law and there would be no need of an injunction, and yet the bill says that proceeding by injunction must be begun. Furthermore, I think it ought to be left discretionary in such a case, because of the possible situation in regard to property involved and other business connected with the property, and it should not be made the duty of the officer in each and every case to institute proceeding by injunction.

I think that covers for the most part the principal amendments that have been made by the committee.

I am satisfied, Mr. President, after a careful study of the bill, and after working over it along with faithful members of the subcommittee day after day, that we have presented to the Senate a reasonable bill, one that will be in pursuance of the mandate of the people of the country in their ratification of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution.

The last title of the bill relating to industrial alcohol, it may be said, speaks for itself. The idea is to conserve alcohol for industrial purposes, to encourage the manufacture of it for such purposes under proper restrictions, and to prevent the diversion of the alcohol which may be used for such purposes to uses for intoxicating beverage purposes.

I think that is all I care to say, and I will ask that the bill be now read for action on the committee amendments.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the very comprehensive explanation of the measure by the Senator from South Dakota leaves little to be said. On the whole the bill represents the best that can be obtained in this body at this time, and I trust that it may be speedily passed.

I take this opportunity to congratulate the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], and the other members of the Judiciary Committee who have been active in the promotion of this bill. The mind of the American people is made up, so far as prohibition is concerned, and I think it will be universally conceded that they are entitled to an effective and reasonable enforcement law.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from South Dakota one or two questions. I have had but little opportunity to examine the bill since I returned to the city. I have been absent a few days.

I notice that physicians are permitted to prescribe as much as a pint to one person in 10 days.

Mr. STERLING. That is the provision in the bill, as I recall it, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator think it is quite wise to limit it to a pint? Does he not think there may be cases in which a physician would feel warranted in prescribing bona fide a larger amount within that period of time?

Mr. STERLING. Opinions may differ in regard to that, I will say to the Senator from North Carolina. The committee discussed that to some extent. That is the provision as it appeared in the bill as it passed the House, and after some discussion we concluded to leave it as it was.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am asking the opinion of the Senator about it.

Mr. STERLING. It is confined to spirituous liquors—1 pint of spirituous liquors.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand.

Mr. STERLING. It does not limit the sale of other liquors.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is confined to liquors that are used or could be used as a beverage prescribed by a physician to a sick patient, and he is not permitted to prescribe, whatever may be the requirements of the patient, more than 1 pint in 10 days. I asked the Senator if he did not think it rather unwise to limit it to such a small quantity?

Mr. STERLING. As I said to the Senator, opinions may differ in that regard. I do not think it is too small a quantity, and I have in mind the testimony of medical experts along these lines. I have in mind, I will say to the Senator from North Carolina, the opinion of the American Medical Association as expressed at two annual conventions recently held. I do not know whether at the last convention they gave expression to any view or not, but they did at two annual conventions before that, in which, of course, they expressed a belief in the prohibition of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, and then they proceeded to say that it is not much used for medicinal purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. But where it is used purely for medicinal purposes you propose to safeguard the law by not permitting anybody to prescribe it except a physician and not permitting the physician to prescribe it except after he has made an examination of the person.

Mr. STERLING. No; we do not provide for that; we struck that out. As the bill originally read it required personal examination by the physician of the person seeking the prescription for liquor, but we struck that out.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator thinks that the quantity is not too small, I rather disagree with him about that; I think in the average case probably it would be sufficient, but where a patient is thought by a physician really to require a stimulant of this character it seems to me that the amount allowed would be very meager for the length of time stipulated in the bill. I am merely bringing the matter to the attention of the Senator with a view to suggesting that there might be some additional clause by virtue of which under extraordinary circumstances a physician might increase the quantity. I am merely making the suggestion; I am not proposing to make any motion myself with regard to the matter.

Mr. STERLING. I thank the Senator for his suggestion. I will have it under consideration, and I hope other Senators will.

Mr. SIMMONS. There is a question, though, concerning which I should like very much to have some information. It is a custom, as I understand, in all of the hospitals of the country to keep on hand a certain limited supply of spirituous liquors for use in the treatment of patients. Of course there are physicians in all hospitals, and the physician of a hospital can prescribe liquor. The question I want to ask the Senator is whether under the bill if the physician of a hospital prescribes liquor for medicinal purposes can that hospital fill the prescription or must the prescription be filled by an outside pharmacist? I am myself inclined to think, from reading the bill rather hurriedly, I admit, that only a pharmacist could fill the prescription.

Mr. STERLING. I think the Senator is right in that construction, and I think that that was the view of the committee, that it is left to the pharmacist and to the pharmacist alone to fill such a prescription.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does not the Senator think that probably that is a little too restrictive? Does he not think that it might be proper, and without any possible injury resulting so far as the application of this law is concerned, in a case of that sort that the institution where the patient is being treated might be permitted, under the supervision of the physicians of that institution, to fill the prescription out of their own supplies?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I think all such hospitals, or the large hospitals at any rate, invariably have a pharmacist. Of necessity, they must have one in the administration of drugs. They deal in all kinds of medicines and remedies, and they do not want to go to an outside drug store. They keep a supply of drugs on hand and, as a rule, they have a trained pharmacist in the institution. So I think this provision would work no difficulty. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] can readily see, if he stops to reflect, how inconvenient it would be in a hospital of any size in every case to have to send out to get a prescription for medicine filled.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the very point I have in mind.

Mr. NELSON. And for that reason such institutions have a competent man to fill prescriptions right there in the institution.

Mr. SIMMONS. I would agree that the Senator was probably right about that as to the large hospitals of the country. For instance, I suppose Johns Hopkins University Hospital has a pharmacist; I suppose, probably, the Mayo brothers, at their great institution, have a pharmacist; but there are in this country, in the small towns, a great many hospitals; in fact, nearly every town of two or three thousand people now maintains a hospital of some kind, though it is generally small; and it would be a very great burden to require those small hospitals to employ a pharmacist simply for the purpose of filling such prescriptions.

Mr. STERLING. The question occurs to me, I will say to the Senator from North Carolina, Is there likely to be found any large supply of intoxicants in the small hospitals? Do they not rely for the filling of such prescriptions upon the pharmacist in the town where the small hospital is situated rather than to keep a supply of liquor themselves?

Mr. SIMMONS. On the contrary, I think it almost a universal practice of even the smaller hospitals to keep in the institution a reasonable supply of spirituous liquor for the purpose of prescribing it for patients.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is no doubt right that the large hospitals keep pharmacists; but a pharmacist is a man who in this day and time commands a very considerable salary, and to keep pharmacists in these small hospitals with only 15 or 20 rooms—and that is the size of them in the smaller towns of this country—would be very expensive.

I have in mind another institution in my State. I do not know whether or not it could be called a hospital, though we use the word "hospital" in connection with it; but it is known as the Keeley Institute and is located at Greensboro, N. C. It has treated thousands and tens of thousands of drunkards and has cured a large percentage of them. It has done a wonderful work in my State and in the adjacent States.

Mr. STERLING. Does not that institution have its pharmacist?

Mr. SIMMONS. Notwithstanding the existence of prohibition, I am told that institution is now doing a great work, probably having about as many patients as it had before prohibition went into effect. It is well known that the method of treating and curing inebriates from the beginning of the Keeley system has been by allowing them to "taper off," as it is called, administering a small quantity of the spirits to them day after day until finally they have been broken of the habit. It is the custom among such institutions to keep a very considerable supply of liquor on hand for that purpose.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to explain the matter to the Senator. I think he has not correctly diagnosed the situation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Probably I do not know so much about it as does the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I want to state what my understanding of the Keeley system is. In those institutions they give the patients a small quantity of whisky together with castor oil or some emetic. That makes the whisky unpalatable to the patients; that is the way they cure them. They either administer the whisky, as I have stated, with castor oil or some emetic, so that when the patient takes a drink of whisky he is bound to throw it up immediately, and as a result whisky becomes repulsive to him. That is the way drunkards are cured by the Keeley system, as I understand. However, I can not speak from experience. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know how the cure is administered, but I am told——

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to suggest that the remedy as described by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] would be likely to make castor oil very popular in the United States. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know how the cure is administered, but I am told—and I think there is no question about it—that in this treatment considerable quantities of spirits are used and have to be used. It is stated that the whole system would be ineffectual unless that were so; in fact, in the first stages of the treatment it is said that serious harm might come to patients if they were suddenly cut off from their usual supply of intoxicants. Under the bill as amended by the Judiciary Committee, as I understand, although the physician in charge might prescribe liquor, that institution could not carry a stock of spirits for the use of its own patients as required by the prescriptions of the physicians of the institution.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that about every other interest nearly was represented in the hearings before either the House or the Senate committee, or both, but there was no complaint whatever of the terms of this bill in any respect by the people for whom the Senator from North Carolina now speaks. There was no representation made by the hospitals that they were not provided for by the bill or that they would suffer by any of the provisions of the bill. There was no representation made by anybody in behalf of the Keeley Institute or any similar institution, and I can not think that they feel that there is any danger from the bill. They either have their pharmacists in the hospitals or sanitariums or they rely on the local pharmacists to fill prescriptions. So they will suffer no inconvenience at all from anything contained in this bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say frankly to the Senator that I have myself had, so far as I now recall, no protest from any hospital—the question as it relates to hospitals merely occurred to me—but I have had most vigorous protests from the institution to which I have just referred, located at Greensboro, in my State. It is a very large institution; it has, I think, patients from nearly all of the Southern States. The owner of the institution has been to see me about it, and I have had quite a correspondence with him, in which he protests most vigorously against the provisions of the bill and contended that it will seriously handicap the great work in which he is engaged, a work which, I think, has the approval of the prohibitionists of the country at large. Its object is to cure intemperance——

Mr. STERLING. I understand.

Mr. SIMMONS. And make good, sober citizens out of confirmed inebriates. He says that the course of treatment to which I have referred has been followed ever since the institution has been established, and he does not see how he can very well conduct it if he can not continue to keep large supplies on hand. Sometimes, I presume, they have several hundred patients there at a time. I have never been in the institution, so far as I now recall, but I know it is a very large institution. and I know from representations made to me that they have to carry considerable supplies of whisky and have to use large quantities of it. If they are compelled every time they have a patient to confine themselves to a prescription and are not allowed to use more than 1 pint in 10 days, I think the bill will destroy, if I am correctly advised, that method of treatment, and will destroy very largely that system of curing drunkenness in this country.

Mr. STERLING. May I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that he prepare an amendment and submit it which will protect the particular institution to which he refers. I am sure it will be given careful consideration.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall probably do that.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Before the Senator takes his seat I should like to call his attention to an amendment which the committee has made to the bill in reference to the restriction that "not more than a pint of spirituous liquors shall be prescribed for use by the same person within any period of 10 days." The committee have put in an amendment qualifying that provision so that it will read "not more than a pint of spirituous liquor to be taken internally."

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the way they use it in this institution; the patients take it internally.

Mr. NELSON. I was going to point out that the provision is not a limitation upon the quantity of liquor for external use.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was not speaking of its use for external purposes.

Mr. NELSON. It is used to a considerable extent for external purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, yes; it is used for external purposes; but I was speaking of the use of it by the Keeley Institute and institutions of similar character in connection with the cure of intemperance. They administer it internally, of course.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to suggest to the Senator further, if he will allow me, that if this institution is of the size the Senator indicates—and I do not doubt his word at all——

Mr. SIMMONS. Probably I have overestimated the number of patients somewhat.

Mr. NELSON. They would in the very nature of the case have a pharmacist in the institution, and that pharmacist could keep a supply of liquor like any other pharmacist.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, yes; if they set up a regular pharmaceutical establishment in the institution.

Mr. NELSON. No; I mean an ordinary pharmacist. They have probably such a man in connection with the institution. I do not see why they should not have. I imagine that they need such a man.

Mr. SIMMONS. Suppose they have such a man, I will ask the Senator from Minnesota, and suppose he could supply the liquor for the treatment of the inebriate patients, does the Senator believe, where it is absolutely necessary to use liquor in the cure of drunkenness, that a pint in 10 days would be sufficient?

Mr. NELSON. I think so. I want to say one word more to the Senator. We have such an institution at Minneapolis; it has been in existence there for a long time, but that institution has made no complaint to me. I have not heard from it, and I do not think that the chairman of the subcommittee has.

Mr. STERLING. In all the correspondence that I have had—and I have had volumes of it, I may say—I have not heard one word of complaint from hospitals or from the institution of which the Senator speaks.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say frankly to the Senator that I have heard none except from this institution, but that has been a very vigorous protest. The owner of that institution is a man of great prominence in this country; he has recently held high office in the city of Washington, and I take it that he would not exaggerate the situation. He has told me very frankly that he did not see how he could possibly carry on his course of treatment there if he was circumscribed as provided in this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, on page 1, line 3, after the enacting clause, to insert "That the short title of this act shall be the 'National prohibition act.'"

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under Title I, headline, "To provide for the enforcement of war prohibition"; on page 1, line 7, before the word "term," to strike out "That the" and insert "The"; and on page 2, line 6, before the word "beverages," to insert "such," so as to make the clause read:

The term "war prohibition act" used in this act shall mean the provisions of any act or acts prohibiting the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors until the conclusion of the present war and thereafter until the termination of demobilization, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President of the United States. The words "beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors" in the war prohibition act shall be hereafter construed to mean any such beverages which contain one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 8, before the word "Commissioner," to strike out "That the" and insert "The," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his assistants, agents, and inspectors, shall investigate and report violations of the war prohibition act to the United States attorney for the district in which committed, who shall be charged with the duty of prosecuting, subject to the direction of the Attorney General, the offenders as in the case of other offenses against laws of the United States; and such Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his assistants, agents, and inspectors may swear out warrants before United States commissioners or other officers of courts authorized to issue the same for the apprehension of such offenders, and may, subject to the control of the said United States attorney, conduct the prosecution at the committing trial for the purpose of having the offenders held for the action of a grand jury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 2, line 23, before the word "room," to strike out "That any" and insert "Any"; and on page 3, line 9, after the word "knowledge," to strike out "or reason to believe," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 3. Any room, house, building, boat, vehicle, structure, or place of any kind where intoxicating liquor is sold, manufactured, kept for sale, or bartered in violation of the war prohibition act, and all intoxicating liquor and all property kept and used in maintaining such a place is hereby declared to be a public and common nuisance, and any person who maintains or assists in maintaining such public and common nuisance shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or be imprisoned for not less than 30 days or more than 1 year, or both. If a person has knowledge that his property is occupied or used in violation of the provisions of the war prohibition act and suffers the same to be so used, such property shall be subject to a lien for and may be sold to pay all fines and costs assessed against the occupant of such building or property for any violation of the war prohibition act occurring after the passage hereof, which said lien shall attach from the time of the filing of notice of the commencement of the suit in the office where the records of the transfer of real estate is kept; and any such lien may be established and enforced by legal action instituted for that purpose in any court having jurisdiction. Any violation of this title upon any leased premises by the lessee or occupant thereof shall, at the option of the lessor, work a forfeiture of the lease.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 3, line 24, before the words "United States," to strike out "That the" and insert "The," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 4. The United States attorney for the district where such nuisance as is defined in this act exists, or any officer designated by him or the Attorney General of the United States, may prosecute a suit in equity in the name of the United States to abate and enjoin the same. Actions in equity to enjoin and abate such nuisances may be brought in any court having jurisdiction to hear and determine equity causes. The jurisdiction of the courts of the United States under this section shall be concurrent with that of the courts of the several States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 8, after the words "in the," to strike out "full value of the property" and insert "liquidated sum of not less than $500 nor more than $1,000," so as to make the clause read:

If it be made to appear by affidavit, or other evidence under oath, to the satisfaction of the court, or judge in vacation, that the nuisance complained of exists, a temporary writ of injunction shall forthwith issue restraining the defendant or defendants from conducting or permitting the continuance of such nuisance until the conclusion of the trial. Where a temporary injunction is prayed for, the court may issue an order restraining the defendants and all other persons from removing or in any way interfering with the liquor or fixtures, or other thing used in connection with the violation constituting the nuisance. No bond shall be required as a condition for making any order or issuing any writ of injunction under this act. If the court shall find the property involved was being unlawfully used as aforesaid at or about the time alleged in the petition, the court shall order that no liquors shall be manufactured, sold, bartered, or stored in such room, house, building, boat, vehicle, structure, or places of any kind, for a period of not exceeding one year, or during the war and the period of demobilization.

Whenever an action to enjoin a nuisance shall have been brought pursuant to the provisions of this act, if the owner, lessee, tenant, or occupant appears and pays all costs of the proceedings and files a bond, with sureties to be approved by the clerk of the court in which the action is brought, in the liquidated sum of not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, conditioned that he will immediately abate said nuisance and prevent the same from being established or kept therein a period of one year thereafter, or during the war and period of demobilization, the court, or in vacation the judge, may, if satisfied of his good faith, direct by appropriate order that the property, if already closed or held under the order of abatement, be delivered to said owner, and said order of abatement canceled, so far as the same may relate to said property; or if said bond be given and costs therein paid before judgment on an order of abatement, the action shall be thereby abated as to said room, house, building, boat, vehicle, structure, or places only. The release of the property under the provisions of this section shall not release it from any judgment, lien, penalty, or liability to which it may be subject by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, page 6, line 15, before the word "Commissioner," to strike out "That the" and insert "The," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 5. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his assistants, agents, and inspectors, and all other officers of the United States whose duty it is to enforce criminal laws, shall have all the power for the enforcement of the war-prohibition act or any provisions thereof which is conferred by law for the enforcement of existing laws relating to the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors under the laws of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, page 6, line 23, before the word "any," to strike out "That if" and insert "If," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 6. If any section or provision of this act shall be held to be invalid, it is hereby provided that all other provisions of this act which are not expressly held to be invalid shall continue in full force and effect.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, page 7, line 3, before the words "of the," to strike out "That none" and insert "None"; and, in line 4, after the word "construed," to insert "to repeal any of the provisions of the war prohibition act, or," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 7. None of the provisions of this act shall be construed to repeal any of the provisions of the war prohibition act, or to limit or annul any order or regulation prohibiting the manufacture, sale, or disposition of intoxicating liquors within certain prescribed zones or districts, nor shall the provisions of this act be construed to prohibit the use of the power of the military or naval authorities to enforce the regulations of the President or Secretary of War or Navy issued in pursuance to law, prohibiting the manufacture, use, possession, sale, or other disposition of intoxicating liquors during the period of the war and demobilization thereafter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under title 2, headline "Prohibition of Intoxicating Beverages," in section 1, page 7, line 17, before the word "used," to strike out "That when" and insert "When"; in line 21, after the word "any," to insert "other"; in line 25, after the word "are," to strike out "potable or capable of being used" and insert "fit for use," and on page 8, after the word "purposes," to insert "Provided, however, That the foregoing definition shall not extend to dealcoholized wine nor to any liquor or liquid produced by the process by which beer, ale, or porter is manufactured, but containing not more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol if such liquor or liquid shall be otherwise denominated than as beer, ale, or porter," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 1. When used in Title II and Title III of this act (1) the word "liquor" or the phrase "intoxicating liquor" shall be construed to include alcohol, brandy, whisky, rum, gin, beer, ale, porter, and wine, and in addition thereto any other spirituous, vinous, malt, or fermented liquor liquids, and compounds, whether medicated, proprietary, patented, or not, and by whatever named called, containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume which are fit for use for beverage purposes: Provided, however, That the foregoing definition shall not extend to dealcoholized wine nor to any liquor or liquid produced by the process by which beer, ale, or porter is manufactured but containing not more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol if such liquor or liquid shall be otherwise denominated than as beer, ale, or porter.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have offered an amendment to the committee amendment. On page 8, line 2, after the word "wine," I move to insert "or sweet cider." This is done to preserve the cider made from the nonsalable apples, which is a great proportion of the crop. I hope the chairman of the subcommittee will accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 2, after the word "wine," it is proposed to insert "or sweet cider."

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, so far as I am able to do so, I accept that amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr President, I did not understand the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state it.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment on page 8, line 2, after the word "wine," it is proposed to insert the words "or sweet cider," so that, if amended, it will read:

That the foregoing definition shall not extend to dealcoholized wine or sweet cider, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. I want to ask him if he does not think the words "not more than," in line 4, should be changed to read "but containing less"?

Mr. STERLING. I will say that I have that in mind as an amendment to be offered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This is a committee amendment, so I suggest that the committee amendment ought to be amended before it is adopted.

Mr. STERLING. Yes; it ought to be amended so as to correspond to the definition.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On line 4, it proposed to strike out "not more" and insert "less," so that it will read, "containing less than one-half of 1 per centum."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, on page 8, line 16, after the word "specifically," to insert "therein," so as to make the clause read:

(5) The term "permit" shall mean a formal written authorization by the commissioner setting forth specifically therein the things that are authorized.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 18, before the word "required," to insert "that may be," so as to make the clause read:

(6) The term "bond" shall mean an obligation authorized or that may be required by or under this act or any regulation executed in such form and for such a penal sum as may be required by a court, the commissioner, or prescribed by regulation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 22, to change the number of the paragraph from "8" to "7"; in the same line, after the word "mean," to strike out "all" and insert "any;" in line 23 before the word "prescribed," to strike out "regulations" and insert "regulation," and in line 25, after the word "act," to strike out "so as to afford safety to the revenues and edequate protection against diversion of liquor for illegal uses, and the commissioner is authorized to make such regulations," so as to make the clause read:

(7) The term "regulation" shall mean any regulation prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury for carrying out the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, line 7, after the word "commissioner," to strike out "shall" and insert "may," so as to make the clause read:

Any act authorized to be done by the commissioner may be performed by any assistant or agent designated by him for that purpose. Records required to be filed with the commissioner may be filed with an assistant commissioner or other preson designated by the commissioner to receive such records.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 10, before the word "commissioner," to strike out "That the" and insert "The," and on page 10, line 1, after the word "act," to insert: "Officers authorized to issue warrants or cause arrests to be made under said section 1014 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, are authorized to issue search warrants under the limitations provided in Title XI of the act approved June 15, 1917, Fortieth Statutes at Large, page 217, et seq," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 2. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his assistants, agents, and inspectors shall investigate and report violations of this act to the United States attorney for the district in which committed, who is hereby charged with the duty of prosecuting the offenders, subject to the direction of the Attorney General, as in the case of other offenses against the laws of the United States; and such Commissioner of Internal Revenue, his assistants, agents, and inspectors may swear out warrants before United States commissioners or other officers or courts authorized to issue the same for the apprehension of such offenders, and may, subject to the control of the said United States attorney, conduct the prosecution at the committing trial for the purpose of having the offenders held for the action of a grand jury. Section 1014 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby made applicable in the enforcement of this act. Officers authorized to issue warrants or cause arrests to be made under said section 1014 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, are authorized to issue search warrants under the limitations provided in Title XI of the act approved June 15, 1917, Fortieth Statutes at Large, page 217, et seq.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator having the bill in charge whether the act of June 15, 1917, is a permanent act. Is not that a statute which was passed to meet the exigencies of the war? It was a part of the espionage act.

Mr. STERLING. Section 7 of that act, I think, is permanent legislation.

Mr. THOMAS. It may be.

Mr. STERLING. Yes; I think it is.

Mr. THOMAS. My recollection of the espionage law is that it is only designed for the exigencies of the war.

Mr. STERLING. No; that relates wholly to search warrants, and I think it is permanent.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senators that I was on the Committee on the Judiciary when the bill to which the Senator from Colorado refers was before that committee. The provision relative to search warrants was practically prepared by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and a member of the House committee, and it was copied from the New York search law and is a permanent provision that does not die with the war. It is a very guarded provision that has been approved and has been worked under in the State of New York.

Mr. THOMAS. I remember the provision very well, because I took some part in the discussion of it when it was enacted. I wanted to ascertain, however, whether it was a permanent provision.

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that I think there is no doubt about that. I remember the discussion of that act before the Judiciary Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, in section 3, page 10, line 1, before the word "person," to strike out "That no" and insert "No"; and in line 8, after the word "barter," to strike out "give away," so as to read:

SEC. 3. No person shall on or after the date when the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States goes into effect, manufacture, sell, barter, etc.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, do I understand—and I am inquiring of the Senator in charge of the bill—that it is proposed to punish somebody for giving away a drink in his own house?

Mr. STERLING. We have stricken out those words.

Mr. REED. Oh, you are striking them out?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; they are stricken out by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 9, after the word "deliver," to strike out "furnish, receive" and insert "furnish"; and in line 12, after the word "construed," to strike out "to the end that the manufacture, sale, transportation, exportation, and importation of intoxicating liquor for use for beverage purposes may be prohibited. Liquor for nonbeverage purposes and wine for sacramental purposes may be manufactured, purchased, sold, bartered, given away, transported, imported, exported, delivered, furnished, received, possessed, and used but only as herein provided, and permits may be issued therefor"; and insert: "Provided, That nothing in this act shall prohibit the purchase and sale of warehouse receipts covering distilled spirits on deposit in general or distillery bonded warehouses and no special tax liability shall attach to the business of purchasing and selling such warehouse receipts," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. No person shall on or after the date when the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States goes into effect, manufacture, sell, barter, transport, import, export, deliver, furnish, or possess any intoxicating liquor, except as authorized in this act, and all the provisions of this act shall be liberally construed: Provided, That nothing in this act shall prohibit the purchase and sale of warehouse receipts covering distilled spirits on deposit in general or distillery bonded warehouses, and no special tax liability shall attach to the business of purchasing and selling such warehouse receipts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 10, line 25, before the word "articles" to strike out "That the" and insert "The," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 4. The articles enumerated in this section shall not, after having been manufactured and prepared for the market, be subject to the provisions of this act if they correspond with the following descriptions and limitations, namely:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 10, after the word "Pharmacopœia," to strike out "or"; in the same line, after the word "Formulary," to strike out "of" and insert "or," and in line 11, before the word "unfit," to strike out "nonpotable and," so as to make the clause read:

(b) Medicinal preparations manufactured in accordance with formulas prescribed by the United States Pharmacopœia, National Formulary, or the American Institute of Homeopathy that are unfit for use for beverage purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 14, before the word "unfit," to strike out "nonpotable and," so as to make the clause read:

(c) Patented, patent, and proprietary medicines that are unfit for use for beverage purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 16, before the word "unfit," to strike out "nonpotable and", and in line 17, after the word "purposes," to strike out "contained in bottles or packages, upon which are printed conspicuously and legibly in English the exact quantity by volume of alcohol in such preparation," so as to make the clause read:

(d) Toilet, medicinal, and antiseptic preparations and solutions that are unfit for use for beverage purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 21, after the words "unfit for," to strike out "intoxicating beverage purposes" and insert "use as a beverage," so as to make the clause read:

(e) Flavoring extracts and sirups that are unfit for use as a beverage.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, after line 21, to insert:

(f) Vinegar and fruit juices for the production of vinegar.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 9, after the word "article," to strike out "capable of being" and insert "which may be," so as to make the clause read:

A person who manufactures any of the articles mentioned in this section may purchase and possess liquor for that purpose, but he shall secure permits to manufacture such articles and to purchase such liquor, give the bonds, keep the records, and make the reports specified in this act and as directed by the commissioner. No such manufacturer shall sell, use, or dispose of any liquor otherwise than as an ingredient of the articles authorized to be manufactured therefrom. No more alcohol shall be used in the manufacture of any extract, sirup, or other article which may be used for beverage purposes than the quantity necessary for extraction or solution of the elements contained therein and for the preservation of the article.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 14, before the letter "d," to strike out "and"; in the same line, before the words "of this," to insert "and f"; in line 16, after the word "sell," to insert "any of the"; on page 13, line 1, after the word "person," to strike out "for" and insert "to," and in line 8, after the word "and," to insert "in addition the commissioner," so as to make the clause read:

Any person who shall knowingly sell any of the articles mentioned in paragraphs a, b, c, d, and f of this section for beverage purpose, or any extract or sirup for intoxicating beverage purposes, or who shall sell any of the same under circumstances from which the seller might reasonably deduce the intention of the purchaser to use them for such purposes, or shall sell any beverage containing one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume in which any extract, sirup, or other article is used as an ingredient, shall be subject to the penalties provided in section 30 of this title. If the commissioner shall find, after notice and hearing as provided for in section 5 of this title, that any person has sold any flavoring extract, sirup, or beverage in violation of this paragraph, he shall notify such person, and the person to whom the sale was made, if any, to desist from selling such article; and it shall thereupon be unlawful for a period of one year thereafter for any person so notified to sell any such extract, sirup, or beverage without making an application for, giving a bond, and obtaining a permit so to do, which permit may be issued upon such conditions as the commissioner may deem necessary to prevent such illegal sales, and in addition the commissioner shall require a record and report of sales.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, page 13, line 10, before the word "the," to strike out "That whenever" and insert "Whenever," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 5. Whenever the commissioner has reason to believe that any article mentioned in section 4 does not correspond with the descriptions and limitations therein provided, he shall cause an analysis of said article to be made, and if, upon such analysis, the commissioner shall find that said article does not so correspond, he shall give not less than 15 days' notice in writing to the person who is the manufacturer thereof to show cause why said article should not be dealt with as an intoxicating liquor, such notice to be served personally or by registered mail, as the commissioner may determine, and shall specify the time when, the place where, and the name of the agent or official before whom such person is required to appear.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 1, after the word "title," to strike out "it shall be treated as intoxicating liquor" and insert "his permit to manufacture and sell such article shall be revoked," and in line 3, before the word "manufacturer," to strike out "As defined in this title the" and insert "The," so as to make the clause read:

If the manufacturer of said article fails to show to the satisfaction of the commissioner that the article corresponds to the descriptions and limitations provided in section 4 of this title, his permit to manufacture and sell such article shall be revoked. The manufacturer may by appropriate proceeding in a court of equity have the action of the commissioner reviewed, and the court may affirm, modify, or reverse the findings of the commissioner as the facts and law of the case may warrant, and during the pendency of such proceedings may restrain the manufacture, sale, and other disposition of such article.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, page 14, line 10, before the word "one," to strike out "That no" and insert "No"; and in line 15, after the word "provided," to insert: "The manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, exportation, delivery, furnishing, receiving and possession of intoxicating liquor for all nonbeverage purposes is hereby authorized, and the commissioner shall, upon application as herein provided, issue permits therefor," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. No one shall manufacture, sell, purchase, transport, or prescribe any liquor without first obtaining a permit from the commissioner so to do, except that a person may, without a permit, purchase and use liquor for medicinal purposes when prescribed by a physician as herein provided. The manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, exportation, delivery, furnishing, receiving and possession of intoxicating liquor for all nonbeverage purposes is hereby authorized, and the commissioner shall, upon application as herein provided, issue permits therefor.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask the Senator from South Dakota to permit this amendment to go over for the present.

Mr. STERLING. I consent that it may go over for the present, if the Senator wishes it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over for the present.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 20, after the word "or," to strike out "transport liquor" and insert "to purchase liquor for the purpose of manufacturing, prescribing, or selling as authorized in this act, or to transport liquor, may be issued for one year, and"; in line 25, after the word "thereof," to insert "Provided, That the commissioner may automatically extend any permits granted under this act or laws now in force after August 31 in any year to December 31 of the succeeding year"; on page 15, line 3, after the word "liquor," to insert "except as herein provided"; in line 4, after the word "shall," to strike out "among other things"; in line 7, after the word "than" to strike out "10" and insert "90"; in line 10, after the word "violated," to insert "the terms of"; in line 13, after the word "retail," to strike out "unless such sale is made by a pharmacist designated in the permit who is" and insert "except to a pharmacist"; in line 20, after the word "Every," to insert "such"; in line 22, after the word "shall," to strike out "among other things"; in line 23, after the word "issued," to strike out "and of those who are permitted to do the authorized acts. It" and insert "and"; in line 25, after the word "time," to insert "when"; in line 26, after the word "place," to strike out "when and"; and on page 16, line 4, after the word "used," to strike out "together with such other facts as shall show that the permit may properly be granted," so as to make the clause read:

All permits to manufacture, prescribe, sell, or to purchase liquor for the purpose of manufacturing, prescribing or selling as authorized in this act, or to transport liquor, may be issued for one year, and shall expire on the 31st day of December next succeeding the issuance thereof: Provided, That the commissioner may automatically extend any permits granted under this act or laws now in force after August 31 in any year to December 31 of the succeeding year. Every permit to purchase liquor, except as herein provided shall specify the quantity and kind to be purchased and the purpose for which it is to be used, and shall not be in force more than 90 days from the day of its issuance. No permit shall be issued to any person who within one year prior to the application therefor or issuance thereof shall have violated the terms of any permit issued under this title or any law of the United States or of any State regulating traffic in liquor. No permit shall be issued to anyone to sell liquor at retail except to a pharmacist duly licensed under the laws of his State to compound and dispense medicine prescribed by a duly licensed physician. No one shall be given a permit to prescribe liquor unless he is a physician duly licensed to practice medicine and actively engaged in the practice of such profession. Every such permit shall be in writing, dated when issued, and signed by the commissioner or his authorized agent. It shall give the name and address of the person to whom it is issued and shall designate and limit the acts that are permitted and the time when and place where such acts may be performed. No permit shall be issued until a verified, written application shall have been made therefor, setting forth the qualification of the applicant and the purpose for which the liquor is to be used.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 7, after the word "applications" to strike out "and the facts to be set forth therein," and in line 11, after the word "title" to insert: "In the event of the refusal by the commissioner of any application for a permit, the applicant may have a review of his decision before a court of equity in the manner provided in section 5 hereof," so as to make the clause read:

The commissioner may prescribe the form of all permits and applications. Before any permit is granted the commissioner may require a bond in such form and amount as he may prescribe to insure compliance with the terms of the permit and the provisions of this title. In the event of the refusal by the commissioner of any application for a permit, the applicant may have a review of his decision before a court of equity in the manner provided in section 5 hereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 16, after line 14, to insert:

Nothing in this title shall be held to apply to the manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, possession, or distribution of wine for sacramental purposes, or like religious rite, except section 6 (save as the same requires a permit to purchase) and section 10 hereof, and the provisions of this act prescribing penalties for the violation of either of said sections. No person to whom a permit may be issued to manufacture, transport, import, or sell wines for sacramental purposes or like religious rites shall sell, barter, exchange, or give any such to any person not a rabbi, minister of the gospel, priest, or an officer duly authorized for the purpose by any church or congregation, nor to any such except upon an application duly subscribed by him, which application shall be filed and presented by the seller. The head of any conference or diocese or other ecclesiastical jurisdiction may designate any rabbi, minister, or priest to supervise the manufacture of wine to be used for the purposes and rites in this section mentioned, and the person so designated shall be entitled to a permit, to be issued by the commissioner authorizing him so to supervise such manufacture.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 17, line 7, before the word "one," to strike out "That no" and insert "No"; in the same line, after the word "physician," to strike out "duly licensed to practice medicine and actively engaged in the practice of such profession," and insert "holding a permit to prescribe liquor"; in line 13, after the word "for," to strike out "liquor" with a period and insert "liquor"; in the same line, before the word "physician," to strike out "Such" and insert "and no"; in line 14, after the word "physician," to strike out "shall at the time of prescribing personally make a careful physical examination of the person for whom the liquor is prescribed and"; in line 16, after the word "shall," to strike out "only"; in the same line, after the word "liquor," to strike out "when" and insert "unless he"; in line 17, before the word "believes," to strike out "he"; in line 19, after the word "ailment," to strike out "specified in the prescription"; and in line 20, after the word "liquor," to insert "to be taken internally," so as to read:

SEC. 7. No one but a physician holding a permit to prescribe liquor shall issue any prescription for liquor and no physician shall prescribe liquor unless he in good faith believes that its use as a medicine by the one for whom he prescribes is necessary and will afford relief to him from some ailment. Not more than a pint of spirituous liquor to be taken internally shall be prescribed for use by the same person within any period of 10 days and no prescription shall be filled more than once. Any pharmacist filling a prescription shall at the time indorse upon it over his own signature the word "canceled," together with the date when the liquor was delivered, and then make the same a part of the record that he is required to keep as herein provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, line 6, after the word "shall," to strike out "show among other things, date, amount" and insert "show the date of issue, amount"; in line 9, after the words "frequency of," to strike out "dose" and insert "the dose," and in the same line, after the word "dose," to strike out "and the druggist to whom addressed," so as to make the clause read:

Every physician who issues a prescription for liquor shall keep a record, alphabetically arranged, in a book prescribed by the commissioner, which shall show the date of issue, amount prescribed, to whom issued, and directions for use, stating the amount and frequency of the dose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, after line 10, to strike out:

SEC. 7½. No physician authorized to issue any prescription for liquor under this act shall have or shall keep his office, or shall examine any person with the purpose in view of prescribing liquor or issue any such prescription, in any drug store, pharmacy, or place where liquor is sold under authority of this act, or in any room, apartment, booth, or place immediately connected therewith, except that such physician shall have had his office in such drug store, pharmacy, or place for a period of at least one year immediately preceding and prior to the going into effect of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, page 18, line 21, before the word "commissioner," to strike out "that the" and insert "the"; in line 22, after the word "printed," to strike out "forms" and insert "blanks"; in line 23, after the words "furnish the," to strike out "same free of cost" and insert "same"; in line 24, after the word "physicians," to strike out "who have obtained permits to issue prescriptions" and insert "at cost"; in line 25, after the word "prescription," to strike out

"forms" and insert "blanks"; on page 19, line 1, after the word "numbered," to strike out "with consecutive serial numbers" and insert "consecutively"; in line 3, before the word "stubs," to insert "the"; in line 6, after the words "when the," to strike out "prescription forms are" and insert "prescriptions have been used"; in line 8, after the word "defaced," to strike out "forms" and insert "blanks"; in line 10, before the word "fill," to insert "shall," and in the same line, after the word "on," to strike out "forms" and insert "blanks," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 8. The commissioner shall cause to be printed blanks for the prescriptions herein required, and he shall furnish the same to physicians at cost. The prescription blanks shall be printed in book form and shall be numbered consecutively from 1 to 100, and each book shall be given a number, and the stubs in each book shall carry the same numbers as and be copies of the prescriptions. The books containing such stubs shall be returned to the commissioner when the prescriptions have been used, or sooner, if directed by the commissioner. All unused, mutilated, or defaced blanks shall be returned with the book. No physician shall prescribe and no pharmacist shall fill any prescription for liquor except on blanks so provided.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I desire to inquire of the Senator having charge of the bill whether the provisions of sections 7 and 8 as drawn do not prohibit a physician from using or prescribing liquor in a quantity which may be necessary in cases of exigency? The Senator knows, of course, that liquor in some of its forms is a potent remedy in emergent cases. If it be the purpose of the proposed law to prohibit such a prescription except by filling out a blank and then having the prescription filled by a druggist, the emergency might result fatally before the liquor could be supplied. There are such things as bites of poisonous serpents, accidents, heart difficulties, that come on suddenly, which require stimulants and which have heretofore been relieved and sometimes cured by a prompt use of stimulants.

It seems to me, from the very drastic provisions of these two sections, if such an emergency were facing a physician he would have to choose between letting his patient die or going to jail and serving a sentence.

Mr. STERLING. I admit that the provision seems quite drastic. The case supposed by the Senator from Colorado might be reached——

Mr. THOMAS. We had a similar experience some years ago in preparing and passing the narcotic bill. That matter was brought to the attention of the subcommittee, of which I was a member at that time, and we made some provision, the phraseology of which I do not recall. This presents a situation which might result very seriously if the law were so rigid in its phraseology as to deprive the physician of all discretion. I suggest that the Senator look into the matter and reserve these sections for further consideration.

Mr. STERLING. I shall be glad to do so. In the meantime perhaps the Senator may suggest some amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall be very glad to do that if I can get the time.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I would suggest to the Senator that at the end of line 11 these words be added: "Except in cases of emergency when no blank can be obtained."

Mr. THOMAS. That expresses the idea I had in mind.

Mr. NELSON. Add those words at the end of line 11.

Mr. THOMAS. They might have the blanks and yet the emergency would be too great to justify their use.

Mr. NELSON. You might stop with the words "except in cases of emergency."

Mr. THOMAS. I think that would be better. Of course before the bill is finally passed, if that is too broad we can remedy it.

Mr. NELSON. If it meets with the approval of the Senator in charge of the bill, I would suggest as an amendment to insert the words "except in cases of emergency."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed by the Senator from Minnesota, on page 19, line 11, after the word "provided," to insert the words "except in cases of emergency."

Mr. STERLING. I accept the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 9, page 19, line 12, before the word "at," to strike out "That if" and insert "If"; in line 21, after the words "of the," to strike out "citation and of" and insert "citation, which citation shall be accompanied by a copy of such complaint, or in the event that the proceedings be initiated by the commissioner with a statement of the facts constituting"; on page 20, line 1, after the word "within," to insert "the judicial district and within"; and in line 7, after the word "year," to strike out "thereafter: Provided, Such person may by appropriate proceeding in a court of equity have the action of the commissioner reviewed, and the court may affirm, modify, or reverse the action of the commissioner in revoking such permit" and insert "thereafter. Should the permit be revoked by the commissioner, the permittee may have a review of his decision before a court of equity in the manner provided in section 5 hereof," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 9. If at any time there shall be filed with the commissioner a complaint under oath setting forth facts showing, or if the commissioner has reason to believe, that any person who has a permit is not in good faith conforming to the provisions of this act, or has violated the laws of any State relating to intoxicating liquor, the commissioner or his agent shall immediately issue an order citing such person to appear before him on a day named not more than 30 and not less than 15 days from the date of service upon such permittee of a copy of the citation, which citation shall be accompanied by a copy of such complaint, or in the event that the proceedings be initiated by the commissioner with a statement of the facts constituting the violation charged, at which time a hearing shall be had unless continued for cause. Such hearings shall be held within the judicial district and within 50 miles of the place where the offense is alleged to have occurred. If it be found that such person has been guilty of willfully violating any such laws, as charged, or has not in good faith conformed to the provisions of this act, such permit shall be revoked, and no permit shall be granted to such person within one year thereafter. Should the permit be revoked by the commissioner the permittee may have a review of his decision before a court of equity in the manner provided in section 5 hereof. During the pendency of such action such permit shall be temporarily revoked.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 10, page 20, line 17, before the word "person," to strike out "That no" and insert "No"; in line 19, before the word "detail," to strike out "such"; in the same line, after the word "detail," to strike out "as may be required by regulation"; in line 21, before the word "transported," to insert "or"; in the same line, after the word "transported," to strike out "used, or otherwise handled"; in line 22, after the word "addresses," to strike out "of persons connected with each transaction and the time and place thereof" and insert "of the persons to whom sold, in case of sale, and the consignor and consignee in case of transportation, and the time and place of such manufacture, sale, or transportation"; on page 21, line 1, after the word "transportation," to strike out "A verified report of facts required to be recorded shall be made to the commissioner for and at the end of every 3 months or within 10 days thereafter"; in line 5, after the word "record," to strike out "and report and designate where such record is to be kept and when and where the reports are to be filed" and insert "which shall at all times be open to inspection by the commissioner, or his agents," so as to read:

SEC. 10. No person shall manufacture, purchase for sale, sell, or transport any liquor without making at the time a permanent record thereof showing in detail the amount and kind of liquor manufactured, purchased, sold, or transported, together with the names and addresses of the persons to whom sold, in case of sale, and the consignor and consignee in case of transportation, and the time and place of such manufacture, sale, or transportation. The commissioner may prescribe the form of such record, which shall at all times be open to inspection by the commissioner, or his agents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 11, page 21, line 9, before the word "manufacturers," to strike out "That all" and insert "All," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 11. All manufacturers and wholesale or retail druggists shall keep as a part of the records required of them a copy of all permits to purchase on which a sale of any liquor is made, and no manufacturer or wholesale druggist shall sell or otherwise dispose of any liquor except at wholesale and only to persons having permits to purchase in such quantities.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 12, page 21, line 16, before the word "persons," to strike out "That all" and insert "All"; in line 21, after the word "with," to strike out "a copy" and insert "the number"; and on page 22, line 1, after the word "kind," to insert "and quantity," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 12. All persons manufacturing liquor for sale under the provisions of this title shall securely and permanently attach to every container thereof, as the same is manufactured, a label stating name of manufacturer, kind and quantity of liquor contained therein, and the date of its manufacture, together with the number of the permit authorizing the manufacture thereof; and all persons possessing such liquor in wholesale quantities shall securely keep and maintain such label thereon; and all persons selling at wholesale shall attach to every package of liquor, when sold, a label setting forth the kind and quantity of liquor contained therein, by whom manufactured, the date of sale, and the person to whom sold; which label shall likewise be kept and maintained thereon until the liquor is used for the purpose for which such sale was authorized.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 13, page 22, line 6, before the word "shall," to strike out "That it" and insert "It"; in line 7, after the word "carrier," to strike out "that transports liquor to secure a permit therefor and" and insert "to"; in line 9, before the word "transported," to insert "to be"; in the same line, after the word "shall," to strike out "only"; in the same line, after the word "liquor," to insert "only"; in line 10, after the word "present," to insert "to the carrier"; in line 11, after the word "purchase," to strike out "and an affidavit to the carrier that such liquor will not be used in violation of law. The form of the affidavit shall be prescribed by the commissioner and shall contain such information as he deems necessary for the enforcement of this act. The copy of such permit and the affidavit presented to the carrier to obtain such delivery," and insert "which"; and in line 18, before the word "made," to strike out "is" and insert "was," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 13. It shall be the duty of every carrier to make a record at the place of shipment of the receipt of any liquor to be transported, and he shall deliver liquor only to persons who present to the carrier a verified copy of a permit to purchase, which shall be made a part of the carrier's permanent record at the office from which delivery was made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 22, line 20, after the word "consignee," to insert "in verification of the copy of the permit presented," and in line 22, after the word "shall," to strike out "first," so as to make the clause read:

The agent of the common carrier is hereby authorized to administer the oath to the consignee in verification of the copy of the permit presented, who, if not personally known to the agent, shall be identified before the delivery of the liquor to him. The name and address of the person identifying the consignee shall be included in the record.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 14, page 23, line 1, before the word "shall," to strike out "That it" and insert "It"; in line 7, after the word "such," to strike out "liquor" and insert "liquor, if the shipment be made by the manufacturer, a label such as is required by section 12, if by any other person"; in line 12, after the word "consignee," to strike out "or persons receiving the liquor"; in line 14, before the word "permit," to insert "the," and in the same line, after the word "permit," to strike out "and name and address of person using the same" and insert "under which the shipment is made," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 14. It shall be unlawful for a person to use or induce any carrier, or any agent or employee thereof, to carry or ship any package or receptacle containing liquor without notifying the carrier of the true nature and character of the shipment. No carrier shall transport nor shall any person receive liquor from a carrier unless there appears on the outside of the package containing such liquor, if the shipment be made by the manufacturer, a label such as is required by section 12, if by any other person the following information:

Name and address of the consignor or seller, name and address of the consignee, kind and quantity of liquor contained therein, and number of the permit under which the shipment is made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 15, page 23, line 16, before the word "shall," to strike out "That it" and insert "It," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 15. It shall be unlawful for any consignee to accept or receive any package containing any liquor upon which appears a statement known to him to be false, or for any carrier or other person to consign, ship, transport, or deliver any such package, knowing such statement to be false.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 16, page 23, line 21, before the word "shall," to strike out "That it" and insert "It"; in line 24, after the word "liquor," to strike out "consigned to, or purporting or claimed to be consigned to a person"; and on page 24, line 2, after the word "liquor," to insert "except for delivery to the consignee," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 16. It shall be unlawful to give to any carrier or any officer, agent, or person acting or assuming to act for such carrier an order requiring the delivery to any person of any liquor or package containing liquor when the purpose of the order is to enable any person not an actual bona fide consignee to obtain such liquor except for delivery to the consignee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 17, page 24, line 4, before the word "shall," to strike out "That it" and insert "It"; in the same line, after the word "advertise," to insert "anywhere, or by any means or method"; in line 8, after the word "obtained," to strike out "No one shall permit any sign or billboard containing such advertisement to remain upon one's premises or circulate any price list, order blank, or other matter designed to induce or secure orders for intoxicating liquors"; in line 15, after the word "to," to strike out "sell liquor. The commissioner and other officers charged with the enforcement of this title are authorized to remove, paint over, or otherwise obliterate any such advertisement from any sign, billboard, or other place, and shall do so upon the demand of any citizen who has first requested the person in charge of such advertisements, or the owner of the property on which it is located, to remove the same," and insert "purchase liquor, or from advertising alcohol in business publications or trade journals circulating generally among manufacturers of lawful alcoholic perfumes, toilet preparations, flavoring extracts, medicinal preparations, and like articles," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 17. It shall be unlawful to advertise anywhere, or by any means or method, liquor, or the manufacture, sale, keeping for sale or furnishing of the same, or where, how, from whom, or at what price the same may be obtained. But nothing herein shall prohibit manufacturers and wholesale druggists holding permits to sell liquor from furnishing price lists, with description of liquor for sale, to persons permitted to purchase liquor, or from advertising alcohol in business publications or trade journals circulating generally among manufacturers of lawful alcoholic perfumes, toilet preparations, flavoring extracts, medicinal preparations, and like articles.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 25, to strike out:

That any advertisement or notice containing the picture of a brewery, distillery, bottle, keg, barrel, or box, or other receptacle represented as containing liquor, and designed to serve as an advertisement thereof, shall be within the inhibition of this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 18, page 25, line 6, before the word "shall," to strike out "That it" and insert "It"; and in line 7, after the word "any," to insert "utensil, contrivance, machine," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 18. It shall be unlawful to advertise, manufacture, sell, or possess for sale any utensil, contrivance, machine, preparation, compound, tablet, substance, formula direction, or recipe advertised, designed, or intended for use in the unlawful manufacture of intoxicating liquor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 19, page 25, line 14, before the word "person," to strike out: "That it shall be unlawful for any person knowingly to permit his employee to procure liquor for or give direction or information by which liquor can be unlawfully secured by any person, and no," and insert "No," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 19. No person shall solicit or receive from any person any order for liquor or give any information of how liquor may be obtained in violation of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, after line 17, to strike out:

SEC. 20. That it shall be unlawful for any person to drink liquor as a beverage in or to be intoxicated upon any car, train, automobile, boat, or other public conveyance. Any conductor or person in charge of any car, train, automobile, boat, or other public conveyance may, upon view of the offense, arrest any person therefor who is being conveyed in or by such car, train, automobile, boat, or other public conveyance, and turn him over to the proper officer to be proceeded against according to law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, a few moments ago I requested the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] to allow to be passed over for the time being an amendment reported by the committee in Title II, section 6, page 14. I desire to leave the Chamber for some little time, and should be glad if the Senator from South Dakota would take that amendment up now. It would accommodate me somewhat, for my colleague [Mr. OVERMAN] has an amendment which he desires to offer in lieu of the committee amendment. I have no objection to the committee amendment, but merely desire that my colleague may have an opportunity to offer this amendment, to come in immediately after the committee amendment in section 6, page 14, line 15, after the word "provided."

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from South Dakota that I am on the subcommittee which considered this matter. I think the amendment I am about to propose is well safeguarded and will cover the condition in reference to the Keeley institution. I desire to offer the amendment and hope that he will let it go to conference, for I think it is all right.

Mr. STERLING. Very well. Let the amendment be stated.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that we return to that point in the bill and that I may now offer my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In Title II, section 6, page 14, line 15, after the word "provided," it is proposed to insert:

and except that any person who in the opinion of the commissioner is conducting a bona fide hospital or sanatorium engaged in the treatment of persons suffering from alcoholism may, under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the commissioner prescribes, purchase and use, in accordance with the methods heretofore in use in such institution, liquor, to be administered to the patients of such institution under the direction of a duly qualified physician employed by such institution.

Mr. STERLING. I accept the amendment, with the understanding, of course, that it will go to conference to be determined by the conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, on page 26, line 3, to change the number of the section from 21 to 20; in the same line, before the word "person," to strike out "That any" and insert "Any"; in line 5, after the word "intoxicated," to strike out "person" and insert "person, or by reason of the intoxication of any person, whether resulting in his death or not"; in line 7, after the word "have," to strike out "in addition to the right of action against the intoxicated person"; in line 9, before the word "assisting," to insert "unlawfully"; and in line 14, before the word "against," to strike out "and" and insert "or," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 20. Any person who shall be injured in person, property, means of support, or otherwise by any intoxicated person, or by reason of the intoxication of any person, whether resulting in his death or not, shall have a right of action against any person who shall, by unlawfully selling to or unlawfully assisting in procuring liquor for such intoxicated person, have caused or contributed to such intoxication, and in any such action such person shall have a right to recover actual and exemplary damages. In case of the death of either party, the action or right of action given by this section shall survive to or against his or her executor or administrator, and the amount so recovered by either wife or child shall be his or her sole and separate property. Such action may be brought in any court of competent jurisdiction. In any case where parents shall be entitled to such damages, either the father or mother may sue alone therefor, but recovery by one of such parties shall be a bar to suit brought by the other.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, line 22, to change the number of the section from 22 to 21; and in the same line, before the word "room," to strike out "That any" and insert "Any," so as to read:

SEC. 21. Any room, house, building, boat, vehicle, structure, or place where intoxicating liquor is manufactured, sold, kept, or bartered in violation of this title, and all intoxicating liquor and property kept and used in maintaining the same, is hereby declared to be a common nuisance, and any person who maintains such a common nuisance shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $1,000 or be imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 15, to change the number of the title from 23 to 22; in the same line, before the word "action," to strike out "That an" and insert "An"; on page 28, line 3, before the words "a temporary," to strike out "Where" and insert "If"; and in line 18, after the word "year," to insert "thereafter," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 22. An action to enjoin any nuisance defined in this title may be brought in the name of the United States by the Attorney General of the United States or by any United States attorney or any prosecuting attorney of any State or any subdivision thereof or by the commissioner or his deputies or assistants. Such action shall be brought and tried as an action in equity and may be brought in any court having jurisdiction to hear and determine equity cases. If it is made to appear by affidavits or otherwise, to the satisfaction of the court, or judge in vacation, that such nuisance exists, a temporary writ of injunction shall forthwith issue restraining the defendant from conducting or permitting the continuance of such nuisance until the conclusion of the trial. If a temporary injunction is prayed for, the court may issue an order restraining the defendant and all other persons from removing or in any way interfering with the liquor or fixtures, or other things used in connection with the violation of this act constituting such nuisance. No bond shall be required in instituting such proceedings. It shall not be necessary for the court to find the property involved was being unlawfully used as aforesaid at the time of the hearing, but on finding that the material allegations of the petition are true the court shall order that no liquors shall be manufactured, sold, bartered, or stored in such room, house, building, boat, vehicle, structure, or place, or any part thereof. And upon judgment of the court ordering such nuisance to be abated, the court may order that the room, house, building, structure, boat, vehicle, or place shall not be occupied or used for one year thereafter; but the court may, in its discretion, permit it to be occupied or used if the owner, lessee, tenant, or occupant thereof shall give bond with sufficient surety, to be approved by the court making the order, in the penal and liquidated sum of not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, payable to the United States, and conditioned that intoxicating liquor will not thereafter be manufactured, sold, bartered, kept, or otherwise disposed of therein or thereon, and that he will pay all fines, costs, and damages that may be assessed for any violation of this title upon said property.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, after line 3, to strike out:

SEC. 23½. That any person who shall, with intent to effect a sale of liquor, by himself, his employee, servant or agent, for himself or any person, company or corporation, keep or carry around on his person, or in a vehicle, or other conveyance whatever, or leave in a place for another to secure, any liquor, or who shall travel to solicit, or solicit, or take, or accept orders for the sale, shipment, or delivery of liquor in violation of this title is guilty of a nuisance and may be restrained by injunction, temporary and permanent, from doing or continuing to do any of said acts or things.

In such proceedings it shall not be necessary to show any intention, on the part of the accused, to continue such violations if the action is brought within 60 days following any such violation of the law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 29, line 18, to change the number of the section from 24 to 23; in the same line, after the number 23, to strike out "That when it appears in any criminal proceeding that any common nuisance as defined herein exists it shall be the duty of any officer authorized to enforce this act to proceed promptly in a court of equity to abate such nuisance, and the final conviction of the defendant in such trial shall be conclusive evidence against such defendant of the facts adjudged therein as to the existence of the nuisance"; in line 25, after the word "selling," to insert "the"; and on page 30, line 3, before the word "execution," to strike out "on" and insert "under," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 23. For removing and selling property in enforcing this act the officer shall be entitled to charge and receive the same fee as the sheriff of the county would receive for levying upon and selling property under execution, and for closing the premises and keeping them closed a reasonable sum shall be allowed by the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, line 9, to change the number of the section from 25 to 24; in the same line, after the number 24, to strike out "That any person violating the terms of the injunction as provided for in this title shall be punished for contempt by a fine of not more than $1,000, and by imprisonment of not less than 30 days nor more than one year; and the court shall have the power to enforce such injunction," and insert "In the case of the violation of any injunction, temporary or permanent, granted pursuant to the provisions of this title, the court, or in vacation a judge thereof, may summarily try and punish the defendant. The proceedings for punishment for contempt shall be commenced by filing with the clerk of the court from which such injunction issued information under oath setting out the alleged facts constituting the violation, whereupon the court or judge shall forthwith cause a warrant to issue under which the defendant shall be arrested. The trial may be had upon affidavits, or either party may demand the production and oral examination of the witnesses. Any person found guilty of contempt under the provisions of this section shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, or by imprisonment of not less than 30 days nor more than 12 months, or by both fine and imprisonment."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, line 5, to change the number of the section from 26 to 25; in the same line, before the word "shall," to strike out "That it" and insert "It"; in line 12, after the word "liquor," to strike out "the containers thereof"; in line 15, after the word "used," to strike out "the liquor and all property designed for the unlawful manufacture of liquor"; in line 17, before the word "shall," to insert "it"; in the same line, after the words "shall be" to strike out "destroyed" and insert "destroyed, unless the court shall otherwise order as to the property other than the liquor as provided in the next succeeding section"; in line 23, after the word "house" to strike out "The property seized on any warrant shall not be taken from the officer seizing the same on any writ of replevin or other like process" and insert "; Provided, That the term private dwelling shall be construed to include the room or rooms used and occupied solely as a residence in an apartment house, hotel, or boarding house," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 25. It shall be unlawful to have or possess any liquor or property designed for the manufacture of liquor intended for use in violating this title or which has been so used, and no property rights shall exist in any such liquor or property. A search warrant may issue as provided in Title XI of public law No. 24 of the Sixty-fifth Congress, approved June 15, 1917, and such liquor and other property seized shall be subject to such disposition as the court may make thereof. If it is found that such liquor or property was so unlawfully held or possessed, or had been so unlawfully used, it shall be destroyed, unless the court shall otherwise order as to the property other than the liquor as provided in the next succeeding section. No search warrant shall issue to search any private dwelling occupied as such unless it is being used for the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor, or unless it is in part used for some business purpose such as a store, shop, saloon, restaurant, hotel, or boarding house: Provided, That the term private dwelling shall be construed to include the room or rooms used and occupied solely as a residence in an apartment house, hotel, or boarding house.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill concerning the section which has just been read, whether the right to have wines in one's own house is recognized by the bill as a personal right?

Mr. STERLING. I think the bill takes care of that, I will say to the Senator. It provides that no search warrant shall issue for the search of any private dwelling.

Mr. PHELAN. Then, it is a personal right of the dweller in a house to have in his possession the prohibited wine and liquor?

Mr. STERLING. I think so.

Mr. PHELAN. Then, being a personal right, the right follows the person, so that if he moves to another house he can take with him the wine and liquor.

Mr. STERLING. I am inclined to think he can. I have been asked that question more than once; and that is my opinion.

Mr. PHELAN. Whether or not the dwelling to which he moves is outside of the State or district in which he formerly lived.

Mr. STERLING. I am inclined to think so.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator can do it if he drinks it before he starts. [Laughter.]

Mr. PHELAN. That is not the answer, Mr. President, that I elicited. That involves the question of capacity. [Laughter.]

Mr. STERLING. The provision is as follows:

But it shall not be unlawful to possess liquors in one's private dwelling while the same is occupied and used by him as his dwelling only and such liquor need not be reported.

Mr. PHELAN. Then, as I understand, Senators on returning to their several homes in due course, may take with them the remnants of their cellars without providing also the "senatorial container."

Mr. STERLING. The Senator will have to put his own interpretation on the bill in that respect.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, on page 32, line 4, to change the number of the section from 27 to 26; in the same line, before the words "the commissioner," to strike out "That when" and insert "When"; in line 14, after the word "Such," to strike out "officers" and insert "officer"; in line 18, after the word "with," to strike out "two or more" and insert "sufficient"; in line 21, before the word "conditioned," to insert "shall be"; in line 23, after the word "conviction," to insert "of the person so arrested"; in line 25, after the word "owner," to strike out "such as ignorance of the purpose for which his team, vehicle, water or air craft, or automobile was being used" and insert "shall"; on page 33, line 8, before the word "having," to strike out "leinor" and insert "lienor"; in line 12, before the word "liens," to strike out "It being provided that all" and insert "All"; in line 17, before the words "a description," to strike out "giving" and insert "with"; in line 18, after the word "or," to strike out "county" and insert "county where taken"; in line 21, after the word "weeks," to insert "a copy of said advertisement to be mailed to the manufacturer of said vehicle, if known"; in line 23, before the word "posted," to strike out "notices" and insert "handbills"; and on page 34, line 1, after the word "costs," to strike out "and advertising," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 26. When the commissioner, his assistants, inspectors, or any officer of the law shall discover any person in the act of transporting in violation of the law, intoxicating liquors in any wagon, buggy, automobile, water or air craft, or other vehicle, it shall be his duty to seize any and all intoxicating liquors found therein being transported contrary to law. Whenever intoxicating liquors transported or possessed illegally shall be seized by an officer he shall take possession of the vehicle and team or automobile, boat, air or water craft, or any other conveyance, and shall arrest any person in charge thereof. Such officer shall at once proceed against the person arrested under the provisions of this title in any court having competent jurisdiction; but the said vehicle or conveyance shall be returned to the owner upon execution by him of a good and valid bond, with sufficient sureties, in a sum double the value of the property, which said bond shall be approved by said officer and shall be conditioned to return said property to the custody of said officer on the day of trial to abide the judgment of the court. The court upon conviction of the person so arrested shall order the liquor destroyed, and unless good cause to the contrary is shown by the owner shall order a sale by public auction of the property seized, and the officer making the sale, after deducting the expenses of keeping the property, the fee for the seizure, and the cost of the sale, shall pay all liens, according to their priorities, which are established, by intervention or otherwise at said hearing or in other proceeding brought for said purpose, as being bona fide and as having been created without the lienor having any notice that the carrying vehicle was being used or was to be used for illegal transportation of liquor, and shall pay the balance of the proceeds into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts. All liens against property sold under the provisions of this section shall be transferred from the property to the proceeds of the sale of the property. If, however, no one shall be found claiming the team, vehicle, water or air craft, or automobile, the taking of the same, with a description thereof, shall be advertised in some newspaper published in the city or county where taken, or if there be no newspaper published in such city or county, in a newspaper having circulation in the county, once a week for two weeks, a copy of said advertisement to be mailed to the manufacturer of said vehicle, if known, and by handbills posted in three public places near the place of seizure, and if no claimant shall appear within 10 days after the last publication of the advertisement the property shall be sold and the proceeds after deducting the expenses and costs shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, line 4, to change the number of the section from "28" to "27"; in the same line, before the word "all," to strike out "That in" and insert "In"; in line 11, after the word "purchase," to strike out "liquor" with a comma and insert "liquor" without a comma; in line 14, after the word "seized," to insert "and condemned"; and in the same line, after the word "proceeding," to insert "brought for violation of law," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 27. In all cases in which intoxicating liquors may be subject to be destroyed under the provisions of this act the court shall have jurisdiction upon the application of the United States attorney to order them delivered to any department or agency of the United States Government for medicinal, mechanical, or scientific uses, or to order the same sold at private sale for such purposes to any person having a permit to purchase liquor the proceeds to be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of miscellaneous receipts, and all liquor heretofore seized and condemned in any suit or proceeding brought for violation of law may likewise be so disposed of.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, line 16, to change the number of the section from "29" to "28," and in the same line, before the word "commissioner," to strike out "That the" and insert "The," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 28. The commissioner, his assistants, agents, and inspectors, and all other officers of the United States, whose duty it is to enforce criminal laws, shall have all the power and protection in the enforcement of this act or any provisions thereof which is conferred by law for the enforcement of existing laws relating to the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors under the law of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I call the chairman's attention to line 22 on page 12, to the figures "30." The reference there is to section 30 of this title.

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator that that is a mistake.

Mr. THOMAS. Should not that be changed to "29"?

Mr. STERLING. Yes. I am glad the Senator spoke of that. I offer that as a committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, line 22, after the word "section," it is proposed to strike out the numerals "30" and insert "29."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, on page 34, line 24, to change the number of the section from 30 to 29; in the same line, before the word "person", to strike out "That any" and insert "Any," and in the same line, after the word "manufactures", to strike out "intoxicating liquor, or any wholesale or retail druggist or pharmacist who" and insert "or," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 29. Any person who manufactures or sells liquor in violation of this title shall for a first offense be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not exceeding six months, and for a second or subsequent offense shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $2,000 and be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than five years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 35, line 7, after the word "violating", to strike out "any of the provisions of this title, or"; in line 8, before the word "any" where it occurs the second time, to strike out "making" and insert "who makes"; in line 9, after the word "affidavit", to insert "required by this title, or violates any of the provisions of this title"; in line 10, after the word "which," to insert "offense"; and in line 19, after the word "indictment," to insert "the penalties provided in this act against the manufacture of liquor without a permit shall not apply to a person for manufacturing nonintoxicating cider and fruit juices exclusively for use in his home," so as to make the clause read:

Any person violating the provisions of any permit, or who makes any false record, report, or affidavit required by this title, or violates any of the provisions of this title, for which offense a special penalty is not prescribed, shall be fined for a first offense not more than $500; for a second offense not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or be imprisoned not more than 90 days; for any subsequent offense he shall be fined not less than $500 and be imprisoned not less than three months nor more than two years. It shall be the duty of the prosecuting officer to ascertain whether the defendant has been previously convicted and to plead the prior conviction in the affidavit, information, or indictment. The penalties provided in this act against the manufacture of liquor without a permit shall not apply to a person for manufacturing nonintoxicating cider and fruit juices exclusively for use in his home.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, in line 19, page 35, in the copy of the bill I have, the word "indictment" is misspelled.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has heretofore ruled on all bills that the clerks will act as proof readers, and spell the words in the English language.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, referring to the amendment which was just agreed to, I should like to learn from the chairman of the committee the exact significance of the amendment, which reads as follows:

The penalties provided in this act against the manufacture of liquor without a permit shall not apply to a person for manufacturing nonintoxicating cider and fruit juices exclusively for use in his home.

It is the practice of certain of our citizens—our Italian-American citizens and our Greek-American citizens—to make a small quantity of wine for domestic consumption in their own homes. Now, of course, wine is a fruit juice, and I suppose it is embraced within the meaning of the amendment.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator will notice that the amendment does not permit the manufacture of intoxicating wines and fruit juices. Under the constitutional amendment we could not authorize the manufacture of wines or fruit juices which would be intoxicating.

Mr. PHELAN. Do I understand that the definition of intoxicating liquors in this bill applies to this particular paragraph as defining what intoxicating beverages shall be?

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator from California that there may be some question about that, but I think what is meant here is as to whether or not it is intoxicating in fact.

Mr. PHELAN. Then that has to be determined, possibly, by a court in adjudicating the matter?

Mr. STERLING. It might be determined by a court in any given case. If the case arises under this provision, it would be determined by the court.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. PHELAN. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. Would it not be a question of fact for the jury to pass on in trying the case?

Mr. STERLING. Why, certainly. If there is a case, it will be a question of fact for a jury.

Mr. PHELAN. I did not hear what the Senator from Kansas said.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator from Kansas suggests that it will be a question of fact for a jury to determine in any given case. I agree with him in that.

Mr. PHELAN. I think that is more satisfactory than an arbitrary definition.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, on page 35, line 24, to change the number of the section from 31 to 30; and, in the same line, before the word "person," to strike out "That no" and insert "No," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 30. No person shall be excused, on the ground that it may tend to incriminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture, from attending and testifying, or producing books, papers, documents, and other evidence in obedience to a subpœna of any court in any suit or proceeding based upon or growing out of any alleged violation of this act; but no natural person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing as to which, in obedience to a subpœna and under oath, he may so testify or produce evidence, but no person shall be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 36, line 11, to change the number of the section from 32 to 31; in the same line, before the word "case," to strike out "That in" and insert "In"; and in line 16, after the word "from," to strike out "or through," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 31. In case of a sale of liquor where the delivery thereof was made by a common or other carrier the sale and delivery shall be deemed to be made in the county or district wherein the delivery was made by such carrier to the consignee, his agent or employee, or in the county or district wherein the sale was made, or from which the shipment was made, and prosecution for such sale or delivery may be had in any such county or district.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 36, line 20, to change the number of the section from 33 to 32; and in the same line, before the word "any," to strike out "That in" and insert "In," so as to make the clause read:

SEC. 32. In any affidavit, information, or indictment for the violation of this act, separate offenses may be united in separate counts and the defendant may be tried on all at one trial and the penalty for all offenses may be imposed. It shall not be necessary in any affidavit, information, or indictment to give the name of the purchaser or to include any defensive negative averments, but it shall be sufficient to state that the act complained of was then and there prohibited and unlawful, but this provision shall not be construed to preclude the trial court from directing the furnishing the defendant a bill of particulars when it deems it proper to do so.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 37, line 7, to change the number of the section from 34 to 33; in the same line, before "February," to strike out "That after" and insert "After"; and in line 12, after the word "title," to insert "In any proceeding brought for a violation of section 3 of this title, the burden of proof shall be on the defendant to establish that the liquor in question does not contain more than one-half of 1 per cent by volume of alcohol," so as to read:

SEC. 33. After February 1, 1920, the possession of liquors by any person not legally permitted under this title to possess liquor shall be prima facie evidence that such liquor is kept for the purpose of being sold, bartered, exchanged, given away, furnished, or otherwise disposed of in violation of the provisions of this title. In any proceeding brought for a violation of section 3 of this title, the burden of proof shall be on the defendant to establish that the liquor in question does not contain more than one-half of 1 per cent by volume of alcohol.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think the words "section 3" as used in that amendment really refers to section 4. I rose, however, to submit one or two remarks concerning this amendment:

In any proceeding brought for a violation of section 3 of this title, the burden of proof shall be on the defendant to establish that the liquor in question does not contain more than one-half of 1 per cent by volume of alcohol.

Section 4 of the bill, if I mistake not—I think that is the section——

Mr. STERLING. I think section 3 is the section referred to, and that that is a proper reference.

Mr. THOMAS. In any event, previous sections of the bill prescribe offenses and penalties therefor, and prosecutions under them which shall, upon conviction, subject the defendant to punishment by way of fine or imprisonment, or both. Now, it is an accepted principle of the common law, as applicable to the administration of criminal justice in the Federal courts as in the State courts, that the burden of proof is never upon the defendant, and can not be in any part without violating that presumption of innocence to which he is entitled by centuries of adjudications which are practically without exception in the administration of justice in English-speaking countries. It would seem, therefore, upon the face of the matter, that this amendment, by shifting the burden of proof concerning the alcoholic contents of the liquor, violates a well-known principle of criminal jurisprudence, and one which experience has demonstrated to be necessary to the protection of the innocent.

This is a very drastic bill, one whose provisions in the course of a few years in all probability will be violated with impunity, because the proceedings under it will not have the sanction of public opinion; but the first few years during which this law is in operation will be marked by a very vigorous attempt at enforcement, and the sentiment of the public being decidedly in favor of the principles of the bill, the tendency to prosecution will be more marked, in all probability, than later on. I very much question either our power to shift the burden of proof by requiring the defendant to establish this condition, or, even if we could do so, that it is just and proper.

The liquor itself, I suppose, in the great majority of cases, will be seized or secured, and its contents will be then the subject of chemical analysis. It is a comparatively easy thing for the prosecution to establish if the fact be as alleged in the complaint against the defendant. Moreover, this amendment requires the defendant to prove the existence of a negative. Some writers upon the subject of evidence, considered to be fairly standard authorities in the days when I was at the bar, lay down as a general principle the impossibility of proving a negative. I suppose it can be done; in some instances it has been done; but certainly it is more in accord with our conceptions of judicial procedure in this country to require the prosecution to prove an affirmative than to require the defendant to establish a negative, when both affirmative and negative relate to the same subject.

I therefore shall submit a motion to strike out that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes seem to have it.

Mr. KIRBY. I ask for a roll call on that amendment, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, in order to save the trouble of a roll call I ask unanimous consent that the roll call be suspended, and that the provision to which the Senator from Colorado objects be stricken out of the bill; in other words, that his motion prevail.

Mr. KIRBY. I object to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an objection. The Secretary will proceed with the roll call.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. SHERMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] and vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. He is absent from the Chamber, and I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Arizona] is detained from the Senate on important public business, and if present he would vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to inquire whether the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and vote "nay."

Mr. BALL. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], which I am unable to transfer. I do not know how he would vote. So I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am paired with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If he were present, I would vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS. I have a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] on account of illness. His pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] has been announced.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I have a pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], which I transfer to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] and vote "yea."

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] are detained on official business.

Mr. KING. The senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY] are absent on public business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the Senator from Wyoming Mr. KENDRICK];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH];

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE];

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY]; and

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON].

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS—23.

Ashurst	Harris	Nelson	Sherman
Capper	Harrison	Newberry	Smoot
Curtis	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Sterling

Myers	Pomerene	Smith, Md.	Underwood
New	Reed	Spencer	Walsh, Mont.
Penrose	Robinson	Stanley	Williams
Phipps	Shields	Swanson

So the amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 37, in line 18, after the word "after," to strike out "January 16, 1920," and insert "the date when the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States goes into effect"; in line 24, after the words "not be," to strike out "reported; but" and insert "reported; provided"; in line 25, after the word "liquors," to strike out "must be used" and insert "are for use only"; and on page 38, line 4, after the word "possessor," to insert "in any action concerning the same," so as to read:

SEC. 33. Every person legally permitted under this title to have liquor shall report to the commissioner within 10 days after the date when the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States goes into effect, the kind and amount of intoxicating liquors in his possession. But it shall not be unlawful to possess liquors in one's private dwelling while the same is occupied and used by him as his dwelling only, and such liquor need not be reported; provided such liquors are for use only for the personal consumption of the owner thereof and his family residing in such dwelling and of his bona fide guests when entertained by him therein; and the burden of proof shall be upon the possessor in any action concerning the same to prove that such liquor was lawfully acquired, possessed, and used.

Mr. THOMAS. In behalf of the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], myself, and others similarly situated, I should like to inquire from the Senator having charge of the bill whether under this amendment on page 37, line 18, we are to be required to report the kind and amount of intoxicating liquors which we may have in our closets and under our beds at home?

Mr. STERLING. I can only answer it by referring to the language of the section, as follows:

But it shall not be unlawful to possess liquors in one's private dwelling while the same is occupied and used by him as his dwelling only, and such liquor need not be reported, provided such liquors are for use only for the personal consumption of the owner thereof—

And so forth.

Mr. THOMAS. I noticed that the section continues with the sentence:

But it shall not be unlawful to possess liquors in one's private dwelling while the same is occupied and used by him—

And so forth.

Of course that means the owner of a private dwelling is legally permitted to have liquor; but I think if such individual is required to make reports within 10 days after the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution goes into effect the commissioner will have to hire some extra help to keep track of the reports. Moreover, I do not think it is a just requirement.

Mr. STERLING. He is not required to report at all.

Mr. THOMAS. If that is the proper conclusion with reference to the phraseology used, I have no objection to it; but the two sentences together would on the face of them imply a different construction to my mind.

Mr. President, for the reason which I assigned against the amendment which was rejected, if it is the proper formula, I move to strike out, on page 38, everything after the word "therein," in line 3, down to and including line 6.

Mr. STERLING. Will not the Senator wait until we have disposed of the committee amendments?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The agreement was to first consider the committee amendments.

Mr. THOMAS. Very well; I will wait.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 38, line 7, to change the number of the section from 35 to 34; in the same line, after the number "34," to strike out "That it shall be the duty of the commissioner to file the reports, statements, and information required by this title as a part of the files of his office in a permanent record alphabetically arranged and indorse on each the date when filed, and to permit any person desiring to do so to inspect the said reports, statements, and information at any time during office hours. It shall be the further duty of said commissioner to furnish certified copies of such reports, statements, information, and of his indorsement thereon of the date when filed, to any person requesting the same, upon payment of the reasonable fees therefor, and such certified copy shall be competent evidence in any suit or proceeding in which said original report, statement, information, or indorsement would be competent"; in line 21, after the word "records," to strike out "'required by this act to be kept by any manufacturer, wholesale or retail druggist, physician, or carrier" and insert "and reports kept or filed under the provisions of this act"; in line 24, after the word "reasonable," to strike out "hours" and insert "hour"; and in the same line, after the word "by," to strike out "any of the officers authorized to enforce this title, including the peace officers in the State where the record is kept" and insert "the commissioner or any of his agents or by any public prosecutor or by any person designated by him, and copies of such records and reports duly certified by the person with whom kept or filed may be introduced in evidence with like effect as the originals thereof," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 34. All records and reports kept or filed under the provisions of this act shall be subject to inspection at any reasonable hour by the commissioner or any of his agents or by any public prosecutor or by any person designated by him, and copies of such records and reports duly certified by the person with whom kept or filed may be introduced in evidence with like effect as the originals thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 39, line 6, to change the number of the section from 36 to 35; in the same line, before the word "provisions," to strike out "That all" and insert "All"; in line 7, before the word "repealed," to strike out "only"; in the same line, after the word "repealed," to insert "only"; in line 15, after the word "sale," to strike out "such" and insert "a"; in the same line, after the word "tax," to strike out "shall be assessed"; and in line 16, after the word "law," to insert "shall be collected," so as to read:

SEC. 35. All provisions of law that are inconsistent with this act are repealed only to the extent of such inconsistency and the regulations herein provided for the manufacture or traffic in intoxicating liquor shall be construed as in addition to existing laws. This act shall not relieve anyone from paying any taxes or other charges imposed upon the manufacture or traffic in such liquor. No liquor revenue stamps or tax receipts for any illegal manufacture or sale shall be issued in advance, but upon evidence of such illegal manufacture or sale a tax in double the amount now provided by law shall be collected, with an additional penalty of $500 on retail dealers and $1,000 on manufacturers. The payment of such tax or penalty shall give no right to engage in the manufacture or sale of such liquor, or relieve anyone from criminal liability, nor shall this act relieve any person from any liability, civil or criminal, heretofore or hereafter incurred under existing laws.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, line 4, to change the number of the section from 37 to 36, and in the same line, before the word "any," to strike out "That if" and insert "If," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 36. If any provision of this act shall be held invalid it shall not be construed to invalidate other provisions of the act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, line 7, to change the number of the section from 38 to 37, and in the same line, before the word "herein," to strike out "That nothing" and insert "Nothing," so as to read:

SEC. 37. Nothing herein shall prevent the storage in United States bonded warehouses of all liquor manufactured prior to the taking effect of this act, or prevent the transportation of such liquor to such warehouses or to any wholesale druggist for sale to such druggist for purposes not prohibited when the tax is paid, and permits may be issued therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, line 18, after the word "thereof," to insert "by the usual methods of fermentation and fortification or otherwise"; in line 25, after the words "per centum of," to strike out "alcohol" and insert: "alcohol: Provided, That such liquid may be removed and transported, under bond and under such regulations as the commissioner may prescribe, from one bonded plant or warehouse to another for the purpose of having the alcohol extracted therefrom"; on page 41, line 7, after the word "liquors," to strike out the words "beer," "ale," "porter," or "wine," mentioned in section 1 of this title shall not be construed as included in the word "liquor" or the phrase "intoxicating liquor" where they contain less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, but none of the liquors mentioned in section 1 shall be sold for beverage purposes under the names therein mentioned, and the burden of proof shall be upon the one selling such beverage to show that the same contains less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume" and insert "Credit shall be allowed on the tax due on any alcohol so saved to the amount of any tax paid upon alcohol used in the fortification of the liquor from which the same is saved," so as to read:

A manufacturer of any beverage containing less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume may, on making application and giving such bond as the commissioner shall prescribe, be given a permit to develop in the manufacture thereof by the usual methods of fermentation and fortification or otherwise a liquid such as beer, ale, porter, or wine, containing more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, but before any such liquid is withdrawn from the factory or otherwise disposed of the alcoholic contents thereof shall under such rules and regulations as the commissioner may prescribe be reduced below such one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol: Provided, That such liquid may be removed and transported, under bond and under such regulations as the commissioner may prescribe, from one bonded plant or warehouse to another for the purpose of having the alcohol extracted therefrom. The alcohol removed from such liquid, if evaporated and not condensed and saved, shall not be subject to tax; if saved, it shall be subject to the same law as other alcoholic liquors. Credit shall be allowed on the tax due on any alcohol so saved to the amount of any tax paid upon alcohol used in the fortification of the liquor from which the same is saved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, line 20, to change the number of the section from 39 to 38; and on page 42, line 2, after the word "employees," to insert "except persons authorized to issue permits and agents and inspectors in the field service," so as to read:

SEC. 38. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the Attorney General of the United States are hereby respectively authorized to appoint and employ such assistants, experts, clerks, and other employees and to purchase such supplies and equipment as they may deem necessary for the enforcement of the provisions of this act, but such clerks and other employees, except persons authorized to issue permits and agents and inspectors in the field service, shall be appointed under the rules and regulations prescribed by the civil-service act.

Mr. STERLING. I ask that the amendment just read be rejected. I do this on the representation made by each of the three Civil Service Commissioners, two of whom visited me and one of whom wrote me, and who stated that there is no need to extend the terms of the civil-service act to inspectors in the field service. If there is need to have such appointments made under the civil-service act, the civil-service act itself would apply according to the terms of it, and I do not like to have an apparent infringement of the civil-service act and the rules under it when there is no necessity for it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, this was discussed thoroughly by the committee when one of the Members of the House was present. It was put in here for the reason that it was believed the civil-service law would not be enforced. The men who are to enforce the law are not school-teachers or professors or men who can stand a civil-service examination, but they are like sheriffs, deputy sheriffs, and that character of men, who have grit about them, and who will go into any place to arrest a man. It is better to appoint brave, courageous men, who probably could not stand a civil-service examination. Thousands of deputy sheriffs are men who could not pass a civil-service examination. It would probably be like an examination held in my State for a deputy clerk, where the man who made the best examination was a school-teacher who had just come off the chain gang. These men are to enforce the prohibition law, and they ought to be men who have the capacity for field service, not for clerkships. It is not the desire to have men who can do office work, such as issuing permits by the clerk of the court or a deputy, who issue them generally.

Why should these courageous men who go out into the field to enforce the revenue laws stand a civil-service examination? They ought not to be under the civil service, because the character of men you will get in that way will not be men who will enforce the law. The character of men you will get if you have to appoint them through the civil service will be men who could probably stand an examination in geography or arithmetic, but what we want are brave, courageous men, who can go out to enforce the law like the deputy sheriffs act in the enforcement of the law. That was the reason for the amendment.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator is right in saying that was the reason for the amendment. It is the very reason he has stated, but the reason for it is all done away with in the statement of the Civil Service Commissioners themselves, who say that without this provision they can appoint the men mentioned by the Senator from North Carolina to fill the places; that they have the power to do it under the civil-service act and under the rules and regulations made by the President in regard to it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes; but they would have to hold a civil-service examination, and the man who can spell and who knows geography and arithmetic will pass the examination and be first on the list, but he is no man to enforce such a criminal law as it ought to be enforced, if it is to be carried out.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will pardon me, that is just what I am trying to say to him. A man will not have to take a civil-service examination to perform those peculiar duties. He can be appointed without taking the civil-service examination.

Mr. OVERMAN. How can he be appointed under the civil-service law in any other way than under the law? The Civil Service Commissioners may state privately that they will do so and so, but I take it that the Civil Service Commission have to follow the law, and if they follow the law they will have to appoint men who stand such an examination and the men who are eligible on their list.

Mr. STERLING. I call the Senator's attention to the civil-service law itself.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Senator had better let it go to conference. It was unanimously adopted by the committee.

Mr. STERLING. I am aware of that, and I was as heartily in favor of it at the time as was the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know the Senator was.

Mr. STERLING. But if there is no necessity for appearing to set aside the civil-service law, let us not do it. That is the simple proposition involved here. Because a man is fitted especially for these duties, he may be appointed without having to take a civil-service examination or may be selected——

Mr. OVERMAN. How selected? By the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. STERLING. By the Internal Revenue Commissioner.

Mr. OVERMAN. He can not select them except under the civil-service law.

Mr. STERLING. Here is a little paragraph from the civil-service law itself. I read from section 2 of the law:

And among other things, said rules shall provide and declare, as nearly as the conditions of good administration will warrant, as follows:

Then follow some interpretations of the law and of that section of the law.

Mr. OVERMAN. Whose interpretation?

Mr. STERLING. To continue the quotation—

Section 2 of the civil-service law merely directs what the rules to be promulgated by the President shall contain. They are not mandatory or absolute, for the statutory directions are only to be followed "as nearly as the conditions of good administration will warrant." A large discretion is, therefore, left to the President to modify the statutory directions if in his judgment such action should be required for the purpose of good administration.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know that many have been appointed under that regulation who should not have been appointed. I know how such appointments have been made. Why not provide in the law that the commissioner shall appoint? He will select the right sort of men, and is the proper man to judge of their qualifications.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] that in view of the statement of the Civil Service Commission this amendment ought to be rejected. It is true that at the meeting of the subcommittee this provision was inserted for the particular reasons which the Senator from North Carolina has outlined, that in some of these cases, involving the investigation of various infractions of the law, it would be necessary to select men who would not be able to pass any civil-service examination; but it would be better even if those men were appointed by the Civil Service Commission and thus be taken out of any possibility of political control and manipulation; and there would be great opportunity for that to occur probably in a great many cases.

In addition to that, there is another reason that applies to a portion of this amendment only. I desire to call the Senator's attention to it. The exception reads as follows:

Except persons authorized to issue permits and agents and inspectors in the field service.

I confess when I saw the amendment printed in the bill I did not understand, and I do not now understand, why the subcommittee included in that exception persons authorized to issue permits. Such persons can pass the civil-service examination; at least they ought not to be taken out from under the control of the civil service. There is no reason for that.

Mr. OVERMAN. The argument was made before the Senate committee that in the counties probably the clerk of the court or the register of deeds or some one else who held public office would always be selected to issue such permits. Such a person should not be required to take a civil-service examination, for all he would have to do would be to issue a permit. If such authority were given to a clerk of a court, a register of deeds, a notary public, or some one who held public office, there would be no reason why such a person should be under the civil service. That consideration controlled the matter with the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, where matters of character are involved rather than mere knowledge the Civil Service Commission sends out clerks to look into the question of a man's character and force. That is about what is now done under the President's post-office arrangement. I am glad to get rid of being responsible for post offices; but I am obliged to admit that I do not think such employees of the commission really have the judgment which in all cases enables them to select the best men who are presented. I had myself rather risk the judgment of a collector in a State who is interested in the administration of the law than that of a couple of deputies in the Civil Service Commission to pass on matters of character.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. FRANCE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. Let us get through with these amendments.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the latitude of debate which is permitted in this august body prompts me at this time to invite attention for just a moment or two to a matter that was presented to the Senate a few days ago by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE]. As I remember, he caused to be——

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Utah if he will not defer his remarks until we reach Title III, which is the next title of the pending bill. I think it will take but a short time to dispose of the bill up to that point, and then I shall make a motion with reference to a recess until to-morrow.

Mr. KING. I shall not be here to-morrow and what I desire to say will not consume much time.

Mr. STERLING. Very well, but if the Senator will only wait a few moments we shall reach Title III, and then I shall agree to suspend for the day the further consideration of the bill at that time.

Mr. KING. Can the Senator from South Dakota assure the Senator from Utah that the consideration of the matter which he is now pressing with so much urgency will consume only a few moments? Of course, I can appreciate the fact that a bill that involves matters of such great importance as does this ought not to require any attention at the hands of the Senate. We pass legislation so hurriedly that it is wholly unimportant whether we consider it or not. So I can understand the anxiety of the distinguished Senator from South Dakota to pass this bill through without any delay. However, in deference to my friend from South Dakota I will suspend for a moment.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 42, in line 8, after the word "hereby," to strike out "authorized to be"; in line 10, after the word "appropriated," to insert "the sum of $3,500,000 or so much thereof"; in line 11, before the words "as may," to strike out "such sum"; and in the same line, after the words "may be," to strike out "required" and insert "necessary," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the commissioner and Attorney General in making such appointments shall give preference to those who have served in the military or naval service in the recent war, if otherwise qualified, and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,500,000 or so much thereof as may be necessary for the enforcement of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 42, line 13, to change the number of the section from 40 to 39; and in the same line, before the word "all," to strike out "That in" and insert "In," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 39. In all cases wherein the property of any citizen is proceeded against or wherein a judgment affecting it might be rendered, and the citizen is not the one who in person violated the provisions of the law, summons must be issued in due form and served personally, if said person is to be found within the jurisdiction of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 42, after line 18, to strike out:

SEC. 41. Nothing in this title shall be held to apply to the manufacture, sale, importation, possession, or distribution of wine for sacramental purposes, except sections 6 and 10 hereof, and the sections of this act prescribing penalties for the violation of either of said sections. No person to whom a permit may be issued to manufacture, import, or sell wines for sacramental purposes shall sell, barter, exchange, or give any such to any person not a rabbi, minister of the gospel, or priest, nor to any such except upon an application duly subscribed by him and indorsed by an official specially designated for such purpose by the head of the conference or diocese or other ecclesiastical jurisdiction in which he is officiating, which application shall be filed and preserved by the seller. The head of any conference or diocese or other ecclesiastical jurisdiction may designate any rabbi, minister, or priest to supervise the manufacture of wine to be used for sacramental purposes, and the person so designated shall be entitled to a permit, to be issued by the commissioner, authorizing him so to supervise such manufacture: Provided, however, That the foregoing provisions of this section shall not apply to any officer, minister, priest, or rabbi of any church or religious organization who is unwilling or unable to comply with the same, but such officer, minister, priest, or rabbi may manufacture, purchase, possess, and use wine for sacramental purposes under permits issued under and subject to the provisions of this title.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as I was saying when I yielded to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING]——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I ask that the bill be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senator from Utah may make his speech.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will permit me, I was speaking to the bill.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator is going to speak to the bill, very well.

Mr. KING. However, I have no objection to the bill being temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be temporarily laid aside, and the Senator from Utah is recognized.

DISPOSITION OF THRACE.

Mr. KING. I was calling attention, Mr. President, to some observations which were submitted by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] a few days ago, at which time he had read from the desk an article which had been written by Mr. Simonds. As I remember the article, it stated that Mr. Veniselos, the great statesman of Greece, had repudiated the league of nations and had announced that he would no longer give it his support. My information was entirely different from that contained in the article, and I am glad to learn that Mr. Simonds was incorrect and that the league covenant still has the support of one of the greatest statesmen of the world. I noticed in last evening's Star an article which I think places the matter in the correct light. The article reads as follows:

DENIES HE HAS LOST FAITH IN LEAGUE—PREMIER OF GREECE CONTRADICTS REPORTS MADE PUBLIC IN AMERICA.

Premier Veniselos, of Greece, in a letter to the American ambassador at Paris made public to-day by the State Department, denied reports published in America that he had publicly stated his loss of confidence in the league of nations because of the American attitude with regard to Thrace. He asked that President Wilson be advised that he had undergone no change of sentiment with regard to the proposed world society.

QUOTES AMERICAN PRESS.

After quoting from American press reports as to his attitude, and recalling that "the question went so far even as to occupy the Senate," Premier Veniselos wrote:

"I desire, therefore, in view of the importance attached to the above news, to state categorically that I have not made the above statement, and it really grieves me to know that I could have been thought capable of it.

VIEW OF LEAGUE UNCHANGED.

"Notwithstanding the disappointment I may feel because of the Thracian question—a very vital one for Greece—my views regarding the league of nations—a world-wide structure to which I have also contributed in the measure of my ability—have not and could not change."

I wanted, Mr. President, to present to the Senate the facts with respect to the present attitude of this great representative of the Hellenic people, and to invite attention to a resolution which I offered some time ago, and which is now before the Foreign Relations Committee, relating to the subject of Greece and the Thracian question. The resolution reads, in part, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that, in the treaties of peace with Bulgaria and with Turkey, western or Bulgarian Thrace to the line of the Arda River and eastern or Turkish Thrace, including Adrianople, to the line from Enos on the Ægean Sea to Midia on the Black Sea, should be awarded to Greece, proper facilities for Bulgarian commerce to be reserved at Saloniki, Kavalla, and Dedeagatch.

Mr. President, it has repeatedly been stated that the representatives of our Government recently at the Paris conference have determined to dismember Thrace, internationalizing the central portion of it, giving a portion to Bulgaria and the extreme eastern and western strips to Greece. I can not believe that the American representatives at the peace conference have resolved upon such a policy. It is manifestly so unwise, it is so against the geographic and the ethnographic situation as, in my opinion, to be the basis of great controversies in the future if it should be carried into effect.

Thrace is a part of Greece; it belongs to Greece; and in the treaty which is now being prepared in Paris it ought to be awarded to Greece. If I had time I should be glad to put into the RECORD representations made by Americans, by those who are familiar with the situation in Greece as well as by the inhabitants of this land which is about to be dismembered, with a view to showing the serious mistake which would be made by dividing Thrace, as some of the dispatches indicate the present purpose to be.

I am afraid, Mr. President, that there has been a propaganda carried on in the United States and elsewere by some of the representatives of Roberts College, as well as by other agencies, to influence this country as well as its representatives in Paris against Greece and for the purpose of giving to Bulgaria territory to which she is not entitled. It is well known that some of those who are interested in Roberts College were the stanch defenders of Bulgaria during the past war. When she cast her fortunes with the Central Powers these same representatives justified her course; when the evidences of the atrocities of Bulgaria were presented in indisputable form to the world prominent Americans, some of whom were connected with this college, were quick to apologize for Bulgaria.

There seems to be a disposition upon the part of some to treat Bulgaria, which was our enemy, the enemy of civilization, and the enemy of the Allies during the war, with greater consideration than Greece, who was the friend of the allied Governments, is to be treated.

Thrace is largely inhabited by Greeks. More than 768,000 Greeks reside in Thrace, while only 112,000 Bulgarians are residents of Thrace. I can not conceive of any reason why Thrace should be dismembered, why Greece should be affronted, and why Bulgaria should receive as the spoils of war a portion of the territory that naturally belongs to Greece. It looks as though the policy is to punish our friend and our ally and to reward the enemy of our allies, if not our own enemy.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope that the Committee on Foreign Relations will promptly report the part of the resolution which I have read with a favorable recommendation. I should like to see it passed by the Senate. It may be too late to influence our representatives at the peace conference. I sincerely hope, however, that they will go no further in the reported plan to dismember Thrace and to award a portion of it to Bulgaria, which has been the enemy of the Allies during the Great War.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I suppose that no man living has a higher degree of sympathy with Greece and with the Greeks than I have. Their past history, their literature, the "fierce Athenian democracy," the sturdy Spartan phalanxes, the Theban legion, and all that sort of thing remain with me as sort of hero dream put into my mind very early in my life. I am especially sympathetic with the idea of giving Greece all of the Greek population upon the Thracian and Macedonian coasts. There are, however, some very deep-fraught questions connected with the disposal of the territory along the Ægean Sea. In the first place, we meet there with a seething caldron of mixed races unexampled anywhere else in the world, and unprecedented at any other time in the history of the world—Bulgars, Serbians, Greeks, Turks, all mixed up—and if anybody undertook to make an ethnological division of territories in accordance with the races or branches of the white race peopling those territories he would find himself totally unable to do it except right along the seacoast itself. It has been a characteristic of the Greek from the times of the "fierce Athenian democracies," to which I referred a moment ago, to take possession of the seacoasts nearly everywhere, occupy them, and colonize them; and it never was a part of the genius of the nation to go far into the "hinterland." As a consequence, you find all along the Thracian coast and the coasts of the Ægean Sea generally, and even in Asia Minor, Greeks for a quarter of a mile or half a mile or two miles, and back of that, pretty nearly everybody else in the world except Greeks.

In addition to the difficulty of making a division of territory according to ethnological lines of demarcation, there is also the difficulty of giving to each country some access to the sea. I have no sort of sympathy with Bulgaria as a country and none with the Bulgars as a people. They are neither fish, flesh, nor fowl. They are neither Teutons, Slavs, nor Latins. They are an accidental, insulated race of barbarians who were dropped down in that part of Europe long ago, a little bit like the old Borussians, the ancestors of the modern Prussians, who seem to have been left over and insulated by the civilized peoples surrounding them in the early days, until the Teutonic knights came in and propagated a race the substratum of which was Borussian and barbaric and the upper stratum of which was German and cruel. The so-called Prussian spirit finally infected all the country along the Baltic in Pomerania and Prussia and late all of Germany subject to Prussia.

The Bulgars are a good deal the same sort of people. I beg Senators to remember that there were at Paris not only Greeks and not only Bulgars and not only Italians and not only Americans, but everybody interested in the solution of these questions; and it is absolutely impossible to decide that a given 10 acres square, or 40 acres square, or that many square miles either, shall be dedicated to the government of one race because it occupies the seacoast.

The Greek is so far superior to the Bulgar in my opinion—in native ability, in amiability, in adaptability, in ideal, and in tradition—that there is no comparison between them; and, as the Senator has just said, the Greek has been our friend just as soon as he could get rid of King Constantine and his Prussian wife, and the Bulgar has been our enemy, and not only our enemy but a treacherous enemy, negotiating with us until the night before he betrayed us to Germany. But, all the same, the object of this treaty is to leave things in such a status as that there may be as little cause for war as possible in the future, and we have got to give some degree of justice even to those that we despise—I will not say "hate," because the Bulgar is not worthy of hatred. We must give some degree of justice even to them, especially when we know that they are habitual peace breakers and innately feel that we do not want to be reduced to the necessity of butchering them if they dare break out again.

I beg Senators to remember that the commissioners of the United States at Paris have a hundred points of information where I have one, or where any other Senator has one. In fact, we have no information except that which is furnished us by somebody in America seeking some purpose in Europe for his own selfish benefit or for the selfish benefit of his own race or nation. I was reading just yesterday and last night a couple of books, one from the Polish standpoint and one from the Lithuanian standpoint, and one or the other of them was written by the biggest liar that ever existed since the world began, and I frankly confess that I do not know which. I have been a tolerably diligent student of history of even the minor races of the world, and thought I knew something about the ethnological geography of Central Europe, but if one side of these peoples is telling the truth the other side of this story is written by the biggest liar that ever was born, and if the other side is telling the truth that side's story is written by the biggest liar ever born. That is the sort of information we get here. Those people representing America in Paris get information from every side, not only from the parties interested, but from all the other Governments and functionaries and voluntary witnesses representing various races and hereditary stocks that have been able to appear before them. If I had my own way right now, offhand, I would give to Greece all of Thrace and the entire Dalmatian coast from about one-third up into Albania down; but I confess that I never have been able to put my intellect as an absentee, not acquainted with all the information, against an equally good intellect present and considering things, and presumably acquainted more or less with all of the information.

So, if there should be anything coming out of the conference at Paris and the treaty with Austria and Hungary and Turkey which would disappoint us with regard to the Greeks, let us all make up our minds that there are various things in connection with the league of nations that give a chance later to amend errors made now—amongst other things the power granted to the league to sit in judgment upon "interpretations of treaties" and the power granted to consider any complaint that any given situation in the world is a menace to or "threatens the world's peace." If later on it should turn out that such mistakes have been made with regard to Poland or Lithuania or Greece or Bulgaria or Roumania as might menace the world's peace, those questions will be brought before the league of nations, where we will be represented, and perhaps the afterthought of the league may be better than the forethought of the council.

So I beg Senators to hold their souls in patience and to hope for the best; about the sole hope of the world right now is this league of nations, and, whatever these people do in Paris, we must expect errors and look forward to amending errors later.

When the Constitution of the United States was first offered, Mr. President, it hurt the feelings of Thomas Jefferson, amongst other men, very much. Old George Mason and Patrick Henry and a lot of others went in to oppose it—Samuel Adams, too, amongst the most thorough patriots of the American Revolution. Thomas Jefferson did not like a lot of things about it, but he, in substance, said: "It is the right step to be taken now. Accept it, and, under the power of amendment provided for in it, amend it. I suggest that there should be a bill of rights accompanying it." And he really suggested, in letters from Paris to America, substantially the first 10 amendments that were passed; and they were almost unanimously—I believe literally unanimously—I do not remember whether any State voted against them or not—adopted and became parts of the Constitution of the United States.

Now, wherever we can make an amendment for the good after we go into this—this is an experimental map to a certain extent, as well as an experimental world peace constitution—after we go into it there will present themselves from time to time errors so plain and palpable and obvious that they will be corrected unanimously, just as the Constitution was amended in the first 10 amendments.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, allow me to interrupt the Senator right there. Not only were the first 10 amendments ratified promptly, but when we reflect upon how poor the means of communication were—only by little packet boats and buckboards——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Stagecoach and horseback.

Mr. ASHURST. Stagecoach and horseback—the entire 10 that were ratified were ratified in two years and three months, exactly. The whole 10 were ratified in two years and three months.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And most of them were adopted by resolutions of the legislatures of the States, before they went in, asking Congress to submit, after ratification and not as a part of the ratification, such-and-such resolutions.

Thomas Jefferson displayed his wisdom. The difference between a statesman and a mere politician, Mr. President, is this: A statesman looks to the future, and he looks to the entire world environment. A politician looks to his "deestrict" and to the immediate future. These gentlemen who have been opposing this treaty and the league of nations are, with all of their other virtues, men of narrow vision, who do not look much beyond their "deestricts" or their party, or much beyond the immediate visible horizon.

I am particularly interested when a man like the Senator from Utah, who I know is a good friend of the peace of the world, and who wants to do all he can for it, insists upon a matter that I regard as minor, though it may be major for the particular people interested. As a friend of mine once said to me, "It is a very immaterial matter to the world whether I collect the thousand dollars that Jim Smith owes me or not, but it means my bankruptcy if I do not." [Laughter.] I am always, as an American and a world citizen, interested, then, to sound the call for patience, and for long sight instead of short sight, and broad sight instead of narrow sight, and impartial envisionment instead of being guided by the interested motives of any particular race.

Of course, Mr. President, the world is a pretty small thing, and Greece is a small part of the world. Greece's business is, perhaps for her, of more importance to Greece than all the balance of the world or the balance of the universe. When I think about living on this earth, one of the minor planets in one of the minor solar systems, and think about how many other planets there are in it, and how many more suns there are outside of the planets which are in their systems revolving around them, I sometimes feel that we ought not to take any interest in anything; that we just ought to quit and wait until we die, and then trust to God to give us a still broader vision; but I do not mean to make a speech in that spirit.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just a word, but not in reply to the distinguished Senator from Mississippi. Of course, we all yield to him in his historical knowledge and in his broad statesmanship, and I say that in the most sincere fashion.

I am glad to know that he sympathizes so much with the aspirations of Greece. The Senator, though, in my opinion, while pleading for a broad and comprehensive policy and for vision in advocating a policy in opposition to the desires of Greece, is not building for the future peace of the Balkans.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the Senator's pardon; I am not advocating it. I do not know what they are going to do in Paris, but I want to hold myself ready to support it as a part of a major proposition.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, with my present views I shall support what has been done at Paris, and what may be done at Paris; but, nevertheless, I am constrained to believe that the action of our delegates in Paris, if the reports in the newspapers are accurate that they have adopted a plan to dismember Thrace, is unwise, and will not conduce to the future peace of the section of the world in which Greece is situate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, in that connection I want to say frankly that I agree with the Senator. If they have taken the action which the newspapers report, I think they have made a mistake.

Mr. KING. The English representatives at the peace conference and the French representatives at the peace conference, according to the newspapers, favored giving all of Thrace to Greece. That was the wise and the proper and the honest thing to do. It is reported that the American representatives dissented from that view. The first advisers that we had in Paris with respect to the Grecian question recommended, as I am informed, and I think credibly informed, that all of Thrace should go to Greece. Those advisors have come home. Others have taken their place. It may be that the two who have succeeded them have been converted to the Bulgarian view. Bulgaria already has two seaports upon the Black Sea. She can have a commercial port through Grecian territory upon the Ægan Sea; but to dismember Thrace, and to award any part of it to Bulgaria, is a great wrong, and one that ultimately will lead to trouble.

I sincerely hope that our representatives in Paris will not be misled by any Bulgarian propaganda, that they will remember their friends, not their enemies, and that they will do justice and not injustice.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, September 5, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, September 4, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. William Couden, late chaplain of the Second Division, American forces in Germany, offered the following prayer:

Almighty Spirit of power and grace, ofttimes in the thick of horrid conflict we prayed for our men who were carrying on both by land and sea. Yet we were never unmindful of those who were engaged in the pursuits that were brought over from peace times into war times, since those labors are always necessary. Now that the Great War has ended, we express in words our prayer that all who labor in life's necessary tasks may have Thy blessing. Grant Thy favor to farmer, mechanic, artisan; to those who toil in such industries as mining or transportation, and to all women who work or wait or weep. In the restlessness of these times may we find and follow worthy leadership. In the many conflicting claims may we heed no voice that demands less than full justice for all. And in our daily round may we often catch glimpses of Him who walks amongst us with the wounds of love upon His body. May we hear His call and answer the appeal of His eyes, that out of ignoble striving we may together follow in His steps along the pilgrim road; rough, perhaps, to the feet of the selfish, but leading at length to the city of God, the life of patience, brotherhood, and cooperation on earth. In His Name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF TAGUE AGAINST FITZGERALD.

Mr. GOODALL. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution from the Committee on Elections No. 2, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a resolution from the Committee on Elections No. 2, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Elections No. 2, to which was referred the contested-election case of Peter F. Tague, contestant, against John F. Fitzgerald, contestee, from the tenth congressional district of Massachusetts, respectfully reports to the House the following resolution approved by said committee, for approval and adoption by the House, with the recommendation that it do pass:

Resolved, That M. W. Burlen, Edward P. Murphy, Frederick J. Finnegan, and Jacob Wasserman, the members of the board of election commissioners of the city of Boston, or any successor of them in said office, be, and they are hereby, ordered to be and appear before Elections Committee No. 2 of the House of Representatives forthwith, then and there to testify before said committee or such commission as shall be appointed touching such matters then to be inquired of by said committee in the contested-election case of Peter F. Tague against John F. Fitzgerald, now before said committee for investigation and report; and that the members of the board of election commissioners of the city of Boston bring with them all such ballots and packages of ballots cast in every precinct in the said tenth congressional district of Massachusetts at the general election held in said district on the 5th day of November, 1918, as were described as challenged, disputed, or contested ballots, either at the recount of the ballots cast at said general election conducted by said board of election commissioners of the city of Boston, or at the taking of depositions before notaries public in this case; that said ballots be examined and counted by or under the authority of such Committee on Elections in said case; and to that end, that proper subpœnas be issued to the Sergeant at Arms of this House, commanding him to summons said members of the board of election commissioners of the city of Boston, or any successor in office of either of them, to appear with such ballots as witnesses in said case; that service of said subpœnas shall be deemed sufficient, if made by registered letter, and such service shall be so made unless otherwise directed by said Committee on Elections No. 2; and that the expenses of said witnesses and all other expenses under this resolution be paid out of the contingent fund of the House; and that said committee be, and hereby is, empowered to send for all other persons and papers as it may find necessary for the proper determination of said controversy; and also be, and it is, empowered to select a subcommittee to take the evidence and count said ballots or votes, and report same to the Committee on Elections No. 2 under such regulations as shall be prescribed for that purpose; and that the aforesaid expenses be paid on the requisition of the chairman of said committee after the auditing and allowance thereof by said Elections Committee No. 2.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine a few questions. Did both parties to this contest agree to this arrangement?

Mr. GOODALL. Oh, yes; both parties to the contest have agreed to have the ballots come here.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, another question. This is a very peculiar resolution. The House itself orders these people peremptorily to come here. Is there any precedent for that kind of a thing?

Mr. GOODALL. I have a little statement here which I will read, which will clear up the whole matter.

Mr. GARNER. Let us have it loud enough to hear it.

Mr. GOODALL. I read:

The form of resolution offered in this case is the same as was used in the case of Kahn v. Livernash, fourth California district, in the Fifty-eighth Congress. The purpose of bringing the ballots before the committee is as follows: One of the issues in the case is whether ballots marked in a certain way should be counted or not. The description and number of such ballots is not fully disclosed in the record, hence the inspection is necessary to determine this question. The committee is unanimous in deeming the inspection of the ballots necessary, and both parties to the contest have expressed their willingness to have them produced. The passage of this resolution is merely a formal proceeding necessitated by the practice in such cases.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, is it not unusual to have such a proposition in a resolution, for the House itself to order witnesses to come before a committee? What is the reason why you could not summon these Boston "bigwigs" just as well by subpœna as in any other case?

Mr. GOODALL. All I know about it is that I have been informed this is the proper way to do it. As I am not a lawyer, I have to take their advice.

Mr. LEHLBACH. If the gentleman from Maine will yield——

Mr. GOODALL. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LEHLBACH. It was decided that the Committees on Elections are without authority to summon witnesses or to take testimony, their jurisdiction being limited to a determination on the record. That is provided for by statute in contested-election cases. If it becomes necessary to take testimony or examine evidence that is not contained in the record produced, the authority of the House is necessary.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know that; but what I am asking about is this peculiar feature of this resolution, that the House itself commands the members of the common council of Boston—if that is what they call it up there—to come before the committee.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The House directs that a subpœna be issued for the purpose. The Speaker has no authority on his own motion to issue a subpœna, nor has the Committee on Elections the right to order the subpœna issued, but the House in this resolution authorizes the issue of a subpœna.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I understand that; but the first part of this resolution is that these members of the common council of Boston are commanded by the House of Representatives to appear before this committee.

Mr. LEHLBACH. This is a resolution for a subpœna duces tecum. The real purpose is to get the ballots here. In order to get them here the form of process is to summon the custodians of the ballots to appear as witnesses, and then the subpœna continues that they are also ordered to bring with them these ballots. There is no intention to examine these gentlemen as witnesses other than to ask them, "Are these the ballots referred to? Have they been in your custody?" That is really the form under a subpœna duces tecum.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did the gentleman ever hear of the House itself peremptorily commanding Tom, Dick, or Harry to appear before a committee of the House?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes. At the request of the chairman of the committee I examined the precedents, and the only precedent absolutely in point was in the Fifty-eighth Congress. That was in the case of Julius Kahn against Livernash, in the fourth congressional district of the State of California.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Did the gentleman examine the resolution that passed the House in the case of Higgins, of Connecticut?

Mr. LEHLBACH. I did, but in view of the fact that in the Kahn against Livernash case the purpose was to examine the ballots to ascertain the character of the marks that they contained, and as that is exactly the point in this case, I followed word for word the resolution adopted at that time by the House in the case of Kahn against Livernash. In that case the report was made by Mr. JAMES R. MANN, and presumably the resolution had his sanction, as apparently he had charge of the case.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. A later case than the one the gentleman refers to is the Higgins case; that arose, I think, in the fifth district of Connecticut. In that case it was desirable, not only because the parties had practically consented to the arrangement but because the committee thought they would like to look at the ballots, to send for the ballots themselves. Thereupon the committee reported a resolution which passed the House that merely provided power to send for those ballots, to have them brought safely to the House of Representatives to be transmitted to the Committee on Elections, and the expenses to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, certified by the chairman of the committee. That was all, and that served the purpose, because after all the only thing required was the au-of the House empowering the committee to send for those thority and thereupon in that case the chairman, acting upon ball resolution, issued what was styled a warrant directing the one to go down to the State of Connecticut, take possession of the ballots, and bring them to the House, and that course was pursued. There was no direction in any resolution to summon men, to bring them down here to be examined. It sufficed to provide the power to the committee to send for those ballots and bring them safely to the House. If the gentleman will examine that resolution, which was brief and yet all potent, it seems to me he will find there a precedent that will serve the purposes indicated by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. GOODALL].

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman from New York yield for a question?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Certainly.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Of course, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. GOODALL] has the floor. Did not the Higgins resolution provide, however, for the issuance of process for that purpose by the Speaker of the House, who alone is authorized under the rules to issue the process of the House?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. No, sir; it did not, as I recall it, and as I was chairman of the committee I have a quite clear recollection.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Under the statute of the State of Massachusetts the board of election commissioners of the city of Boston are charged with the duty of keeping these ballots in their custody. A mere request, which is not a formal process, to take those ballots from the place where the law provides that they shall be safely kept would create a doubt as to whether the officials having them in their custody were justified in removing them and bringing them to the city of Washington. Furthermore, a process which did not provide that the custodians themselves were to bring the ballots to the city of Washington might be questioned, because it would provide that they should actually leave their custody. In order that there might be no embarrassment for the local authorities in Boston, in order that there might be no excuse—although no excuse is expected to be offered—for disobeying the order that these ballots be brought here, this form has been used. The form that the gentleman refers to asked the State authorities to produce material in their custody without the issuance of a formal process under the seal of the House.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. That was the process.

Mr. LEHLBACH. It need not have been obeyed.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The House of Representatives is supreme over matters concerning the election of a Representative in Congress, and the resolution to which I referred conveyed the authority of this House, and that authority had to be obeyed by the State officers.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I think the gentleman will find that the authority of the House in that case was expressed by a process signed by the Speaker and attested by the Clerk of the House. That is the only process that is authorized to embody the authority of the House.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me this academic discussion is out of place. This is unanimous-consent day, and if anybody wants to object I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I must insist on the regular order. If the gentleman wants to object, he can do so.

Mr. BLANTON. Unless we can ask a question or two of the chairman of the committee, I shall object for the present. I desire to ask him a question or two.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that unanimous consent is not necessary for the consideration of this resolution, which is privileged.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I should like to be heard on that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order for two reasons. In the first place, there is a special order this morning that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] be heard for 15 minutes by unanimous consent. That therefore takes precedence of everything except unanimous-consent requests. So the gentleman's motion is out of order now at any rate.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 2775) to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below.

S. 2775. An act to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, gas, and sodium on the public domain; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] is recognized to address the House for 15 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, about six or seven weeks ago my colleague [Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas] introduced a bill calculated to absolutely and forever prohibit the President from leaving the confines of the United States while in office.

It is needless to say the gentleman did not expect any action on his bill, but it served its purpose, no doubt, as intended—that is, furnish a basis or excuse for an interview in which the gentleman bemoaned the fact that the President had been so entertained and beguiled by artful European diplomats as to cause him to neglect and fail to represent the interests of this Nation, to its detriment and the benefit of other nations, and no President in the future would be guilty of such high-handed conduct.

This bill, of course, was not introduced until after the President had done all in his power to bring about a condition among nations to prevent, if possible, another world war and engage in the shameful slaughter of mankind; it was after he had placed the treaty before the Senate for its ratification or rejection.

In view of the many misstatements made concerning this treaty by those opposed to it, the President has found it necessary to go before the country, as has Ex-President Taft, and tell the people the truth.

And now another one of my colleagues from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] feels it incumbent upon him to see that the President should not be guilty of any further indiscretion, but should remain here in the Capital under the watchful eye of Congress. So he introduces a resolution in which he says, among other things, "that the absence of the Chief Executive from the National Capital is fraught with very grave danger to the welfare of the country during these troublesome times of high cost of living, profiteering, the welfare of the former service men," and so forth. Does my colleague feel it is best for the President to stay here in the Capital to guide the befuddled leader of his party who is charged with the responsibility of such legislation as would result in lowering the high cost of living, or does he feel that there is danger of the repeal of the act passed a few days ago, at the request of the President by a veto, to increase the appropriations for the purpose of rehabilitating the crippled service men? The gentleman need have no fears at all about this matter, because if it should occur the President will again very promptly veto it.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYRES. Yes; for a brief question.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The President will not veto a bill complying with his request for $800,000 to help pay the expenses of the peace conference, will he?

Mr. AYRES. He will not veto any bill which has for its purpose the assisting of the former service men. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It may be in speaking of the service men that my colleague has in mind the so-called soldiers' land bill, the Mondell bill, but I should think from all reports of the caucus of the gentleman's party held a few nights ago the President can not help this any.

I probably should not use the word "caucus," as I do not wish to do my colleague an injury. You gentlemen may not know it, but it is a fact that all candidates nominated for Congress in my colleague's party in Kansas have to stand squarely on a platform in which there is a strong plank which promises that under no circumstances will the candidate, if elected, be guilty of attending a party caucus. Their constituents, you know, are afraid if they do they will become contaminated if compelled to caucus with the New England standpatters, who now, by the way, as of yore, are in the saddle driving with a tight and strong rein, and with a whip in hand that has a crack to it that would make the stand-pat leaders of olden times turn green with envy; so I say they must not caucus with such; therefore they tell their constituents they do not, but simply hold party conferences—however, they do not say behind closed doors.

I am assuming the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG], being a good party man, attended his party caucus—I mean conference—a few nights ago. If so, I now know why he is calling upon the President to remain with us and tell them what to do, and how to do it, in the way of reconstructive legislation. I believe I will send to the Clerk's desk a report of this caucus and have it read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE REPUBLICANS IN PARTY WRANGLE—HOLD UP CONSIDERATION OF MONDELL'S BILL TO GIVE LAND TO SOLDIERS—FORDNEY ATTACKS WILSON—MR. ESCH ASSURES MEETING PLUMB PLAN WILL NOT BE RECOMMENDED.

WASHINGTON, August 26.

At a conference to-night behind closed doors House Republicans decided by a large majority not to allow further consideration of the bill introduced by their floor leader, Mr. MONDELL, sending former soldiers "back to the land," until another conference had been held upon the measure. The move came as a complete surprise to Mr. MONDELL, and it was only on his earnest plea that the action was subsequently rescinded. He argued that it would damage the Republicans in the eyes of the Nation if it were known that the Republican House had postponed action upon the only piece of legislation introduced at this session to benefit the discharged soldiers.

"Uncle Joe" CANNON was one of the first who mentioned the bill, and he declared that he was opposed to its being considered as a Republican measure. Then, without any warning whatever, Representative NICHOLS of Michigan, a member of the Public Land Committee, which considered the bill, and one of the signers of the minority report which characterized the measure as "reclamation scheme," suddenly put in a resolution demanding that consideration of the bill be deferred until after the meeting of the American Legion in Minneapolis.

There was a long wrangle, in which Mr. MONDELL shared, and finally, on motion of MARTIN B. MADDEN, of Illinois, the Republicans passed a resolution declaring that the bill should not be taken up again until after another Republican conference had considered it. There were some bitter passages during this discussion.

Later Mr. MONDELL arose and earnestly pleaded with the caucus to reconsider its action requiring another party conference on the bill.

"From a party standpoint," he said, "it would be most unfortunate to have word go forth to the country that the Republicans in Congress had decided to postpone, at least for the present, any further action on the only bill that has been introduced this session in behalf of the discharged soldiers of the Army."

Mr. NICHOLS of Michigan said he was willing to withdraw his motion provided that it was understood as a gentleman's agreement that the bill would not be taken up unless another conference had been held upon it. To this Mr. MONDELL pledged his word. "Uncle Joe" CANNON, however, declared that the Public Lands Committee had promised not to report out the bill until after a party conference, but had broken that promise.

Chairman GOOD, of the Appropriations Committee, made the point that as a general proposition no bill should be taken up involving an additional levy on the Treasury of more than $500,000, except after conference. He said Senator SMOOT had informed him several days ago that besides the soldier's settlement bill and the civil service retirement bill, and without repealing any of the present taxes, the Government this fiscal year would have to borrow $6,500,000,000.

The conference then agreed to reconsider its vote. The situation now is that, without a formal vote, the Republicans have decided to bar the bill from consideration until a conference is held. This conference, it is understood, on motion of Mr. FESS, of Ohio, chairman of the Republican congressional campaign committee, will be held next week to reorganize that organization.

During the meeting to-night a fiery speech was made by Representative REAVIS, of Kansas, reflecting the bitter disappointment he incurred some weeks ago when 30 Republicans voted for the Kelly amendment, allowing Secretary Baker to use the parcel post in sending out Army food which Representative REAVIS's subcommittee had declared the Secretary had withheld from the American people.

"Do you suppose Newton Baker never heard of the parcel post?" queried Mr. REAVIS. "The subcommittee had discussed this and decided against such an amendment for two reasons. In the first place we did not wish to aid the Secretary in shouldering off responsibility he had incurred for nine months. In the second place, we did not think the parcel post feasible. We came in here and the Kelly amendment was fastened on. Now, the Democratic national committee sends out patent insides to newspapers, saying the Secretary was only waiting for Congress to suggest some plan to him.

"If we make other recommendations, we do not want to come in here and be crucified by our own party. For God's sake stand by us."

The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. FORDNEY, of Michigan, said he saw no need of Republicans remaining here and passing measures suggested by a Democratic President.

"We should go away in 30 days and remain until Christmas," said he. "Woodrow Wilson will never send any legislation to a Republican Congress that does not bear a Democratic stamp. He is not built that way. He is a political trickster."

[Laughter and applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. AYRES. Now, in view of what the chairman of this great committee said at this meeting it would do no good whatever for the President to stay. If he is such a horrible trickster, my dear colleague, pray tell us why you call upon him to remain with us. Are you sure you have set forth your real reason why he should stay in the Capital, or are you, like many others, afraid he will tell the people of Kansas the real truth concerning the treaty and the league of nations?

I want to have read a further report of that party caucus. I beg pardon, I mean conference; this is from that busy, busy gentleman from Minnesota, the Republican whip:

The Clerk read as follows:

HAROLD KNUTSON, the Republican whip, electrified his fellow party members by announcing that he was about to institute a call-boy system so he could summon Republicans quickly from their offices to the floor.

[Laughter on the Democratic side.]

"STAND BY PARTY."

"There is a Republican majority of 47 in the House," he said, "but to-day 31 Republicans were absent. No one knew where they were. There was no trace of them. There should be a Republican majority of 15 to 20 on the floor every minute. Every hour or so I go to the Democratic cloakroom and see how many Democrats are on the floor, and, if necessary, I send a call to the Republicans by telephone."

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Speaking of Republican mistakes, KNUTSON said the other day I saw something never witnessed before in his career in the House—a "Democratic motion to adjourn carried by a Republican vote."

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

"Stand by the chairman of your party," he cried. "Stand by your party! The measures we have are carefully thought out and will help us in 1920. It is honest-to-God Republican legislation, and you should support it, I care not what the proposition is.

"There is one man on the Republican side who has not been here since June, and he is not sick, either. You must watch the Democrats or they will put over an amendment on us. They are working at it all the time. They have got the greatest outfit of big burglars and hot-air artists on that side imaginable."

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. AYRES. In view of all the unkind things said about the President at that party conference, surely my colleague can not be serious in calling on him by resolution or otherwise to remain in the Capital, when he must know he is the leader of this gang of burglars and hot-air artists. I would suggest to him that before he asks for the consideration of his resolution by the House he would submit it to his party cau—con-fer-ence—which will be held some night this week. Certainly they ought to be able to agree on such a momentous question as this.

In view of what has happened by my two colleagues from Kansas endeavoring to keep the President from being such a wanderer and so negligent of his duties as President, I am wondering if, when he returns from this trip through the Nation, some other gentleman from Kansas will not introduce a bill or a resolution absolutely compelling him to be constantly confined by lock and key to the White House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

CONFERENCE OF CAPITAL AND LABOR.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I ask unanimous consent that each of our Republican colleagues be given 10 minutes in which to answer the communications which have just been placed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that each Republican be allowed 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan that he be permitted to address the House for five minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, we have recently successfully waged a world war, in which nearly all of the industries of the country were changed over into munition plants. During that time labor gave the country loyal and unanimous support in winning the war. On the 3d day of June Senator EDGE, of New Jersey, introduced a resolution, similar to one introduced by Senator POINDEXTER on the 17th of June, calling a conference to consider questions between capital and labor. On the 4th of June the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULD] introduced a similar resolution, and on the 17th of June the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] introduced a similar resolution, and upon the 19th of July the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] introduced a similar resolution. All of these resolutions directed and authorized the President of the United States to call a conference or appoint a commission to consider questions arising between capital and labor and were referred to the Committee on Labor of the House and the Committee on Education and Labor of the Senate. These committees met this morning in joint meeting, and I was directed to present and have read a resolution passed by that joint meeting in reference to the proposed conference which has been called by the President.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Was that resolution passed this morning?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The resolution that I am asking the Clerk to read was passed this morning by the joint committee.

Mr. BEE. After the President had called the conference for October?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. After the President had called this conference. But the President's call for the conference appeared in the press after notice of the joint hearings of the Senate and House committees on these resolutions had been given, and the date had been fixed for several days for a hearing.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas a number of bills are pending before the Senate and House Committees on Labor looking to the calling of a conference between the representatives of labor and capital; and

Whereas this joint meeting of the two committees was called to consider said bills; and

Whereas since the arrangements for this meeting have been made the President of the United States has given notice that he will call a conference of the representatives of labor, capital, and agriculture relating to said interests: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House Committees on Labor, meeting in joint assembly, That we heartily indorse the action of the President in calling such conference, and pledge to him our earnest support and cooperation for the success thereof.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I was also authorized or instructed to present the following House joint resolution, which I will ask to have read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 193.

Whereas the President of the United States has called, or is about to call, a conference of the representatives of labor, capital, and agriculture for the purpose of discussing questions relating to these great interests as affecting each other and the public: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the Congress of the United States indorses the action of the President in calling such conference, and pledges to him its earnest support and cooperation for the success thereof.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution which has just been read.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, I think that resolution ought to be referred to a committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I object.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. To-day has been set aside for the consideration of business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I understood that unanimous consent has been given to Members on the Republican side of the House to each have 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken. Objection was made to the request.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Almon	Eagan	Kennedy, Iowa	Parker

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and seventy-four Members have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

UNANIMOUS CONSENT CALENDAR.

The SPEAKER. Under the special rule to-day the Unanimous Consent Calendar is in order, and the Clerk will report the first bill.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DENISON. Is it too late for me to request that the words of the gentleman from New York be taken down in order that they may be stricken from the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. It is too late; other business has intervened. The Clerk will report the first bill.

LAND FOR USE OF BUREAU OF ENTOMOLOGY.

The first business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 446) authorizing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to transfer fractional block 6 of Naylor's addition, Forest Grove, Oreg., to the United States of America, for the use of the Bureau of Entomology, Department of Agriculture.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Oregon to whom does this land belong now?

Mr. HAWLEY. It is owned by the Department of the Interior on behalf of the Government. It is under the control of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. They have no use for it, and have had no use for it for many years. It is an encumbrance upon their hands and they would like to get rid of it, and the Bureau of Entomology has use for it. They have an entomological station at Forest Grove and this tract of land adjoins their offices. It will be useful in the performance of their duties and in the consummation of their work.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do the Indians have any title to it?

Mr. HAWLEY. No.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is just a transfer from one place to another?

Mr. HAWLEY. From a bureau that has no use for it to one that has.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, is hereby authorized and directed to transfer all right, title, and interest in fractional block 6 of Naylor's addition to the city of Forest Grove, Oreg., to the United States of America, for the use of the Bureau of Entomology, Department of Agriculture.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAWLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ENTRIES UNDER THE HOMESTEAD LAWS.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was H. J. Res. 167, a joint resolution making the provisions of section 2296 of the Revised Statutes applicable to all entries made under the homestead laws and laws supplemental and amendatory thereof.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, my colleague from the eighth district of Kansas, who addressed the House previous to the last roll call, when securing his election in Kansas makes the plea that he is a nonpartisan——

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. Under the reservation of a point of order on consideration of bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar is debate extraneous to the bill in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. GARD. Then I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. Is there objection?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I object to the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection. This bill has been considered for some time in the committee, and it ought to be considered by the House.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The objection will have to stand.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have two minutes to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution may remain on the calendar.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And go to the foot.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the joint resolution remain on the calendar and go to the foot. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas rose.

Mr. RAKER. Just a moment. There is no need to break up the calendar this morning.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

NATIONAL FORESTS IN IDAHO.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 1429) adding certain lands to the Idaho National Forest and the Payette National Forest, in the State of Idaho.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman to explain the bill as introduced by him, and I also particularly desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Idaho to this proposed amendment. Is it not advisable, in the opinion of the gentleman, to have the bill amended on line 6, after the word "forests" as it appears in line 5, by striking out the words "are hereby" and inserting the words "may with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior"?

I make that suggestion because this is the exact language that has been used in the bill immediately following this and which has the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. FRENCH. This bill, as I understand it, has been amended so far as that is concerned. Any language that would obtain the result would be agreeable to me.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. FRENCH. I will.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. My understanding is that that language was to go in the bill. I will ask the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH] if it was not to go in?

Mr. FRENCH. I was given the option as to whether it was to go in or not.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. My understanding was that we were to put it in.

Mr. GARD. I will say to the gentleman that I think it ought to go in, and unless the gentleman will say he will incorporate it as an amendment I will object.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly agreeable to that language, but I think it ought to be changed a little from the words the gentleman suggested. But so far as the meaning is concerned, I have no objection to it. As I understand, the department has passed upon and has O. K'd the bill, and it is agreeable, in fact, to both departments. The reason that the language requiring the Interior Department to approve is included in the one bill and not the other is that the one bill refers to a tract of land that is entirely surrounded by a forest reserve. Every side of it is bounded by a forest reserve. The bill that follows it refers to land a part of which has been entered upon, and, while the matter is not a complicated one, we thought we ought to submit the question to the department that has the issuing of patents. This is so clear-cut we did not think it necessary. But I am very agreeable to such a reference anyway, and I am very glad to have the amendment as suggested, namely, "with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior." The bill is on the Union Calendar, and I ask that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, if the gentleman will agree to incorporate the amendment I have suggested I will make no objection.

Mr. FRENCH. I agree to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Is there objection to the bill being considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1429) adding certain lands to the Idaho National Forest and the Payette National Forest, in the State of Idaho.

Be it enacted, etc., That all public lands in central Idaho within the tract commonly known as the Thunder Mountain region, bounded by the Idaho, Salmon, Challis, and Payette National Forests, are hereby reserved and set apart as national-forest lands, as follows, subject to all valid existing claims, and the said lands shall hereafter be subject to all laws affecting the national forests: That part of the said tract lying north of the fourth standard parallel north, Boise meridian and base, is hereby added to and made a part of the Idaho National Forest; and that part of the said tract lying south of the said fourth standard parallel is hereby added to and made a part of the Payette National Forest.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On line 3, page 1 of the bill, after the word "That," insert the words "subject to the approval of the Secretary of Interior."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FRENCH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, in conection with this bill I would ask unanimous consent to insert a few statements, including a recital of the facts by the Legislature of the State of Idaho in a memorial, and letters from the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following are the statements referred to:

A joint memorial to the honorable the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled.

Your memorialists, the House of Representatives and Senate of the State of Idaho, respectfully represent that—

Whereas the area within the county of Valley, State of Idaho, commonly known as the "Thunder Mountain Country," consisting of approximately 1,120,000 acres of unreserved and unappropriated public land of which not to exceed 1 per cent is agricultural in character, the balance being rich in natural resources consisting of extensive bodies of commercial timber, ore deposits, water power possibilities, wild game, and grasses and other forage suited to the growing of livestock, and

Whereas nearly 350,000 acres of this area have been swept by forest fires during the past 14 years, destroying approximately 700,000,000 feet of timber; the mineral and water power possibilities of the region are lying dormant and unproductive through lack of transportation facilities and means of communication; the wild life is being exterminated; grazing lands devastated by nomadic herds to the detriment of the property owners and residents of this State, and the area is contributing little or nothing to the support of the county or State government or to the wealth of the surrounding communities, and

Whereas the inclusion of the said area within a national forest would eliminate the annual destruction of timber by forest fire; make it possible for homestead settlers to secure title to their lands under the forest homestead act of June 11, 1906, without expense to them other than entry and final proof fees and without the necessity of awaiting public wagon roads, trails, bridges, and telephone lines; give adequate system of regulated range use, thus conserving and perpetuating the forage resources for the benefit of the local residents and taxpayers; make it possible for the State to realize upon its equity in the lands by relinquishing the unsurveyed school lands (sections 16 and 36) and selecting more valuable lands elsewhere; increase the revenues of the county and State through the receipt of 25 per cent of the gross receipts collected by the Forest Service; enlarge the power of the State to share in the benefits of the Federal aid road act, and otherwise assist in opening to development and use the vast natural resources of the "Thunder Mountain" region; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, your memorialists, earnestly request and recommend that action be initiated by your honorable body to create a national forest from the following described area within the county of Valley, State of Idaho, commonly known as the "Thunder Mountain" region: Beginning at a point where the Middle Fork of the Salmon River crosses the south line of section No. 29, T. 14 N., R. 10 E., B. M., unsurveyed, and extending thence west to the southeast corner of section 28, T. 14 N., R. 8 E., B. M., unsurveyed; thence south 1 mile; thence west on the third standard parallel north, unsurveyed, to the southeast corner of section 33, T. 14 N., R. 7 E., B. M., unsurveyed; thence north to the township line between Ts. 18 and 19 N.; thence west 3 miles; thence north 6 miles; thence west 3 miles; thence north 12 miles to the fifth standard parallel north; thence east on said parallel to the Middle Fork of Salmon River; thence up the Midde Fork of Salmon River to the place of beginning.

The secretary of state of the State of Idaho is hereby instructed to forward a copy of this memorial to each of the members of the congressional delegation from the State of Idaho to the Congress of the United States.

This house joint memorial passed the house on the 8th day of February, 1919.

M. A. KIGER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

This house joint memorial passed the senate on the 14th day of February, 1919.

C. C. MOORE,
President of the Senate.

This house joint memorial received by the governor on the 18th day of February, 1919, at 10 o'clock a. m., and approved by him on the 18th day of February, 1919.

D. W. DAVIS, Governor.

I hereby certify that the within house joint memorial No. 6 originated in the house of representatives during the fifteenth session of the Legislature of the State of Idaho.

DAVID BURRELL,
Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Received and filed February 18, 1919. ROBERT O. JONES,
Secretary of State.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, June 23, 1919.

Hon. N. J. SINNOTT,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SINNOTT: I am in receipt of your request for report on H. R. 1429, which proposes to add the public lands within a thereindescribed area in central Idaho to the Idaho and Payette National Forests.

The area described in the bill is chiefly unsurveyed, and contains approximately 1,137,500 acres. This area is entirely surrounded by national forests, and the middle fork of the Salmon River forms its eastern boundary. The records of the General Land Office show that about 27 per cent, or 319,653.14 acres, therein have been surveyed. Such surveys are for the most part recent, and the field notes thereof report the lands as generally mountainous and timbered, with heavy undergrowth and abundant grasses throughout, affording excellent grazing, and that the area is well watered, with some agricultural lands along the streams and on the adjacent benches. The lands are now unwithdrawn. The entire area was, however, temporarily withdrawn for forestry purposes by this department on November 14, 1902, upon recommendation of the Geological Survey, and the greater portion was released from such withdrawal November 17, 1904, and the remainder September 30, 1907, such action having been recommended by the Department of Agriculture. The 1904 recommendation of that department stated, however, that while then-existing conditions did not justify reservation at that time, the area was natural forest-reserve land, and should at some later date be reserved for such purpose, and that there was very little probability of the title to any considerable amount of the land passing out of the Government.

The appropriations of record within this area aggregate 20,554.28 acres, and are scattered and of the following classes: Surveyed school sections, 16,520 acres; mineral entries, 561.38 acres; final homestead entries, 1,989.41 acres; imperfected homestead entries, 1,483.49 acres; and there is a pending desert application covering 67 acres. No applications for entry under the enlarged or grazing homestead laws are of record for any lands within the area involved, and none of the lands therein have been designated under either of such acts.

I am not advised as to the necessity for the proposed legislation, and am not sufficiently informed concerning the advisability of reserving the lands for forest purposes to make a specific recommendation. I would suggest a reference of the bill to the Secretary of Agriculture in view of its purpose, who has probably some data regarding the area, as it adjoins national forests under his administration.

Cordially, yours, ALEXANDER T. VOGELSANG, Acting Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, June 5, 1919.

Hon. N. J. SINNOTT,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SINNOTT: Receipt is acknowledged of a copy of the bill (H. R. 1429) adding certain lands to the Idaho National Forest and the Payette National Forest, in the State of Idaho, with the request that your committee be furnished a report thereon, together with such suggestions and recommendations as this department may desire to make.

The bill proposes to add approximately 1,100,000 acres of public lands in central Idaho to two existing national forests, the lands thereafter to be subject to all laws affecting national forests. This area has been examined by forest officers and the following facts are compiled from their reports:

The center of a compact tract of mountainous public lands, mostly unsurveyed, known as the Thunder Mountain region, lies 100 miles northeast of Boise—south of Salmon River and west of the Middle Fork of Salmon River. The area is surrounded by the following national forests: On the north and west, the Idaho; on the west and south, the Payette; on the east, the Challis and the Salmon. It has never been improved or protected under the national forest laws and regulations. When the surrounding national forests were created it is understood that prominent residents of Idaho strongly objected to its inclusion on account of the fact that a notable mining boom was then in progress at Dewey and Roosevelt and it was feared that the application of Government control would restrict mining operations in such a way that desirable mineral development in the region would be prevented. In 1902 this section was the scene of great activity and thousands of miners and prospectors were living in the northeastern part. The boom collapsed several years ago and the population of the entire area of more than 1,000,000 acres does not now exceed 100 people.

The Thunder Mountain region is a high, rough mountain region dissected by deep canyons. The extremes of elevation run from 3,000 to 9,400 feet. Of the entire area, 90 per cent consists of rocky peaks, ridges, and slopes, and approximately 85 per cent sustains a forest cover of mature timber or reproduction, the remaining 15 per cent being barren rock.

The approximate total area is 1,116,500 acres, of which only about 16,500 acres have been alienated, leaving a net area of 1,100,000 acres of public land.

The region is distinctly rough and mountainous, with a large majority of slopes in excess of 45 per cent and many of 90 per cent or more. The precipitation varies with the elevation from 15 to 25 inches annually. Above 5,500 feet altitude killing frosts occur throughout the growing season. Approximately 400 acres are under cultivation at the present time. Not to exceed 5,000 acres, or less than one-half of 1 per cent, have soil or topography suitable for agriculture. Practically the only opportunities for agriculture exist on the benches and bars along the Middle and South Forks of Salmon River, where alluvial soils are found at comparatively low altitudes.

At present there are no settlements. The log buildings of the first settlement, known as Thunder Mountain and located on Monumental Creek just below the mouth of the West Fork, are still standing for the most part, but have not been occupied for years. The post office at Yellow Pine consists of a miner's cabin, with no settlers or miners nearer than 3 miles. The post office at Edwardsburg was conducted by an unsuccessful miner who finally turned his attention to ranching. During boom days Edwardsburg was locally surveyed for a town site but no action was ever taken. The town of Roosevelt was established in 1901 and soon became quite a settlement. Many of the buildings were of sawed timber and substantial in character. It was located on Monumental Creek just above the mouth of Mule Creek. In 1907, however, a landslide down Mule Creek dammed the waters of Monumental Creek and the town is now covered by a lake. The more substantial buildings were caught by the water and are now floating about the lake.

The area is entirely surrounded by national forests, and for this reason, as well as on account of the topography, it is an integral part of the Payette and the Idaho Forests and is necessary to their satisfactory administration and protection from fire. The three areas are so interlocked that an intelligent and comprehensive plan for the administration, protection, and improvement of the Idaho and Payette Forests demands also the extension of road, trail, and telephone systems through a large part of the Thunder Mountain region.

Conservative estimators state that the region contains fully 3,000,000,000 feet b. m. of such commercial timber as yellow pine, Douglas fir, Englemann spruce, and lodge-pole pine. The best of the commercial timber lies in the northwestern portion; and, while at the present time it is quite inaccessible, it is nevertheless a forest property of high value. The extensive areas which have been swept clean by repeated forest fires are reproducing well in lodge pole and red fir. Lumbering is an unknown industry in the region. No commercial mill has ever been run. One man has a small mill on Big Creek, where he saws lumber for his own use, and small mills were at one time operated at the Century mine on Monumental Creek and at Eagle mines on Big Creek.

It is estimated that a total area of approximately 300,000 acres of timber, having a value of at least $1,000,000, has been destroyed by fires. Protection is necessary both for the timber and the watershed. As the result of the destruction of timber along Marble Creek, the high-water period is now at least a month earlier than in earlier days when the watershed was timbered. The fires are reported to have been set at the time of the mining boom, probably in order to clear mountain sides. At present they result largely from lightning and from careless methods of unregulated sheep grazers. Since there is no organization for combating such fires, they constitute a great menace to the valuable timber of the national forests on the west, which are extremely difficult to protect from their most remote and unprotected side.

A large and important watershed is involved, as the Thunder Mountain region supplies at least 1,000 second-feet of water to the Columbia River at low-water period. Reservoir sites are numerous. It is roughly estimated that more than 100,000 horsepower could be generated from the waters arising in the area.

The region includes no natural wonders, large lakes, or features of special scenic interest. Deer and trout are plentiful and there are said to be a few sheep and goats.

The mineral resources have been exploited for 25 years and the assessment work is still being performed on a large number of claims, but the hundreds of claims which were located during the boom of 1901 have since been abandoned. Some high-grade ore has been found and the general belief is that the region contains an abundance of low-grade ore, the exploitation of which awaits large-scale operations and good facilities for transportation, which do not exist at the present time. The Dewey mines, west of Thunder Mountain, are still worked spasmodically. Several miners make a precarious living, but most of them depend upon earnings from other sources to secure their supplies. Quite recently there has been development of the cinnabar properties on Fern and Cinnabar Creek and antimony properties near Yellow Pine Basin. One mining company, it was stated, was producing one tank per day of cinnabar worth $105. The antimony mines are also producing a limited amount of metal. In July, 1918, the State mine inspector called particular attention to the deposits of these metals in a special bulletin. In his report for 1912 he deplored the inaccessible condition of the country and states that proper transportation facilities would result in "a most valuable asset to the State in the creation of new business, as the resources of this section of the State are of such a definite nature in both timber and mineral as to warrant the prospect of building up a labor market worth $10,000,000 a year."

The nearest railway points are McCall and Cascade. The former is about 75 miles distant from the area by wagon road and the latter about 40 miles. There is an automobile stage from McCall to Warren, and powerful machines can get as far as the South Fork. At the time of the boom and for several years later there was a fairly comprehensive road system connecting the different points of interest to mining men. At present this system is deteriorated, grades destroyed, and bridges rotted out, until it is practically impossible to travel the country by other means than a saddle horse. Stretches of the old roads remain, but in order to put the transportation facilities of the country on a proper modern basis heavy expenditures would be necessary in reducing grades, restoring bridges, and fixing the remaining stretches of the old miners' roads. The examiner estimates that approximately $400,000 would be needed to open up the country well to modern travel. Furthermore, for suitable protection from fire, trails would have to be restored, and about 75 miles of telephone would have to be built at an early date. The estimated cost of the trails would be $50,000 and of the telephone about $13,000. While these figures seem large, it must be remembered that at one time there was a system of roads and trails which was fairly adequate and that the suggested improvements represent, in part, the depreciation which has occurred through lack of care of the public facilities which then existed. The longer the region goes without attention to improvements the greater will be the eventual expenditure necessary to open it up to human use and occupation.

Sheep to the number of nearly 300,000 head have grazed on the area without restriction or regulation during the past year, with the result that the watershed is being seriously affected. A fair estimate of the carrying capacity of the entire country has been placed from 75,000 to 100,000 head of sheep. The highest estimate was placed by a sheepman at 150,000 head. As the slopes are steep, overgrazing invariably results in serious erosion.

Officers of the Payette National Forest issued more than 75 crossing permits to sheepmen who desired to enter the Thunder Mountain region in 1918. The country is of such a character that close supervision is absolutely necessary to avoid disastrous overgrazing. The number of sheep going into the country is increasing each year, and already the south end of the area is not much better than a dust bed.

The increasing number of sheep grazed each year has alarmed the settlers and the miners, and they realize that their surest protection is through regulation of grazing. They are also very favorably disposed toward the possibilities for better transportation and communication which might result if the area were protected like the national forests.

In 1909 a petition was presented asking for the transfer of approximately 161,000 acres of this area to the Idaho National Forest. Legislation to accomplish this, however, was not enacted. In 1917 the fourteenth session of the State Legislature of Idaho, by a vote of 64 to 1 in the house, and 34 to 1 in the senate, passed a joint memorial addressed to Congress praying for the establishment of a national forest upon the entire area for reasons set forth in the memorial. During the fifteenth session of the Idaho Legislature a similar memorial was adopted by unanimous vote.

The lands within this region are exactly the type which the law contemplates should be included in national forests. With the exception of a very small percentage of agricultural lands, practically all of which already has been claimed by settlements which would not be adversely affected by this measure, this area is essentially national-forest land. At the present time the timber, watershed values, range, and transportation facilities are being ruined by the lack of protection and proper management. This condition is gradually growing worse as time goes on. Under proper national-forest management these areas could be utilized by stockmen to the limit of the range capacity and overgrazing would be prevented. No doubt this would result in increasing the number of live stock which the range, in its impoverished condition, can now properly support. Mining operations can be pursued as fully and freely under national-forest management as upon the public domain. Any unoccupied tracts of land chiefly valuable for agriculture could be applied for by prospective settlers, and listed for homestead entry under the act of June 11, 1906 (34 Stat., 233). At the same time settlers upon unsurveyed lands could secure, without expense, the advantage of early surveys, enabling them to submit final proof and secure patent to their homesteads. Protection from fire and the construction of suitable roads and trails to help develop these natural resources would develop this land into a real national asset where it is now a menace to the surrounding timber on adjoining national forests.

For these reasons this department approves the passage of the bill.

Very truly, yours,

D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

ADDITION OF LANDS TO WEISER NATIONAL FOREST.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 1430) to authorize the addition of certain lands to the Weiser National Forest, Idaho.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, I desire to have an explanation from some one in charge of the bill as to the merits and necessity therefor, especially in regard to the statement of the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH], made a moment ago, that this is a bill so complicated in its territorial aspects that it is different from the bill considered immediately prior to this.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, the amount of land embraced in this bill aggregates, as I recall, some 13,000 to 15,000 acres. It is adjacent to the Weiser National Forest. It is chiefly valuable for the production of timber and for the protection of the headwaters of certain streams. It is rugged in character and for the most part it is not available for agricultural entry or acquisition by home builders in any great degree. However, scattered along certain streams and lower parts of the area, entries have been made. The number of entries is small, but it seemed altogether desirable, in view of the fact that probably several hundred acres have been entered upon, that we ought to give the Secretary of the Interior something of a discretionary power as to seeing whether or not lands adjacent should be included in the reserve. So far as I am aware, there is no objection to it. I have not heard one word of opposition. The legislature memorialized Congress, asking that the measure be passed. It will be in the interest of conserving the water supply for irrigation and other uses, and I suppose that practically every acre that can well be entered under the homestead law has already been acquired. It seems to be the unanimous desire that the land be included in a national forest.

Mr. GARD. Does not the gentleman think that a field examination or a complete map showing the territory to be taken should be made before this bill is passed by the House?

Mr. FRENCH. Why, I think not; no. This is a very customary form for the passage of a bill. The gentleman will remember that prior to a few years ago no necessity existed for going to Congress in the matter of including any public land in a forest reserve. The entire authority at that time rested with the administration. Finally Congress passed a law requiring from that time forward Congress should grant its authority before any land could be included within the forest reserve.

This bill confers a very limited authority, to the extent of a very small number of thousands of acres, upon the President, and action must meet with the approval also of the Secretary of the Interior. The lands in the area are lands that will be found by the Secretary of Agriculture to be valuable for the production of timber and the protection of stream flow. The legislation is so desirable that it ought to pass in the present form without delay.

Mr. GARD. I observe from the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture, under date of June 3, 1919, that he states the subject of the bill is that it proposes that an examination be made by the Secretary of Agriculture of certain described lands, and provides that the areas found by him to be chiefly valuable for the production of timber and the protection of stream flow may be included within and made a part of the Weiser National Forest by proclamation of the President. Possibly I did not read all the inclusive language, which the gentleman understands better than I do, but there is nothing in the bill as I read it that provides for an examination by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. FRENCH. The first couple of lines will, I think, disclose the authority "that any lands within the following-described areas found by the Secretary of Agriculture to be chiefly valuable," and so forth.

Mr. GARD. Would the gentleman have any objection to inserting the words "after examination."

Mr. FRENCH. Well, the only possible objection that it seems to me could be made would be the adding of a little expense to the Government. The fact of the business is, if you knew the people out there and knew how strenuously they oppose putting any land in forest reserves; and when you consider that all of them say this may go in as far as they are concerned it is almost conclusive in itself that that land should be included in the forest reserves; and when the people are in that frame of mind with respect to this rugged piece of land and are willing to say it shall go in, subject to the approval of both of these departments, it seems almost like carrying coals to New Castle to require an examination to be made. But I am perfectly willing that that should be done.

Mr. GARD. It is not a matter of what these people want. It is to be passed by Congress, and it is supposed to be beneficial to the entire country, although we realize that it is of main benefit to the territory included in the bill.

Mr. FRENCH. It is vastly more important to the territory not included in the bill. But I do not object to that language. It would be a little expense, but probably they have some forest rangers who could furnish a report without any great expense. I have no objection to that language.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I think under the laws now on the statute books relating to forest lands the Secretary of Agriculture would be authorized, if not directed, to make an examination at any time of these lands, and if the result of that examination should be that the land would be found more suitable for agriculture than for forestry he would be authorized and directed to have it eliminated from forest control and made subject to entry.

Mr. FRENCH. May I just modify that suggestion? He would not be directed to, but upon the entryman making the application he would then have authority to approve its passing to the homesteader under the homestead application.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. As to what the gentleman says about the feeling out there on the part of the people wishing to have this land put into national forests, it seems evident to me from the facts that anything the people out there can not make use of and that is of no value to them they want to turn over to the Federal Government.

Mr. FRENCH. It is already in the hands of the Government. It is simply a question of placing its administration under a department where there is machinery for administering the fire-protection laws and protecting stream flow instead of leaving the lands in the hands of a department that has not sought to build up any machinery along that line.

Mr. GARD. I think there should be an examination made of this by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. FRENCH. Does the gentleman suggest the words "upon examination"?

Mr. GARD. "After examination."

Mr. FRENCH. I am agreeable to that.

Mr. GARD. After that examination I suspect that the Secretary of Agriculture under existing law would be authorized, and certainly it would be within the proper province of his duty, to have prepared a map showing the territory to go in, because, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] has very well asserted, it should not be the purpose of anyone in any part of the United States to place under governmental control for private reasons tracts of land which are so undesirable that no one will take hold of them and attempt to build them up themselves; in other words, transfer useless lands to the Government and expect to have some governmental control of them and expect to derive some benefit after that control has been completed.

Mr. FRENCH. If the gentleman will permit another statement, I will say that the origin of this bill, so far as I am aware, was in the very department that he suggests now should make an examination. As I understand it, the very idea came from the Forest Office in the first place. It is simply a tract of rugged land for the most part that is a menace to the forest lands around it, because it is now public domain under the Interior Department, and it has no systematic fire control. There is no machinery for the protection of stream flow or protecting the land in any way. It belongs as much to the Government, whether we pass the bill or do not pass it, and the department suggests that in the ordinary administration of this rugged strip of land adjacent to the forest reserve, if it could be included as part of the reserve it would be very desirable to do it.

Mr. GARD. What is the amount of the territory?

Mr. FRENCH. Something like 13,000 acres.

Mr. GARD. Can the gentleman tell whether or not there is any settlement thereon; and if so, the character of the settlement?

Mr. FRENCH. The report indicates that there is some little land that has been acquired. I do not know the total number of acres entered, but there have been some homesteaders and probably some stock-raising homesteaders who have acquired some land that lies up the valleys in that region.

Mr. GARD. What effect will this bill have upon the men who have acquired lands in that territory?

Mr. FRENCH. Their rights will exist and be protected.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If I may be permitted, the gentleman is not a member of the committee of which I am a member, but the report and the investigation of the committee shows that the Agriculture Department has made very exhaustive investigation of this matter, and this is really a departmental bill that has come here in the administration of that public domain, and both the Interior Department and the Agriculture Department seem to be in harmony as to the advisability of having it put into the forest reserve.

Generally speaking, I am not in favor of increasing the forest reserves, but the people out there and the departments and even the State legislature seem to all be in favor of it, so out of deference to their judgment and wishes I hope the bill will pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. FRENCH. I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any lands within the following-described areas found by the Secretary of Agriculture to be chiefly valuable for the production of timber or the protection of stream flow may be included within and made a part of the Weiser National Forest by proclamation of the President, said lands to be thereafter subject to all laws affecting national forests:

Sections 6, 7, 18, 30, and 31, township 14 north, range 4 west; sections 1, 12, 13, 23, 24, 25, 26 (the south half and the northeast quarter of section 27), sections 34 and 35, township 14 north, range 5 west; sections 1 to 12, inclusive, township 13 north, range 5 west; sections 1 and 2, township 13 north, range 6 west; all of the Boise meridian and base, Idaho.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 1, line 6, insert the words "with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, in line 3, page 1, after the word "found," I move to insert the words "after examination."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 1, line 3, after the word "found," insert the words "after examination."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. FRENCH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CERTAIN CAREY ACT ENTRYMEN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 2950) to authorize a preference right of entry by certain Carey Act entrymen, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman in charge of the bill, or those who have reported it, to advise the membership of the House concerning the necessity for the passage of the bill, and also whether they will accept such amendments as the Secretary of the Interior or the Acting Secretary of the Interior has indicated should be made thereto?

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. I think inadvertently the committee failed to strike out the word "to" at the end of line 11, on page 1. I have that amendment prepared, to offer. With that exception, I think all the amendments have been adopted by the committee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that we have adopted all of the amendments proposed by the Interior Department. The bill as amended reads as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior, when restoring to the public domain lands that have been segregated to a State under section 4 of the act of August 18, 1894, and the acts and resolutions amendaory thereof and supplemental thereto, commonly called the Carey Act, is authorized, in his discretion and under such rules and regulations as he may establish to allow for not exceeding 90 days to any Carey Act entryman a preference right of entry under applicable land laws of any of such lands to which such person had entered under and pursuant to the State laws providing for the administration of the grant under the Carey Act and upon which such person had established actual bona fide residence or had made substantial and permanent improvements: Provided, That each entryman shall be entitled to a credit as residence upon his new homestead entry allowed hereunder of the time that he has actually lived upon the claim as a bona fide resident thereof.

In my report on this bill I have answered many of these questions, as follows:

It will be observed that the committee adopted the two recommendations made by the Interior Department and added the proviso at the end of the bill which was not considered by the department. This bill passed the House of Representatives on March 23, 1918, pages 3983–3987 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date; and it passed the Senate on February 28, 1919, page 4765 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date.

At that time the bill was H. R. 5559, by Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. In the language of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], at the time the bill was passed by the House, "No bill was ever presented to Congress more thoroughly justified than this."

The Carey Act is a law under which the State enters into an agreement with the Federal Government to reclaim certain desert lands. After they are thoroughly reclaimed and the State had made proof of that fact to the Federal Government, the Federal Government transfers the lands to the State, then the State transfers them to the persons who reclaim them. But there have been cases where the projects of reclaiming desert lands have failed—where the project was of such magnitude and the difficulties so great that the State has been unable to make proof of the reclamation—and in the meantime the settlers have gone onto the land under an agreement with the State for this water and made settlement and put in improvements upon the land, in some cases amounting to several thousand dollars, and have lived on the land for several years. Now, when the project fails and the State is unable to reclaim it, it becomes the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to forfeit the Carey Act project and restore the lands thereunder to public entry. Now, the purpose of this bill is to give those settlers under the project, who are living upon or have improved their claims, a preference right of 90 days' time, as against strangers, within which to go to the land office and file upon their claims, either under the homestead law or the desert-land law, and possibly in a very few cases the preemption or some other law might be available, but, generally speaking, it will be only a homestead claim for dry farming that the entryman can avail himself of, and that claim will be limited to 160 acres, because that is the extent of the Carey Act claim.

In the report No. 259 filed upon this bill in the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress the following statement was made, which is now equally applicable to this bill, namely:

"There have been started in former years a very large number of Carey Act projects throughout the Western States. Some of them have been successful, others have been partially successful, and a number of them have already been forfeited, and many others undoubtedly ought to be and will be forfeited because of their utter failure. These failures have very few been fraudulent, or through bad faith, or bad management. Many of them have been startled through a misunderstanding of the quantity of water available, and through incompetency in engineering, and failure to properly estimate the necessary expense of construction of reservoirs and dams and canals, etc., and some have failed through the inability of the parties to properly finance their enterprise. In many cases large numbers of innocent home-seeking and poor people have been induced to go upon these projects and locate upon 160 acres of land and commence improving it. Many of them have built houses and lived there in good faith for years, claiming the land and improving it as best they could without any water to irrigate with, waiting and hoping that the irrigation works would be constructed. And after spending years of time and labor and money the projects have proven a failure and been abandoned and forfeited and thrown open to settlement by the Secretary of the Interior. At the present time there is no law that in any way protects the prior rights of the settlers upon those projects to the lands they actually occupy. When the lands are thrown open to entry any person who can beat them to the land office can file and get a first right to the land upon which these settlers have spent many years of hard labor and time and all of their money toward improving and making a home.

"This bill merely protects them to the extent of giving them a 90 days' preference or prior right after the land is forfeited and thrown open to entry by the Secretary of the Interior in which they may go to the land office and file upon the lands themselves under the homestead law or the desert-land law, or the preemption law in some cases. That is, they can file under whatever law that is applicable to the character of land that is thrown open to entry. No one could take more than 160 acres, because that is all he can take under the Carey Act, and that would be the extent of the amount of land that he is living upon or improving. It is a humane measure in the interest of protecting the homes and improvements and property rights of these pioneer settlers who have in good faith been trying under the Carey Act projects to acquire a home. The Government loses nothing under this proposed act, and certainly the people who are living upon and who have improved the land are more entitled to a first claim to the land and a preference right to enter it than a mere stranger who has done nothing toward living upon or improving it. For the above reasons the committee is heartily in favor of expeditiously passing this bill, because several of those projects will probably be forfeited and opened to entry in the near future."

Mr. ANDERSON. And you have adopted some amendments that were not proposed by the Interior Department, have you not?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We adopted one that was not proposed by the Interior Department, and we adopted the two that they proposed.

The SPEAKER. First, is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. I reserved the right to object.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman from Ohio has reserved the right to object, and I am attempting to make a little explanatory statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. In many cases the Carey Act has been very beneficial, but there are also cases where the States have attempted to reclaim certain lands and have failed to do so for various reasons, because of the expense of reclaiming, the failure of the water supply, inability to finance the project, and various reasons, as shown by the report upon this bill. Now, where a tract is set aside under the Carey Act and people are induced and encouraged in every way to go upon the land and settle and improve it, and where thereafter at some time in the future, after many of them have lived there for years and spent possibly several thousand dollars on their claims, and the water is not obtained, and the project fails, and the Interior Department declares it forfeited, then it leaves these people, so to speak, high and dry. At the present time there is no law that allows these settlers upon those projects any preference right to go to the Land Office and file upon the land on which they live or have improved. The object of this bill is first to allow them a preference right of 90 days within which to go and file upon the land under whatever law is applicable, homestead or desert-land law. We adopted the Department of the Interior amendments to the bill, but instead of putting in the words "qualified person" we put in the words "Carey Act entryman." We did that for the reason that there might be some people who had taken up homesteads, and while they would be qualified entrymen in good faith under the Carey Act, yet they might not have any homestead right under the homestead law. As I understand, there are a few of those people in Idaho. It was felt that if we were to give these people a preference right to the land, which they certainly deserve, we ought not to shut them out because of any technicality like that.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. I suppose every Representative from any Western State where the Carey Act is operative has had his attention called to very meritorious cases which will be benefited by this act. It will not benefit a very great number of people; I do not know how many hundreds or thousands of people—possibly a few hundred—but their cases are exceedingly meritorious. There are cases where men have lived and labored for years, and have gotten absolutely nothing for their work, and can get nothing unless we now give them the poor privilege of homesteading the land they settled upon and attempted to improve, which they were not able to reclaim fully, because water was not furnished. I know of no more meritorious classes of claims than those that will be provided for by this act, and it seems to me that the act is exceedingly well guarded. It can not help any except those cases that are truly meritorious.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me say in further explanation to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] that we have several bills pending before Congress now, providing that where people have in good faith complied with the requirements of residence on land, and for some reason or other their rights are interfered with, they may by remedial legislation be given the benefit of their residence and have it counted on the three-year homestead residence period.

There are several laws and some bills of that kind pending, and I anticipate if we complete this calendar, as I hope we will, that we will pass a couple of them to-day. The committee thought that where a man having lived—many of them for two years, three years, and four years, or five or more years, they ought to be given credit for that bona fide residence period. No good purpose could be conserved by compelling a man to go and live three years more, holding him down to double the homestead requirements. So, obeying the humane instinct, the committee added the last amendment to the bill which is with no more merit recommended in other measures by the Interior Department.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Is anything required except residence, any improvements?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. Under the original Carey Act they have to reclaim 20 acres.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They have to make the improvements required under the three-year homestead law. They would have to have the necessary improvements on the land before they would be permitted to prove up.

Mr. SINNOTT. They have to cultivate one-eighth of it by the third year.

Mr. ANDERSON. The proviso exempts the entryman from the necessary residence, but it does not exempt him from any improvements.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No. This bill passed the House unanimously in the last session of Congress and went to the Senate and was passed by the Senate, got into conference, but owing to the filibuster in the Senate during the closing days of the last Congress we did not get the conference committee together on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, I call the attention of gentlemen who have spoken, to the last report which seems to throw any light upon it, and that is that of Mr. Vogelsang of August 20, 1917, two years ago, in which he suggests that in drafting the bill it provide that the Secretary of the Interior be authorized in his discretion and under such rules and regulations as he may establish to allow for not exceeding 60 days, and so forth. But instead of following the suggestion of Mr. Vogelsang as to preferential rights allowed for 60 days, the committee has inserted 90 days and has also inserted a proviso as to the credit for residence which the Secretary of the Interior has not passed upon; nor have we any evidence that such is desirable. Unless these propositions will be eliminated by amendment to correspond to the report of the Acting Secretary of the Interior and which report the committee has followed in great part, I shall feel constrained to object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me say this to the gentleman from Ohio: In regard to the 60 days originally recommended by the Interior Department, the committee and all the western Members, every man from the public-lands States, knows that 60 days' time is not long enough. There may be a forfeiture under the Carey Act, and the information may not reach them within 60 days, so that they may not know anything about it at all, and when we give them a prior right to take the land they are living upon, we felt that there could be no objection to it. I may say that this bill went through the House before with the 90 days in it, and no objection was made to that provision at that time. The bill is only in the interest of fairness and justice to the deserving settler on the public land, and I do not think that the gentleman ought to insist upon his objection in that particular.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. GARD. I think that which the gentleman tries to cover is fully cared for under the language "rules and regulations to be established by the Secretary of the Interior," regarding notice, because clearly notice should be given to all persons interested in this act, but I think after notice is given 60 days is ample time for a person having notice to avail himself of what is merely a technical compliance with the law.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I have not the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The importance of extending 90 days' preference right of entry arises from the fact that a great many settlers, because of the lack of water for irrigation or domestic purposes, have gone to other localities and, perhaps, to other States. The failure of the project prevented them from securing water to irrigate the land and they could not live on their entry, and it will be necessary to give them at least 90 days in order that they may be advised of the opportunity of entering the land under the homestead act. Thirty days additional would not in any way injure the Government. I can not understand why the gentleman from Ohio should insist on such a small concession to these worthy entrymen.

Mr. GARD. Because it has been acted upon by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Does the gentleman think that Members of Congress from the Western States are not as well advised upon these matters as the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. GARD. The gentleman thinks that the Secretary of the Interior is able to present the facts and information with less prejudice to the case than Members from the public-land States.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The committee is desirous of making it as easy for the settlers to reinstate themselves on these lands as possible, and I am sure that no injury could come to the Government by giving them the additional 30 days.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman from Ohio has called attention to the letter of August 30, 1917, but the letter of June 8, 1919, printed on the first page of the report, shows that the Acting Secretary, Mr. Vogelsang, the same person who wrote the other letter, had in mind the 90-day period, because he sets out a copy of the Senate bill and recommends its passage with the amendments that the committee had made, with the exception of one, which was omitted by inadvertence. That shows, at the top of page 2 of the printed report, that the Acting Secretary had well in mind the 90-day period instead of the 60-day period.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That shows that the Department of the Interior approved of and recommended the 90 days time. I do not recollect where the 60-day proposition comes from.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. That suggestion was in a former report.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Ninety days was the way it passed the Senate and the way it was recommended by the Interior Department.

Mr. GARD. There is no reference to any action by the Interior Department except the reference by Mr. Vogelsang to 60 days. The gentleman can save time by either agreeing or not agreeing to what I have suggested by way of amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman from Ohio is going to persist in an objection, I would rather submit to the amendment than to see the bill killed.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, the committee acted upon this matter, and does the gentleman from Colorado mean to say that, without further consideration by the committee, he is going to accept an amendment from the floor of the House?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. As a matter of fact, this bill is the same that was passed during the last Congress, and nobody ever objected to it before, and the 90 days was in it at that time.

Mr. RAKER. The committee went into the matter thoroughly and agreed it should be 90 days, and I do not think the gentleman ought to consent to change the committee's action.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Does the gentleman want me to allow the gentleman from Ohio to kill the bill simply on account of 30 days' time?

Mr. RAKER. If the gentleman concedes the amendment, somebody else may object.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I am trying to get along with a very just and important bill.

Mr. GARD. I want the last proviso stricken out.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The last proviso is a matter that the Interior Department has recommended on other bills where the settlers are acting in good faith and are justly entitled to credit on residence, as they are in this case.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Let me suggest to the gentleman that 90 days is a rather brief period to allow in a case of this kind. I have in mind one case, not in my own State, but in a neighboring State, of a Carey Act project, where the people have been compelled this last summer to leave in order to find employment, and it will take them at least 90 days to get back.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, still further reserving the right to object, in the absence of the demand for the regular order I am disposed to take counsel with gentlemen who represent the public-land States and who know the necessities of the people there and the public interest far better than I, as we have no public lands in my State; and, therefore, I shall withdraw my suggestion in respect to the change of 60 days to 90 days and insist upon the elimination of the last proviso in the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment? We have not discussed that provision.

Mr. GARD. I am having a reservation of the objection.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, with reference to the amendment in the last part of the bill, I shall make a very brief statement. These entrymen who are to be relieved have already established their residence on the land and many have built homes and some of them barns and other farm buildings. On two projects in my own State they have been cultivating their lands for several years, but because of the scarcity of water to supply all of the land within the project, it has been necessary to contract the area to such an extent that a great many of the entrymen now find themselves outside of the project, and that it is impossible to get water to their lands.

Mr. RAKER. Just what is the proposition of the gentleman?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. This proviso simply provides that if these entrymen have lived on the land under the Carey Act for three years they shall then be permitted to offer final proof, and if they have lived there less than three years, they shall be given credit for the length of time they have been there. It would work a great injustice, and practically defeat the object sought to be attained by this legislation if that provision is not in the bill.

Mr. RAKER. Is not that the crux of this legislation, that those who have a prior right by virtue of their filing on the land and their improvement, should have the benefit of the right to a residence on the land?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes. They should be given 90 days within which to determine whether they want to enter the land under the homestead law.

Mr. RAKER. If you strike that out, you practically strike out the crux of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It would simply require these people who have lived on this land for 10 years or less to live three years additional without any water for their crops, or for domestic purposes.

Mr. GARD. In that event they would not live there anyway. If there is no water, the land is useless.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Yes; that may be true, but if this provision be not adopted a stranger wandering through the country could enter this land and go into the home of a man who has lived there for years, and occupy it, provided he is a qualified entryman. The object of the bill is to preserve the title in the entryman who has complied with the State law and who is willing to comply with the Federal law as to cultivation and residence, so that in the event that the project should ever be renewed or extended, or water found by artesian wells, or in some other way, those entrymen who have established their residence there would be secure in their title.

Mr. GARD. This provides for a new homestead entry. Under the law as it is proposed in this bill, if a man wishes, he may at his option, some 90 days after he has had notice, declare his intention under the new homestead entry.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman has the Carey Act and the homestead law confused. The Carey Act provides for patent under a State law. The Federal law, of course, is the law passed by the Congress, and the "new homestead entry" simply means that he will reenter the same land under the Federal statute instead of under the State law. That is what is meant by the term "new homestead entry." The entryman goes to the Federal land office and initiates an entry under this proposed legislation.

Mr. GARD. All those things can be taken care of, can they not, under the rules and regulations of the department?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Oh, no. It is necessary to have specific legislation in order to protect these settlers. There are probably several hundred entrymen in my State who will lose their homes if this legislation is not passed.

Mr. GARD. Is there any report from any authorized department which has investigated this last language as to whether or not it should apply?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. There is no report. We know just as much about the laws affecting the public lands as the clerks who write the reports down in the Interior Department, but I am sure there is no valid objection to this amendment.

Mr. GARD. There is no question of the wisdom of the gentleman and other gentlemen who speak on behalf of public-land bills, but I am simply asking whether a report has been made by a department authorized to make investigation of these matters and reports.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The gentleman from Ohio knows that it is not the custom of committees to submit to the department requests for information in regard to every amendment that is offered to a bill in a committee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Let me say to the gentleman from Ohio this: There is another bill coming on—I have been trying to find the number—a little later on this calendar where the Interior Department recognizes that when a person has been residing upon the land in good faith he should be given credit for the entire residence period. That is coming up, and it is a principle that is recognized by the department.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It always has been the policy of the department to give full credit for actual residence on the land.

Mr. GARD. What is the language in the general law?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The provision I refer to is in several laws, and is also in one or two of the bills on the calendar now.

Mr. GARD. The one the gentleman refers to now.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman will find it in a bill here that I reported, S. 277, on the next page of this calendar, concerning absence of homestead settlers, and I think one also under the stock-raising homestead act. That principle will come up here within a few minutes in these other bills, where the department has recommended this principle of a recognition of the justice of granting constructive residence in certain cases.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It has always been the policy of the Interior Department not to require double residences on the same piece of land.

Mr. FRENCH. If the gentleman will permit me in that connection, I will say this: On all unsurveyed lands when a man establishes a home, looking some time toward the land being surveyed and his making entry under the homestead law, the department, under the general law, allows him credit for one year, two years, or three years, whatever it may be, that he has lived on the land before it is surveyed. Now, restoring land from the Carey Act to homestead entry amounts practically to the same thing. Under the Carey Act homestead entry may not be made, yet the settler has lived on the land for one, two, or three years or more in many cases. This proposition merely aids him to continue under the homestead law in lieu of the Carey Act, equivalent to residence required under the homestead law.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, this bill is on the Union Calendar, and I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior, when restoring to the public domain lands that have been segregated to a State under section 4 of the act of August 18, 1894, and the acts and resolutions amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, commonly called the Carey Act, is authorized, in his discretion and under such rules and regulations as he may establish, to allow for not exceeding 90 days to any qualified person a preference right of entry under applicable land laws of any of such lands to which such person had initiated a claim under the State laws and upon which such person had established actual bona fide residence or had made substantial and permanent improvements.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Page 1, line 10, strike out the words "qualified person" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Carey Act entryman."

Page 2, line 1, strike out the words "initiated a claim under the State laws" and insert in lieu thereof the words "entered under and pursuant to the State laws providing for the administration of the grant under the Carey Act."

Page 2, line 6, after the word "improvements" insert:

"Provided, That each entryman shall be entitled to a credit as residence upon his new homestead entry allowed hereunder of the time that he has actually lived upon the claim as a bona fide resident thereof."

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I ask for the adoption of the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment. On page 1, line 11, strike out the last word, "to." That is merely surplusage.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 11, strike out the last word in the line, "to."

Mr. SINNOTT. This is recommended by the Secretary, and the committee inadvertently overlooked it.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

INVESTIGATION OF SUGAR PRICES, ETC.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was House resolution 150, directing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate and report to the House certain information regarding sugar.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have an explanation of the resolution.

Mr. TINKHAM. The resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby directed to make an immediate investigation and report to the House of Representatives its findings on the subject of sugar used for domestic and manufacturing purposes, both as to its market price, wholesale and retail, and whether these prices are reasonable; and the amount of sugar now in the United States, both raw and refined, in the possession of sugar refiners, wholesale dealers, or in storage; said investigation to involve a report of supplies in the possessions of the United States, raw and refined, and the causes of the present sugar scarcity.

The report of the committee is as follows:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the resolution (H. Res. 150) directing the Federal Trade Commission immediately to make certain investigations in relation to the reasonableness of the present market prices of sugar and the causes of the present scarcity of that article, and to report the result of such investigation to the House of Representatives, having considered the same, report the resolution without amendment with a recommendation that it pass.

The purpose of the resolution is to ascertain the reasonableness of the present wholesale and retail market prices of sugar, used for domestic or manufacturing purposes; the amount of sugar, both raw and refined, now in the United States, whether in possession of refiners, or wholesale dealers, or in storage; the surplus supply of raw and refined sugar now in possession of the United States; and the causes of the present sugar scarcity.

It developed during the hearings held by the committee that there was an unexplained shortage or scarcity of sugar in many sections of the country, notably in New England, New York, and the District of Columbia; that in these and other localities merchants have scarcely any supply of sugar on hand, claiming that they are unable to get their orders filled by the refiners; that families were unable to obtain sugar for domestic use, much less for canning and preserving purposes; that fruit and berries in these localities were spoiling because sugar could not be obtained for use in preserving these food supplies.

Since serious injury is being suffered by the public because of a shortage of sugar, or because of inefficient or inadequate means for the just and equitable distribution of this household necessity, and also since the present high prices of sugar are such as to warrant investigation in the interest of the consumer, the committee is of the opinion that the Federal Trade Commission should make an investigation along the lines pointed out by the resolution and to report its findings to the Congress, thereby furnishing the Congress enlightening and valuable information which will constitute the basis for remedial legislation in the event enactment of such legislation is considered to be wise.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I will.

Mr. ANDERSON. I gather from this report that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce had some hearings on this resolution.

Mr. TINKHAM. It had one hearing.

Mr. ANDERSON. Did anyone appear at that hearing?
Mr. TINKHAM. I did.
Mr. ANDERSON. Anybody else?
Mr. TINKHAM. No one.
Mr. ANDERSON. Was there any effort made by the gentleman or by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to get this information?
Mr. TINKHAM. I communicated with the Food Administration, and they sent me their unprinted report, containing, I should say, three or four pages in relation to sugar, but it was not a complete report. It was not a complete or very satisfactory one for answering the purpose of the resolution that is now before the House.
Mr. ANDERSON. This resolution was introduced, as the gentleman says, on June 30. That is only two months ago.
Mr. TINKHAM. That is true.
Mr. ANDERSON. And do the same conditions exist now as existed then?
Mr. TINKHAM. If anything, in my opinion, they are more acute.
Mr. ANDERSON. Has the gentleman made any effort to get information in regard to this matter from the sugar board—the Sugar Equalization Board?
Mr. TINKHAM. I have not.
Mr. ANDERSON. Does the gentleman know if the Sugar Equalization Board is still doing business?
Mr. TINKHAM. It is.
Mr. ANDERSON. Then the gentleman's proposition, apparently, is to have the Federal Trade Commission investigate the Sugar Equalization Board?
Mr. TINKHAM. The purpose of the resolution is to have a comprehensive, scientific Government report of the knowledge in possession of bureaus and boards that have to do with the sugar problem of the United States.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?
Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.
Mr. GARD. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker.
Mr. ANDERSON. I did not hear the last statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts, inasmuch as I was interrupted by the Chair.
Mr. TINKHAM. I said that the purpose of the resolution was to have a general assembly of all of the scientific knowledge and data in the possession of the different boards or organizations which have jurisdiction of the sugar situation or the regulation of sugar in the United States.
Mr. ANDERSON. Is it the expectation that the Federal Trade Commission will go into a general investigation as to the cost of manufacturing sugar and the reasonableness of the prices all over the country, and matters of that sort?
Mr. TINKHAM. If the honorable Representative from Minnesota wants me to interpret what the intention of the resolution is, I will do it so far as his question lays. I assume the Federal Trade Commission would communicate with the Sugar Equalization Board and with the Food Commission, and, having obtained the information that those two organizations possessed, and perhaps some information from other sources, would then make the report. I did not expect it would have hearings, appoint investigators, or have any general and long-continued formal investigation.
Mr. MARTIN. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. TINKHAM. I will.
Mr. MARTIN. The gentleman knows that the price of sugar to the producer in this country has been fixed by the Food Administration?
Mr. TINKHAM. I understand that that is the situation.
Mr. MARTIN. That being the situation, does not the answer follow that any profiteering that may have taken place in the sugar may have been by the wholesalers and retailers and not by the producers?
Mr. TINKHAM. I would think that very likely that might be so.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?
Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, it seems to me that the information of the gentleman who has proposed House resolution 150 can, to a very large extent, be given additional strength by a careful reading of the excellent speech delivered in this House by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MARTIN] on the subject of sugar and its primary relation with respect to the production of sugar and its first shipment to wholesalers and retailers.
The resolution which the gentleman has in mind is so comprehensive that I fear it would defeat its own purpose, since it provides an immediate investigation and report from the time he introduced it on June 30, 1919, and not reported out to the House until August 5, 1919; and an immediate investigation and report on the subject of sugar used for domestic and manufacturing purposes, both as to its market price, wholesale and retail, and whether these prices are unreasonable, would involve an immediate investigation from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Lakes to the Gulf, in all sorts of conditions and all sorts of times.
Information received to-day in so far as to what conditions might be in Massachusetts would be totally worthless to-morrow or a week from now. So that the purpose of the investigation, laudable though it may be, is exceedingly difficult of accomplishment.
I refer also to another matter in the proposed bill, which indicates that the investigation would involve a report of supplies in the possessions of the United States, raw and refined, and causes of the present sugar scarcity. In the report I find that this involves the surplus of supply of refined sugar now in the "possession" of the United States. The question of what is in the possession of the United States in the matter of food supply is under investigation by other committees appointed for the purpose by this House, and which committees are now meeting.
Mr. MARTIN. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. GARD. Yes; I yield.
Mr. MARTIN. I wish to state that in the speech to which the gentleman has just referred I stated the amount of raw sugar the United States now own. This information came from the Equalization Board, and they stated that on the 1st of July we had 1,000,000 tons of raw sugar in Cuba belonging to this Government.
Mr. GARD. The language of the resolution is peculiar when construed with the report. On that I will ask for information in a moment, after he understands my question.
Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. GARD. After I have asked this question. The resolution provides for an investigation to ascertain a report of "supplies" in the "possessions" of the United States, raw and refined. I presume by the word "supplies" the gentleman had in mind the sugar supply, although the use of the word "supplies" as it is in the bill, unqualified and unexplained, might be held to mean many things besides sugar, since they could be equally as well characterized as supplies. I call the gentleman's attention to that for the purpose of amendment in the event the bill is considered, and also for the purpose of having his explanation as to whether it means supplies in the "possessions" of the United States, meaning the territorial possessions of the United States, or whether he follows the language of the report, which means the surplus of raw and refined sugar now in the "possession" of the United States. In other words, does he mean the sugar is in the possession of the United States or does he refer to supplies in the possessions of the United States, such as the resolution calls for? After the gentleman explains that, I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON.]
Mr. TINKHAM. I drew the resolution, and I intended that that should be the "possessions of the United States"; that is, referring to the Philippines and Hawaii.
Mr. GARD. The territorial possessions?
Mr. TINKHAM. Yes. However, in the report it is referred to as "possession" instead of "possessions."
Mr. ANDERSON. On that point, does the gentleman think the word "possessions" would include the Territory of Hawaii?
Mr. TINKHAM. I should think so.
Mr. MARTIN. It would not include Cuba, however.
Mr. TINKHAM. No.
Mr. MARTIN. And that is where all the sugar is.
Mr. TINKHAM. I did not want to send them to Cuba.
Mr. ANDERSON. A gentleman here tells me it would not include the Territory of Hawaii. I just wanted to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio, who is a distinguished lawyer, and for whose opinion I have great respect, to the fact that this is a House resolution. It is a question whether, in the form of a House resolution, we have the right to ask the Federal Trade Commission for information of this character, and a question whether the Federal Trade Commission has authority to get it.
Mr. GARD. I think under the language of the Federal Trade Commission act either House may ask for information.
Mr. ANDERSON. That is true as to violations of the antitrust law, but general investigations outside of violations of the antitrust law can only be required by both Houses by the passage of a joint resolution by both Houses of Congress.
Mr. GARD. I am in sympathy with the purpose of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] in wishing to accord to all the people sugar to be bought by them at fair and reasonable prices, but I do not believe that that result which he hopes for can be accomplished by the resolution as it is worded at this time, and therefore, under the rule regarding the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, I object to the further consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio objects, and the resolution goes off the calendar. The Clerk will report the next one.

SUPPLY OF RAILROAD TIE TIMBER.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the resolution (H. Res. 186) requesting the Interstate Commerce Commission to make certain investigations regarding the present and future supply of tie timber.

The title of the resolution was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, I desire to call to the attention of the membership of the House what seems to me to be a very unusual procedure, something that I confess I have not seen, at least during the time of my stay here, where by House resolution the Interstate Commerce Commission is requested to make an investigation of matters relating to the present and future supply of tie timber. I would be glad to have the gentleman inform me what authority the House has over the Interstate Commerce Commission for the purpose of asking an investigation of this kind?

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the object of this resolution is, of course, to authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to make this investigation.

Mr. GARD. Did the gentleman intend to have this done by the Federal Trade Commission or the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. By the Interstate Commerce Commission, because it has directly charge of the railroads, and would naturally have charge of this resolution——

Mr. GARD. I will state to the gentleman that I am not familiar with the authority under which investigation might be made. Will the gentleman inform me as to that?

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. All the railroads come under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, so that a resolution to investigate tie timber would also come under the same commission.

Mr. GARD. What I want to know is what authority the House of Representatives has by an independent resolution to call upon the Interstate Commerce Commission to make an investigation as to certain things relating to ties and tie timber and report to the House the facts, with its findings and recommendations?

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I do not know why it should not have the right to do so.

Mr. GARD. I suspect that as a matter of its own work the Interstate Commerce Commission might make this investigation, but I doubt it. I say I am ignorant of the matter, and I would be glad if the gentleman would explain to me whether there is any authority on the part of the House of Representatives to ask the Interstate Commerce Commission to make this investigation and report to the House?

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I do not know of any other authority than I have stated.

Mr. GARD. I object to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection has been heard. The Clerk will report the next one.

SALE OF MACHINE TOOLS TO TECHNICAL SCHOOLS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 3143) to provide for further educational facilities by requiring the War Department to loan certain machine tools and scientific instruments not in use for Government purposes to trade and technical schools and universities, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, this bill is on the Union Calendar, and therefore I ask that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War shall lend to trade and technical schools and universities and other recognized educational institutions which in the discretion of the Secretary of War should have such equipment the machine tools and scientific instruments suitable for their use which are owned by the United States of America, which are under the control of the War Department, and which are not being used for Government purposes: Provided, however, That each institution so equipped shall be responsible to the United States of America, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War, for the proper care and safe return of such equipment when demanded, ordinary wear and tear excepted.

With committee amendments as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause down to and including line 5, on page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to sell at 10 per cent of their cost to trade, technical, and public schools and universities and other recognized educational institutions such machine tools as are suitable for their use which are now owned by the United States of America and are under the control of the War Department and are not needed for Government purposes. The money realized from the sale may be used by the Secretary of War to defray expenses incident to distribution, and the balance shall be turned into the Treasury of the United States: Provided, That in the event any such material is offered for sale by said institutions without the consent in writing of the Secretary of War, title thereto shall revert to the United States.

"Amend the title so as to read: 'A bill to provide for further educational facilities by authorizing the Secretary of War to sell at reduced rates certain machine tools not in use for Government purposes to trade, technical, and public schools and universities, other recognized educational institutions, and for other purposes.'"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is too late.

Mr. ANDERSON. I did not hear the Chair put the question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair put the question, and no objection was heard, and the Chair ordered the bill to be reported. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

Mr. ANDERSON. I desire to be recognized on the amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I asked to be recognized in order to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question or two. The object of the bill, no doubt, is laudable; but I was attracted by one paragraph in the report, in view of the peculiar situation that seems to exist in the country. That paragraph is this:

There is a very large quantity of the material. Its public sale would result in low prices; it would flood the market, disorganize the industry, and in many cases close down the factories—

And so forth.

I had supposed that the Attorney General was now engaged in a campaign to reduce prices, not only of food but machine tools and everything else, and I was wondering whether the gentleman from New York was interested in keeping up the prices of these articles.

Mr. CALDWELL. Not to the extent that the gentleman's question would indicate, but certainly to the extent of preventing a loss to our Government. The circumstances are these: The Government has stimulated the production of machine tools in order that it might take care of its own requirements, and in order that it might take care of the requirements of our Allies in the late war, and they accumulated an enormous amount of material. While they were doing that they built up in this country something that we never had before, and that was a skilled trade sufficient to take care of our requirements, able to do this kind of work.

Now, if we absolutely kill the business, if we shut down all the factories producing these tools, and the men who have learned the art go into other arts, we will lose one of the great benefits that has come from the war, and that is the development of that industry in this country.

Now, this bill, further answering the gentleman's question, not only tends to keep alive the art in a commercial way but it tends to establish schools all over the country from which we could draw skilled artisans in the event we need them in the future.

Our greatest weakness when we entered the war was that we did not have the material to make war with, nor did we have the machinery to make the material. We did not have the tools with which to make the machinery to make the material, and we did not have the men to run the machines with which to make the tools that made the machinery for the war. It was a good deal like the house that Jack built, when you get clear back to the question. We were apparently in a hopeless condition, but we have educated these men, and I think that if we do this we will probably be able to keep the art in commercial activity, and give some employment to a certain class of these men who have learned this trade and in that way benefit our country all around. That was my idea. The report was written by myself.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman is making a very good speech on the theory of protection of home industries, but the kind of protection that he proposes is somewhat camouflaged when compared with what this side ordinarily proposes. What the gentleman says simply illustrates the impossibility of getting results in the way of lowering the high cost of living by a campaign of psychology and bluffing, such as has been inaugurated by the Attorney General in the face of positive efforts to keep articles off the market, such as this report discloses.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] a question. As I understand the bill, it does not propose to put these machines on the market to be sold generally in the trade?

Mr. CALDWELL. No.

Mr. TOWNER. It is merely for the purpose of selling them at reduced rates to these schools.

Mr. CALDWELL. That is it.

Mr. TOWNER. So that it would not have the effect suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota of breaking up the market or destroying those who are engaged in this business.

Mr. CALDWELL. That is correct.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FESS). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. At what time is it proper to offer an amendment to the committee amendment which is now proposed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. An amendment to the amendment is now in order.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that the committee considered this legislation very carefully. There is a great quantity of this machinery on hand. It was thought at first that it might be a good thing to present it to the schools, but the War Department showed that if that course were pursued they would have to send officers to the various schools to inspect the machinery to see that it is kept in good repair and in proper use. They suggested the amendment so that we would be permitted to sell the machinery for a nominal sum to the educational institutions. The Government can not use it. It will probably serve a beneficial purpose in the schools, and I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman please advise the Members of the House as to the character of this machinery? I have not had an opportunity to read the report.

Mr. CALDWELL. A machine tool, as I understand it, and there are some people here who have operated them, is a piece of machinery that is used in the construction of other machinery. It is movable, like a lathe or a shaver, or a hundred such things that I might name—drills and all that sort of thing. In the trade schools and in the scientific schools all over the country, such as the Polytechnic School at Boston, Columbia University, the University of Texas, the University of California, the Northwestern University—practically all of the great schools throughout the country that have scientific branches—they need this sort of material in order that their students may learn the things they teach there. Besides that, in a great many high schools throughout the country they have manual training courses, in which they need machine tools to teach the young men how to handle the machinery and how to make it, in order that they might go into the trades rather than into commerce.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment: To strike out all of line 14, after the word "sale," on page 2, and the first six words of line 15.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 14 and 15, after the word "sale," strike out the words "may be used by the Secretary of War to defray expenses incident to distribution, and the balance."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I offer this amendment in this light. The committee amendment provides that this machinery is to be sold at 10 per cent "of their cost to trade." What that means is rather indefinite—"10 per cent of their cost to trade."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Not now. Then the bill further provides that the money—this 10 per cent—is to be used for the purpose of defraying the expenses.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. I think the gentleman misunderstands the language on line 8. That reads—

Ten per cent of their cost to trade, technical, and public schools, and universities—

And so forth. That is what the language means.

Mr. GARD. I suspect the gentleman is correct in that, but the same question arises to be determined. The matter of cost, I presume, is determined by the books of the War Department, but in this sale of machinery to trade and technical public schools, and so forth, the 10 per cent is supposed to be the selling cost, which, of course, is a very low price, and can only be justified by the benefit it would return in education to people in these technical schools.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. In just a moment. Some of these schools and colleges are able to buy their own supplies, but in addition to selling the machinery at such low cost I do not think the Government should defray the expenses incident to distribution. In other words, if the school comes in and pays 10 per cent of the cost of certain machine tools used in this technical department, I think that is affording the school and the students of that school a great opportunity for vocational training and education, and it is very proper. But I do not believe that the Government should pay the expense of sending that machinery out to California or Arizona or Washington, or wherever it may be, because the expenses of distribution may be greater or fully as great in very many cases as the 10 per cent of the cost which the Government gets for the material. It is in that light that I have offered this amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARD) there were—ayes 26, noes 13.

Accordingly the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I understood the Chair was just going to put the question on the amendment as amended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL], a member of the committee, desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. CALDWELL. The committee amendment is still subject to amendment, is it not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. CALDWELL. I offer this, not as a committee amendment, but because my attention has been called to the matter. I move to amend, in line 8, by striking out the word "cost" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "value."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CALDWELL: Page 2, line 8, strike out the word "cost" and insert in lieu thereof the word "value."

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, the reason I offer this amendment is that my attention has been called to the fact that a great deal of this machinery has been used in factories and is in a pretty bad state of repair, and in some instances perhaps 10 per cent of the cost would not be a fair value for it.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. I should like to ask the gentleman how he would have the value determined? There would have to be a commission or somebody appointed to go around and determine the value, would there not?

Mr. CALDWELL. These things will be distributed under the direction of the Secretary of War, and undoubtedly a board will pass on each instrument that is given away or sold.

Mr. HICKS. That would be a very cumbersome procedure.

Mr. CALDWELL. Anyway, every one of them will have to be surveyed before it is distributed, because the Government would not be justified in selling at this low price any machinery that it would want to keep, and the only thing that will be distributed to schools will necessarily be material that a board has passed on as being surplus.

Mr. HICKS. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Certainly.

Mr. HICKS. Does not the gentleman think that if we sell this material at a 10 per cent reduction it should be 10 per cent of the cost and not 10 per cent of the value at the time of sale?

Mr. CALDWELL. Ordinarily the gentleman would be right, but there will be some of this material that will not be of any use any place else except in just the kind of school that would get it, and I believe the intention of the War Department would be to distribute the stuff that would be unlikely to be needed by the Government at any time in the future, and it would be natural that it would distribute the stuff that had been badly used. In that case, 10 per cent in some instances might be too much. Of course, this is not a committee amendment. It is only my own idea which I have offered for the consideration of the House.

Mr. HICKS. If the gentleman will permit, if his amendment carries it will necessitate a board of appraisers to value every article sold, and this would involve a great deal of clerical help and much expense, whereas, basing the sale on cost, a reference to the books would be all that was necessary—a saving both of time and money.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Will they not have to appraise the value of every separate machine if the gentleman's amendment carries?

Mr. CALDWELL. Undoubtedly so.

Mr. KAHN. And will not that destroy the usefulness of the legislation?

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not think it will destroy it; but I am willing to accept the judgment of the House about it.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to ask the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] a question.

Mr. GARD. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not easy enough to ascertain what these things cost by the bills that come with them?

Mr. KAHN. That is why we are opposed to the amendment.

Mr. HICKS. That is the very point I am making. The amendment, as I understand it, does not base the 10 per cent on the cost but on the present value after the article or articles have been used. The original cost has nothing to do with it, according to the amendment proposed; that is why I oppose it, for I claim the original cost is the best standard to go by, and the schools which purchase this material will be obtaining a great reduction by a price 10 per cent of the original cost. They are not compelled to buy, it is optional with them, and I hardly think it fair to the Government to sell at such a reduction as would be given by 10 per cent of the valuation.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CALDWELL. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman having withdrawn his amendment, there is no occasion to speak in opposition thereto.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment by inserting after the word "institutions," in line 10, on page 2, the following:

Upon their application in writing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BEE: Page 2, line 10, after the word "institutions," insert "upon their application in writing."

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, I think the purpose of this bill is very good. The Government ought to dispose of its surplus of instruments of this character to these institutions that need them, but I do not believe they ought to be distributed to institutions that do not need them. A great many institutions are amply able to pay for them. Then, if you make them apply, the applications will come from those institutions that are in need of them and not able to spend the money.

Mr. CALDWELL. I think the gentleman is entirely right about it.

Mr. BEE. I ask for the adoption of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE].

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended.

On motion of Mr. CALDWELL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE TAGUE AGAINST FITZGERALD.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of Elections Committee No. 2, I renew the request for unanimous consent for immediate consideration of the resolution which has already been read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution in the contested-election case reported this morning. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Surely.

Mr. BLANTON. If the House of Representatives is so absolutely without power and so impotent that it is not possible to get information from the Secretary of Labor, how on God's earth do they expect to force men from Boston to do anything?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Because the law provides that we can issue process in the manner provided for in the resolution. In regard to getting information from the Secretary of Labor, that is another matter.

Mr. BLANTON. Suppose they refuse; do you expect to make the mandate good? We have not been enforcing the mandates of the House thus far.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRISON. Reserving the right to object, I want to understand what the resolution is.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I will ask the Clerk to report the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Elections No. 2, to which was referred the contested-election case of Peter F. Tague, contestant, against John F. Fitzgerald, contestee, from the tenth congressional district of Massachusetts, respectfully reports to the House the following resolution, approved by said committee, for approval and adoption by the House, with the recommendation that it do pass:

"Resolved, That M. W. Burlen, Edward P. Murphy, Frederick J. Finnegan, and Jacob Wasserman, the members of the board of election commissioners of the city of Boston, or any successor of them in said office, be, and they are hereby, ordered to be and appear before Elections Committee No. 2 of the House of Representatives forthwith, then and there to testify before said committee or such commission as shall be appointed touching such matters then to be inquired of by said committee in the contested-election case of Peter F. Tague against John F. Fitzgerald, now before said committee for investigation and report; and that the members of the board of election commissioners of the city of Boston bring with them all such ballots and packages of ballots cast in every precinct in the said tenth congressional district of Massachusetts at the general election held in said district on the 5th day of November, 1919, as were described as challenged, disputed, or contested ballots, either at the recount of the ballots cast at said general election conducted by said board of election commissioners of the city of Boston, or at the taking of depositions before notaries public in this case; also, all ballots received from absent soldiers and sailors and not counted; that said ballots be examined and counted by or under the authority of such committee on elections in said case; and to that end that proper subpœnas be issued to the Sergeant at Arms of this House, commanding him to summon said members of the board of election commissioners of the city of Boston, or any successor in office of either of them, to appear with such ballots as witnesses in said case; that service of said subpœnas shall be deemed sufficient if made by registered letter, and such service shall be so made unless otherwise directed by said Committee on Elections No. 2; and that the expenses of said witnesses and all other expenses under this resolution be paid out of the contingent fund of the House; and that said committee be, and hereby is, empowered to send for all other persons and papers as it may find necessary for the proper determination of said controversy; and also be, and it is, empowered to select a subcommittee to take the evidence and count said ballots or votes, and report same to the Committee on Elections No. 2 under such regulations as shall be prescribed for that purpose; and that the aforesaid expenses be paid on the requisition of the chairman of said committee after the auditing and allowance thereof by said Elections Committee No. 2, and when approved by the Committee on Accounts."

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, in regard to the form of this resolution it follows verbatim the form set forth in Hinds' Precedents as a form of resolution authorizing an election committee to procure ballots and other evidence. It follows the exact form used in the Fifty-eighth Congress in the case of Kahn against Livernash.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know whether the resolution will take up any time in the discussion.

Mr. LEHLBACH. No; I think it will pass without discussion.

Mr. HARRISON. In that case I have no objection.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The committee is unanimous on wanting to examine these ballots; the contestant and the contestee both want them examined and the board of election commissioners is desirous of producing them.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, is this a request for unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. GARD. I understand both parties want it done and the committee is unanimous in making the request.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE WAR AND ITS CAUSE.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the war, the cause thereof, and the incidents thereto.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the cause of the war, and so forth. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks made this morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on next Tuesday morning after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table I may be permitted to address the House for 40 minutes on a report recently filed by the Secretary of Labor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that next Tuesday morning after the reading of the Journal and disposition of matters on the Speaker's table he be allowed to address the House for 40 minutes on a report recently filed by the Secretary of Labor. Is there objection?

Mr. MONAHAN of Wisconsin. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire whether the gentleman's remarks will be before or after the prayer. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. After the prayer if I can get enough Republicans here to hear the prayer.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say that there will be no more unanimous-consent requests granted hereafter.

COMMISSIONED PERSONNEL FOR THE ARMY UNTIL JUNE 30, 1920—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill S. 2622.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California calls up the conference report on the bill S. 2622.

Mr. GARD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. Are we to longer continue the work on the Unanimoust Consent Calendar?

The SPEAKER. The conference report is of the highest privilege and can be called up at any time.

Mr. GARD. The question I put is whether after the conference report is disposed of we will revert to the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair intends to recognize some gentleman for unanimous consent for suspension of the rules, and after that if there is any time we will take up the Unanimous Consent Calendar again.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2622) to provide necessary commissioned personnel for the Army until June 30, 1920, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed by the House, insert the following:

"That until June 30, 1920, the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to maintain such commissioned personnel in addition to the officers of the Permanent Establishment and to retain at their temporary grades such officers of the Regular Army as in his judgment may be necessary for the proper performance of the functions of the Military Establishment: Provided, That additional officers so maintained shall be selected, so far as practicable, from officers and enlisted men who served during the emergency and are applicants for appointments in the Permanent Establishment: Provided further, That after October 31, 1919, the total number of commissioned officers, exclusive of retired officers and disabled emergency officers awaiting discharge upon completion of treatment for physical reconstruction, shall at no time exceed 18,000: Provided further, That no officer on the active list shall be detailed for recruiting service or for duty at schools and colleges, not including schools of the service, where officers on the retired list can be secured who are competent for such duty: And provided further, That hereafter officers retired for physical disability shall not form part of the limited retired list: And provided further, That 1,200 emergency officers shall be assigned to the Air Service, of whom not less than 85 per cent shall be duly qualified fliers."

And the House agree to the same.

FRANK L. GREENE,
S. H. DENT, Jr.,
Managers on the part of the House.
J. W. WADSWORTH, Jr.,
HOWARD SUTHERLAND,
GEO. E. CHAMBERLAIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2622) to provide necessary commissioned personnel for the Army until June 30, 1920, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on:

The Senate receded from its disagreement to the amendment of the House with changes, the effects of which are as follows:

The first change enables officers of the Regular Army who at the present time are at the head of the construction, transportation, and other divisions of the Army to retain their present assignments at the head of those divisions; otherwise they would be demoted to their regular grades in the Army and the temporary emergency officers who now are serving with them would outrank them and succeed to the command of the divisions.

By the second change, the date, October 30, is changed to October 31. This change is deemed desirable, as it was originally intended to have the date fixed as the last day of the calendar month.

The third change is intended to help retired officers and disabled emergency officers who may be in the Army hospitals under treatment.

JULIUS KAHN,
FRANK L. GREENE,
S. H. DENT, Jr.,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, upon that I move the previous question on the conference report.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order——

The SPEAKER. After the point of no quorum is made no business can be transacted. The Chair will count. [After counting.] The Chair is satisfied that no quorum is present.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TILSON). Two hundred and fifty-one gentlemen have answered to their names; a quorum is present.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. KAHN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

INCREASED COMPENSATION TO POSTAL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass House joint resolution 151, with an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to suspend the rules and pass House joint resolution 151, with an amendment——

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I demand——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee demands a second.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The point of order is that the Unanimous Consent Calendar has not been disposed of, and under the rules of the House the cases on the Unanimous Consent Calendar must first be disposed of before motions are in order to suspend the rule.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman is mistaken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order of the gentleman from New York. It has been repeatedly held by ex-Speaker CLARK and others that the Unanimous Consent Calendar can be suspended at any time and gentlemen recognized for suspension of the rules. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the Chair hear me for a moment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has made the decision in accordance with the rules and precedents. If the gentleman desires to ask unanimous consent to be heard, the Chair will submit the request.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. What is the request?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is the request of the gentleman from Minnesota that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To which request does the gentleman object?

Mr. MADDEN. I object to the request of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman does not object to a second being considered as ordered?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman says that he does not object to a second being considered as ordered.

Mr. MADDEN. But I do object to the request of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DYER. That has already been disposed of.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman from Illinois said that he objected to some request of mine. I do not know to what he refers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] mistook the gentleman's request. He thought the gentleman made a unanimous-consent request, which he did not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. One moment. I reserve the right to object——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman reserves the right to object——

Mr. DYER. I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota? Does the gentleman from New York object?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. What is the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That a second be considered as ordered. Does the gentleman from New York object?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is demanded. Does anyone object to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. I ask that the motion be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STEENERSON moves to suspend the rules and pass House joint resolution 151, with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert the following:

"That because of the unusual conditions which now exist the compensation provided for in the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920,' approved February 28, 1919, for assistant postmasters at first and second class post offices, inspectors, supervisory officials, clerks at division headquarters, special clerks, clerks at first and second class post offices, and letters carriers in the City Delivery Service, printers, mechanics, and skilled laborers, watchmen, messengers, requisition fillers, packers, and laborers, railway postal clerks, rural letter carriers, carriers in the Village Delivery Service, and postmasters of the third class shall be increased $150 per annum, except that no third-class postmaster shall receive more than $2,000 per annum, and that the compensation of fourth-class postmasters shall be increased 10 per cent of the amount now authorized by law. That the above-mentioned increases shall be effective from July 1, 1919, and that substitute, temporary, and auxiliary clerks at first and second class post offices, and substitutes, temporary, and auxiliary letter carriers in the City Delivery Service shall be paid during the remainder of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, at the rate of 60 cents per hour for each hour of service performed.

"SEC. 2. That in order to provide for the increased compensation herein authorized, so much as is necessary is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supplement the amounts authorized for such employees in the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes,' approved February 28, 1919."

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. This bill is now moved under suspension of the rules, and I desire to ask the Chair whether a motion may be made to amend or to offer a substitute for the amendment proposed in the committee report? The committee reports the bill with an amendment thereto, and I ask the Chair whether it will be in order to offer an amendment to the amendment reported by the committee, or a substitute in lieu of the amendment offered by the committee? And to make it perfectly plain I will say that the amendment that I propose to offer, if it is in order, is to provide a percentage increase of the salaries of the postal employees as provided by the House joint resolution 181.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will say to the gentleman from New York that the gist of his question can be answered in one sentence, namely, that it is not in order to amend the motion to suspend the rules and pass a bill.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. In other words, do I understand the Chair to say that under the motion made by the gentleman from Minnesota to suspend the rules there can not be at any stage an amendment to the bill as proposed by the committee?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York has been a Member of this House for many years, and knows the rules well.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I am directing a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman knows quite well that under supension of the rules no amendment is in order. The Chair is bound to uphold the rules of the House whatever may be the personal opinion of the occupant of the chair as to the merits of the proposition.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. There is this distinction, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rules of the House and the universal practice no amendment is in order.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. If the Chair will allow me to call attention to the distinction——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has fuliy answered the gentleman's parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] is recognized.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Chair a question for information.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KELLER. Will we have time to speak against the resolution of the committee?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] is recognized for 20 minutes in favor of the resolution; the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] will be recognized for 20 minutes in opposition. Any time desired must be secured from one of these gentlemen.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I ask unanimous consent, inasmuch as I filed minority views on this bill, that I may have 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that in addition to the time provided by the rules he be permitted to use 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from New York is the only one who makes a minority report. He is on the committee, and I suppose he would be entitled to the 20 minutes, would he not?

Mr. MADDEN. The other man has received it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The usual practice of the House is that the gentleman who demands a second shall control the time in opposition.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I rose at the same time that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] did. The Chair did not recognize me, although I was the only member of the committee who made the minority report. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee is the ranking member on the minority side of the committee, and it is the universal practice that such member shall be recognized. This was the only reason why the Chair recognized him in preference to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE]. The Chair assumed that the gentleman who demanded a second was opposed to the bill, but has no knowledge on that subject.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] opposed to this motion?

Mr. MOON. I do not know if the gentleman from Illinois has the right to ask the question.

Mr. CANNON. I wanted to find out whether this was a conspiracy or not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that is hardly a parliamentary inquiry. At any rate, the present occupant of the chair is not a party to it. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] will proceed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Whatever went with the request that the gentleman from New York made that he have 15 minutes?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was objected to.

Mr. CANNON. May I be indulged for a single sentence? You should not rush this thing through by such a conspiracy.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, the proposition offered by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads is to grant temporary relief to the postal employees. A year ago they were given an increase of $200, and in the present current Post Office appropriation bill, under which we are now operating, there were additional increases. We granted those increases after conferring with the representatives of the employees, or many of them. On the suggestion and recommendation of the Post Office Department there was a joint commission created to revise the postal salaries upon an equitable basis. That commission was appointed, consisting of five Senators and five Representatives, and they have commenced work. I am one of the members of that commission and am on the subcommittee which has the work in charge of investigating the whole question. It developed, however, as the work of that commission went on, that it was difficult to adjust the salaries on an equitable basis in a short time. There are nearly 300,000 employees, and it was necessary, in the judgment of that commission, to send out questionnaires to all of them. They have got to be digested and arranged. And so we concluded we probably could not get a recommendation to the Congress for legislative action until this fiscal year was just about near to an end.

For this reason the postal employees have asked for temporary relief. Now, it is impossible to revise all these salaries blindly. If you did that you would commit an injustice to many. There are many propositions to increase salaries on a percentage basis. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE], for example, would increase them from 30 to 40 per cent. That would give a $3,000 man $1,000, without our knowing whether you could afford to do that, and it would not increase the lower-paid employees commensurately. So in view of the fact that we wanted to do something to relieve the situation on account of the high cost of living, it became the general opinion that we had better make a flat increase to all employees, unless we were ready to leave it to the Post Office Department and let the Postmaster General distribute the increases as he saw fit.

This resolution as drawn met with the approval of the Post Office Department, and I think it was originally suggested by them; that is, they asked for a blanket authority to increase salaries all along the line at 35 per cent, in their discretion. But if you will read the report on this bill you will notice that they reserve the right to construe that to mean that they might increase the salaries in those places where the exigencies were extraordinary and unusual. Now, then, from the inquiries that the members of the committee made, it was found that these exigencies would be in those places where private employment was so profitable as to make postal employees resign by the wholesale, and in order to keep up the service they wanted to pay employees in those places a higher salary, notwithstanding the fact that the cost of living was not any higher in those places than in many other places.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman said they had sent out a questionnaire to about 300,000 employees?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; to between 250,000 and 300,000.

Mr. LAZARO. Does your committee intend to go over those replies?

Mr. STEENERSON. We employ clerks for that purpose, so as to digest them and get a bird's-eye view of them, and we propose to hold hearings in New York, Boston, Chicago, St. Paul or Minneapolis, and St. Louis and Kansas City, and so on, during the next month, so that we are prosecuting that work as rapidly as we can.

I mention that to show you that this is simply a temporary measure to grant relief because the cost of living has risen and is unusually high throughout the whole country.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEENERSON. For a brief question.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman tell us why his committee made the increase so small—not as large as that given to other employees of the Government?

Mr. STEENERSON. By adding this proposed increase to the increases already made, you get just as large an increase as other Government employees have received. In fact, I think it exceeds the increase given to others.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. I would like to ask the gentleman along that line if it is the purpose of the committee to hold any meetings west of St. Paul or Kansas City?

Mr. STEENERSON. We will hold a meeting in Kansas City. I believe that is as far west as we shall go.

Mr. MILLER. You will not go to the Pacific coast?

Mr. STEENERSON. We will not hold meetings on the Pacific coast.

Mr. MILLER. Has the commission considered the advisability of doing that?

Mr. STEENERSON. The commission has considered the advisability of holding meetings at the places mentioned, and the employees will be represented at the nearest point.

Now, Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has remaining 13 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. We found upon inquiry, especially by the report of the Secretary of Labor, that the increase in the cost of living in some of these towns where the resignations of postal employees were the most numerous was not as high as in places where the resignations were fewer. The cost of living is the highest in certain seaboard towns, where shipbuilding has been in progress.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will yield for a question, but I will say to the gentleman that the cost of living, according to the Department of Labor, in New York has increased, since 1914, 79 per cent, but in Norfolk, Va., it has increased 87 per cent.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Minnesota whether it is not a fact that the average increase throughout the country has been about 87 per cent?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will answer that it has not.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. It has not?

Mr. STEENERSON. It has not. The Department of Labor's report as to 18 cities in the United States shows 76.1 per cent as the average of those 18 cities throughout the country. If you will take that report of the 18 cities and divide the total of the percentages by 18 you will get that figure which I have stated. New York is not the highest.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Does the gentleman think that the increase proposed, namely, $150, will suffice to cover the needs and the wants of the men in the Postal Service in the cities?

Mr. STEENERSON. It will cover the needs of those who are paid the least. It will cover the needs of those who are paid $900 or $1,000, and there are many of those in the Postal Service. We are increasing the wage of the laborer, who formerly got only 40 cents an hour, 50 per cent, to 60 cents an hour, which is more than the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] proposes. We are looking after the small man, while he is looking after the aristocrats in the employment, who get $3,000 a year.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I am proposing to increase every man in the Postal Service.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman is proposing to increase the salary of the man who receives $3,000 a year. As a temporary measure, we are giving to the small man an increase of $150, just the same as to the man in the service who receives high salary.

Mr. RUBEY and Mr. ROGERS rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. STEENERSON. I will yield first to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman tell the House, in general terms, when this committee of investigation is likely to report?

Mr. STEENERSON. It expects to report at the first regular session and submit it to the different committees, and the committees, I think, will try to get a provision into the next annual appropriation bill, which has to be passed before the beginning of the next fiscal year.

I will say to gentlemen here who are friends of the Postal Service that after having served on the committee for 16 or 17 years with these gentlemen here, who have been devoting the best of their lives to work in connection with the Postal Service, men like Judge MOON and Mr. BELL and others, I will say that we naturally have a very tender feeling for the postal employees, and we do know that there is a lot of injustice in the present adjustment of salaries.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. STEENERSON. And we want to revise those salaries so as to do justice all around, and we can only do that if we are given time enough to do the work thoroughly and fairly and intelligently. In order to do that we have got to pass this bill to satisfy the employees temporarily, and it is to help the small man rather than the big man. Now I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUBEY. The gentleman stated a moment ago that he was attempting to take care of those who receive the smallest salaries.

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. RUBEY. Does the gentleman think a 10 per cent increase for fourth-class postmasters, the smallest-paid employees of the Government, is a sufficient increase?

Mr. STEENERSON. I think it is the best increase in the bill. They are getting more than 10 per cent. They will, with the present allowance, receive 25 per cent increase.

Mr. RUBEY. Not under this proposition.

Mr. STEENERSON. They are getting a 25 per cent increase. And why should the gentleman think we ought to revise all these salaries now, when we do not know anything about it, rather than wait until we get the information and do it intelligently? We want to give the $150 increase simply as a temporary relief.

Mr. HASTINGS. Did the committee consider giving a minimum amount to fourth-class postmasters rather than increasing their salaries 10 per cent?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; we did consider that most thoroughly.

Mr. HASTINGS. Suppose a fourth-class postmaster gets only $25 a year in cancellations, does the gentleman think and does the committee think a 10 per cent increase, which would be only $2.50, would be adequate?

Mr. STEENERSON. I think we have done very well by the fourth-class postmasters and all of the employees.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think the fourth-class postmasters are the poorest-paid servants of this Government.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. STEENERSON. I reserve the balance of my time. I will insert in the RECORD part of the report on the bill:

"The committee recommends that the bill as amended do pass.

"The original resolution authorized the Postmaster General, where extraordinary and unusual conditions exist, to pay during the fiscal year 1920 postal employees an amount not exceeding 35 per cent per annum of their basic salary in addition to the compensation now paid. In his letter recommending its passage, a copy of which is hereto attached, the Postmaster General says:

"It should be understood, however, that the department does not construe this resolution as intending that flat increases of not exceeding 35 per cent shall be granted all employees in the Postal Service, but are to be paid only where extraordinary and unusual conditions prevail. It is believed that such conditions prevail in only a few instances.

"The committee does not share this belief. So far as postal employees are concerned, the unusual conditions consist in the great increase in the cost of living, and this is general throughout the country. The general authority asked for, while enabling the department to retain in the service employees in certain industrial centers, where wages in private industry are unusually high, by increasing salaries, such action would be an unjust discrimination against employees in other localities where the cost of living is equally high, and would result in general dissatisfaction and demoralization. The committee, therefore, concluded that pending a complete revision and readjustment of postal salaries now under consideration by the joint commission the best thing to do was to make the specific and uniform increases herein recommended. The department estimates the cost of the proposed increases at $40,000,000, while the committee believes they will not exceed $35,000,000; but however that may be, the increases are absolutely necessary now, and further and greater increases will have to be made in order that the service may reach and maintain that degree of efficiency which the public imperatively demands, and postal revenues, if insufficient, will have to be so readjusted as to meet the increased expense.

"The maximum asked for by the Postmaster General would authorize him to expend in his discretion as to persons and places a great deal more than $40,000,000. To grant his request would be to offer a premium on political favoritism and encourage waste and extravagance.

"The report of the Postmaster General on H. J. Res. 151, above referred to, follows:

"OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
"Washington, D. C., July 25, 1919.

"Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON,
"Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,
"House of Representatives.

"MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of the 21st instant, with which you inclosed a copy of H. J. Res. 151, introduced by Mr. MADDEN, to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service for extraordinary and unusual conditions prevailing, and in reply I beg to state that it would be advantageous at the present time if the department were granted the authority covered by this resolution. It should be understood, however, that the department does not construe this resolution as intending that flat increases of not exceeding 35 per cent shall be granted all employees in the Postal Service, but are to be paid only where extraordinary and unusual conditions prevail. It is believed that such conditions prevail in only a few instances.

"The resolution, therefore, has my approval, and I recommend its passage.

"Very sincerely,

"A. S. BURLESON,
"Postmaster General.

"The departmental report on the Zihlman bill (H. R. 8537) and the flat increases of $150 proposed in this bill follows:

"OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
"Washington, D. C., August 27, 1919.

"Hon. HALVOR STEENERSON,
"Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,
"House of Representatives.

"MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: With reference to your request for the department's views with regard to the bill (H. R. 8537) introduced by Mr. ZIHLMAN to provide additional compensation for certain employees in the Postal Service, also the proposed amendment to provide a flat increase of $150 per annum for these employees, I wish to state that the proposed legislation does not have the approval of this department.

"The employees of the Postal Service were granted temporary increases in salaries because of war conditions during the fiscal year 1918 of approximately $32,000,000, the increases in most cases being $200 each. These temporary increases have been continued during the current fiscal year and other additional increases granted in most instances of $100.

"These increases had the approval of this department and were thoroughly satisfactory to the employees of the Postal Service when the act was approved February 28, 1919. In addition to these increases in compensation, the act also provided for the appointment of a congressional commission to make an investigation for the purpose of reclassifying the salaries in the Postal Service. This commission is now prosecuting its labors and will no doubt make a report early in December when the next regular session of Congress convenes.

"The bill introduced by Mr. ZIHLMAN, if enacted into law, would grant the employees in addition to what has already been granted, approximately $100,000,000 in increased compensation. If a flat increase of $150 for each employee is made, it would amount to approximately $40,000,000 for the current fiscal year.

"Because of the increases already granted the revenues are insufficient to meet the expenditures in the Postal Service, and to grant the increases above would involve a deficit of approximately $100,000,000 during the current fiscal year, or, if the flat increase of $150 is made, a deficit of $40,000,000, and would place an additional burden upon the public of that amount, which would have to be borne by taxation or otherwise.

"In determining whether these increases should be granted, a peculiar responsibility rests upon the Postmaster General. It is his duty to be fair to the postal employees and to the public as well. The Postal Service should not be conducted for profit, and the employees should be paid fair wages; but to grant these unreasonable increases would place upon the public an unjust burden.

"The salaries in the Postal Service, like those of any other service where the salaries are standardized, may be inadequate in certain localities because of the extraordinary and unusual industrial conditions. The department recognizes this fact, and for that reason gave its approval to H. J. Res. 151, introduced by Mr. MADDEN, and which, if enacted into law, would enable the department to provide for the needs of the service. It would give the department authority to increase the salaries of the postal employees temporarily where it should be done. A few million dollars properly spent under this resolution would amply care for the needs of the service and enable the department to pay a just and fair wage. There is no exigency in the Postal Service which would justify the proposed increases in salaries, and, therefore, they do not have the approval of this department.

"Very sincerely,

"J. C. KOONS,
"Acting Postmaster General."

Average increase, 76.1 per cent.

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. I reserve my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that the House does not apprehend the purpose of this bill. This is not intended as a permanent measure at all. It is only to grant temporary relief to these officials pending the investigation of postal salaries. The commission appointed for that purpose is required to report in December, only three months away. It was impossible for the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to make a full investigation as to the claims of all these classes of postal employees at this time. If the House acts on the matter without any knowledge of the subject except that which we all have in a general way, the work of this postal commission will be utterly useless.

This bill is not intended as a permanent settlement of this matter at all. It is, as I remarked, purely a matter of temporary relief. The committee has made the bill retroactive, so as to cover the present fiscal year, and in the judgment of the committee $150 added to the salary of each employee is sufficient to meet temporary demands.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. MOON. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. LANHAM. Does the gentleman think that even as a temporary measure the increases here allowed will prevent the resignations which are occurring in the Postal Service, especially among those in the more poorly paid grades, when unskilled laborers are making much more money than these trained employees are making to-day? In other words, this proposition may be all right in the long run, but pretty bad for the short-winded man.

Mr. MOON. The gentleman has made a remark which shows that he has a kindly feeling for the postal clerks, as I am sure we all have. Of course this relief is only temporary and may not be adequate in all cases. The report of the commission is to be made in December, when full justice, we hope, will be done. The question is whether you are going to give this temporary relief or not. To be frank, this bill has been brought up under a motion to suspend the rules and pass it, because of the disposition in this House to run away with expenses on questions of this sort. It was brought before you in this method in order to prevent you from amending it. So you have to take this or you have to take nothing, and final settlement will be made under the commission report. That is the proposition before you. [Laughter.] None of you are likely to vote against——

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. No; I can not yield.

Mr. KELLER. The trouble is that the House is asked to act on this matter when it knows very little about it.

Mr. MOON. I can not yield. I am not going into a discussion of the adequacy of the amount. As stated by the chairman of the committee, Mr. STEENERSON, the $150 will be a very great help to the low-salaried men who are getting $1,000, $1,100, or $1,200. It will be a proper addition, perhaps, to the salaries of those who are getting more. We hope soon to adjust them all on a basis of equality, so that there may be reasonably just compensation to all of the employees. Perhaps some of them are getting too much now. Some are getting too little. I want to say that, as a class, as a whole, they are perhaps the best-paid employees of the Government of the United States; but still they are close to the people, and the people's money will have to be used to give greater compensation in these times when the cost of living is so much higher. But you must remember that these times will not always last, and when you get back to normal conditions, if you put up the salaries to the highest figures to meet the present conditions, you can not get the salaries back to save your souls from perdition. It has never been done. You have to move carefully in matters of this kind and be sure that you grant full compensation to all employees. The public rights must be protected also.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOON. I can not yield now. You have to move carefully in matters of this kind, and if you want to give this temporary relief to these employees the way to give it is to vote to suspend the rules and pass the bill. If you do not want to do that, you had better wait until you get the report of this commission. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE], who sought to obtain control of the time, with the assistance of my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], is not against this bill in the sense that he opposes the increase of the salaries. He is against it because he wants higher and larger salaries paid. In order that he may express his opinion on the question, I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes; or, if there is anybody who wants to speak against the whole bill, I would like to yield to him first and then to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I would like two minutes.

Mr. MOON. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois two minutes right now. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TILSON). The gentleman from Tennessee has used eight minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, my duties as a member of the Committee on Appropriations have required my constant attention since the commencement of this session. I did not know that such a bill had been reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and when the motion came to suspend the rules, with 20 minutes' debate on a side, I was of the opinion that it would bear debate and consideration, and I think the House by a majority would pass a just and proper bill upon such consideration. Certainly the bill does not do complete justice. It gives too much in some places and too little in others. I think the House is competent to pass upon that matter, and we are not so pressed for pending legislation that we can not consider this bill in that way.

I have great confidence in the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON]. We have had a long service together in the House. I acknowledge his ability and his knowledge, especially touching matters of compensation in the post-office service and other postal matters. I did not intend by anything I have said to reflect upon him. I was only protesting that I thought the bill ought to be considered by the House under the rules in Committee of the Whole House rather than under a motion to suspend the rules without amendment.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York who made the minority report.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, if this bill had been brought up in the regular way there would have been an opportunity to fully debate and vote on an amendment which would have given to the postal employees in this country a fair and just increase of their salary. The gentleman from Minnesota, ably supported by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], saw fit, however, to bring this bill up, within a few days after it was reported to the House, under a motion to suspend the rules. I want the House and the postal men of the country, and the men of America whose hearts beat in sympathy with the cause of the postal men, to understand that through the legislative device adroitly planned by both the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] every chance to have consideration for the provisions contained in House joint resolution 181 is throttled. Opportunity to amend this bill so as to give the postal employees the salaries they deserve is cut off by means of the parliamentary procedure now pursued. Such a course merits condemnation. [Applause.] On the one hand the gentleman from Minnesota professes friendship and sympathy for the men who are underpaid, and on the other hand he resorts to tactics which prevent Members of the House introducing amendments to the bill.

The rate of increase in cost of living averages 87 or 88 per cent. The men, especially in cities, and I take it it is so in towns, too, are unable, with the salaries they are now receiving, the minimum as well as the maximum grade, to properly maintain themselves and their families, and keep their homes provided in accordance with the American standard of living, and meet the occasional expense of sickness and other misfortunes, and pay the ever-increasing high rents. By reason of the inadequacy of pay men are resigning in greater numbers than ever before, and it is difficult now to get men to enter the service. We have even had to lower the standard of examination to get a sufficient supply of men.

It is a grievous injustice and great unfairness to these men to give them only this proposed pittance of $150. Do not attempt, gentlemen, to go back to the letter carriers and the postal clerks and others affected by this bill, pat them on the shoulder, as you have for years, and tell them you are friends of the men employed in the Postal Service. If you were friends of these men, who are the poorest-paid men in the Government service, who are rendering faithful, laborious, intelligent, and efficient service, you would have given them at least an opportunity in this House at an early day to get a full and free expression from the membership of this House, and not resort to this adroit method of cutting off all amendments except the amendment of the committee, which gives the men merely a flat $150.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was right in the criticism he made, for the Chair erroneously ruled that I was not entitled to recognition. I rose to demand a second, that I might be in control of the time on my side. I have served in this House for many years, and I have never known an instance where one making a minority report, if he was the only member of the committee making the minority report, was not given the preference. I have never known it until now, when this method of using the steam roller is employed in order that the postal men may not receive a just increase.

What harm would it have been, I ask the gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], if a chance had been given in the usual and ordinary way to have this House vote on the bill (H. R. 181) introduced by me giving them 35 per cent increase in their salary? I intended to offer the substance of that bill as an amendment to the committee bill—at least in modified form, so as to give to the employees at least a 25 per cent increase and to substitute employees pay at the rate of 75 cents per hour. Even with the proposed increase of $150 the employees would be really paid less than the unskilled and common labor throughout the country is now receiving. If you will read my minority views you will find that with the $150 the men would still be getting a cent per hour less than is paid to the kind of unskilled labor of whom no mental effort is required at all. We are told it is unwise now to provide a larger increase than $150, as the Postal Commission is about to hold its sessions. I know what commissions amount to. I know what investigations mean. They are long-drawn-out affairs. The members go on junkets from one city to another and the expense piles up, and then they come back, bring in lengthy reports at pretty nearly the close of the Congress, and usually that is the end of it.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Yes.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman knows, of course, that the Democratic Postmaster General is opposed even to this small increase, does he not?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I do not care whether it is a Democratic Postmaster General or a Republican Postmaster General. That does not concern the issue involved. Those who professed so frequently their friendship for the laboring men, and particularly for the clerks and carriers, ought not seek out legislative methods to impede an honest effort to secure a living, decent wage to men whose service has been rendered with fidelity, intelligence, and efficiency. It is purely a nonpartisan proposition; politics ought not to enter into it.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Yes.

Mr. UPSHAW. Will the gentleman state, because many of us would like to know, why in making this increase of $150 it was not, at least, made $240—as much as the bonus given to many other employees?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. It was because the committee was determined not to give these men the increase that they merit and deserve. Otherwise, would the gentleman from Minnesota have been so warmly worked up against allowing an amendment to be considered by the House? I begged the gentleman from Minnesota, and I have implored every man who had a hand in bringing on this motion to suspend the rules, to refrain from such procedure at this time or else to allow the proposition for the percentage increase to come up. They refused to do it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact, the Postmaster General recommended this bill, did he not?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The Postmaster General recommended the discretionary bill, originally introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], which is inexpedient and which every Member of the Post Office Committee, including the introducer, admits ought not to pass. Hence the committee amended it by providing this paltry increase of $150.

Mr. PELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Yes.

Mr. PELL. This bill increases the pay $150, and it will make a very small increase to the city carrier, will it not?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. It will be absolutely inadequate. It will not satisfy the just demands of the men. Aside from this, the American public recognize that the Government is not treating the men fairly and favor a liberal increase. I think the people all recognize that $150 is entirely too small.

Mr. PELL. It will raise the men only from $1,500 to $1,650.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. That is all; and they can not live on that in a way becoming an American wage earner under existing conditions and the high cost of living.

Mr. PELL. It seems to me to be clearly inadequate.

Mr. DYER. It ought to be $500.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. In my limited time I can not discuss the matter further or in a way its importance demands. To make clearer my views, under leave to extend my remarks, I append my minority report on the bill.

The minority report is as follows:

INCREASED SALARIES OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, submitted the following as the views of the minority:

I emphatically dissent from the conclusion of the majority of the Post Office Committee to provide an increase temporarily in the pay of the postal employees mentioned in the committee amendment to House joint resolution 151 of only $150 per annum. Such an increase will be grossly inadequate in amount and unscientific and unmethodical in its allotment and distribution. It utterly fails to meet the situation which in the light of the high and increased cost of living requires, as a matter of fairness and common justice to the postal workers, a higher increase and better wages, so that under present conditions they may be enabled to properly, comportable with American living standards, maintain themselves and their dependent families.

House joint resolution 151, as originally introduced by Mr. MADDEN, is conceded by the latter and every one of the committee to be wholly inexpedient. The author of it, therefore, now proposes a substitute, with which the majority of the committte agree, to provide this temporary flat increase of $150, except that certain auxiliary clerks and substitute carriers shall have 60 cents per hour. House joint resolution No. 181, introduced by me, provides for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1919, an increase of 35 per cent of the salary or compensation of each employee (except substitutes, who are to receive at the rate of 80 cents per hour).

Had the committee allowed hearings on these measures, which are not merely important to employees but seriously affect the efficiency and morale of the service itself, the general membership of the House doubtless would have been furnished with ample data necessitating as well as justifying the percentage increase provided by House joint resolution 181. The committee saw fit to deny hearings, and thus to some extent placed the men so seriously affected by the question involved at more or less disadvantage in presenting by way of hearings to the individual membership of the House figures which demonstrate the immediate necessity for a real, substantial percentage increase of pay.

However, this much is clear. Skilled labor, mechanics, artisans, etc., are getting an average hourly compensation of over 81 cents; trained and expert employees in banking, commercial, insurance, railroad, steamship, and other industrial concerns an average hourly compensation of over 80 cents; common and unskilled labor (of whom no mental effort is required) average an hourly compensation of 55 cents, while post-office clerks and letter carriers receive an average hourly compensation of but 48½ cents.

To give employees such as the clerks and carriers mentioned in the committee report the meager and temporary increase of $150 means they will receive an hourly compensation of a little less than 54 cents, or, in other words, 1 cent less per hour than is paid to the unskilled and common labor in the land.

Again, the man long in service whose excellent record has brought him to the present maximum of pay will under the plan proposed by the committee receive no more than an employee greatly junior in time of service and receiving minimum pay.

Surely the comparison of the figures is odious. It does no credit to our Government, which ought to be foremost in paying decent and sufficient wages to those in a service requiring fidelity, competency, intelligence, efficiency, and hard work.

Labor statistics show the almost universal custom in the varied industries and occupations of paying for all time in excess of eight hours daily at the rate of time plus one-half of the regular rate of pay and double time for all service on Sundays, holidays, and Saturday afternoons. This is not so in the Postal Service. Here again exists an inequality.

Even with the $150 increase proposed, the postal employee, such as regular clerk or carrier, would, in so far as compensation is concerned, be given less consideration by his Government than is given by private employers to the unskilled and common laborer. Such a condition is abhorrent to every sense of justice. It is violative of those rules of business which to promote efficiency and square dealing guide men in the administration of their business affairs.

Reference has been made to the increased cost of living. The larger number of men affected by the measure reside in the cities where cost of living is ever on the increase, and somehow keeps soaring higher. Rents there have become excessive. In many places in the large cities the rental price has to these men of small salaries become almost prohibitive. Despite legislative and administrative devices proposed the profiteer is still plying his game, and men of small means and meager earnings are unfortunately the surest victims. But without considering that condition at all, the fact remains that everywhere—whether in city, town, or village—cost of living has vastly increased. The percentage of increases in the commodities of life are staggering. Food over 85 per cent, clothing about 100 per cent and threatening to go higher, fuel, heat, and light about 57 per cent, and so on with all other necessities. In fact, a conservative estimate is that cost of living approximates over 87 per cent above that in prewar times. Yet the postal men's pay has not by any means kept pace.

For purposes of this minority report it is unnecessary to go into further or more extended details of the cost increases of the necessities of life. With the present pay, even plus the small increase the committee proposes, the problem of how the postal workers can provide for themselves and families according to the standard of an American wage earner's living, rear children, meet occasionally expense incident to sickness or other misfortune, and get even a small modicum of comfort out of life must, indeed, be vexed and difficult of solution.

There is another highly important problem involved in this matter of salaries. It gravely concerns the efficiency of the service. Never before were there so many resignations and withdrawals from the Postal Service as now, and this is due to inadequacy of pay. Time was when in New York and other large cities, from 1,000 to 1,500 and more were found on the list of applicants for clerks and carriers anxious for appointment. Now the number has fallen into insignificant figures.

The standard of civil-service examinations has been lowered so that a sufficient supply of persons can be obtained to enter the service. In New York and other cities men can do better with such qualifications as really fit them for clerks or carriers than enter a service that gives them an inadequate wage, and then leaves them nothing in sight for the day when sickness or infirmities of age may overtake them. Such a condition tends to lower the standard of efficiency which is absolutely necessary for the proper handling, transmission, and delivery of mail, in which the whole people, individually as well as collectively, are and ought to be concerned.

It has been urged in opposition to granting a substantial percentage increase—even a 25 per cent for regular employees and 75 cents per hour for substitutes—that it would take too great a sum from the Treasury. Such an answer by those who give it assumes a small conception of the views of the American people on this subject of pay to the mail men. They do not and will not begrudge giving a well-deserved increase.

The people generally recognize the fact that the postal employees are the poorest paid men in the Government service and desire to have this unfair condition remedied by a substantial increase. To fail to give the relief the men so sorely need at this time to supply their real needs is unbecoming a great Nation and merits condemnation. The pittance of $150 per annum proposed by the committee is in the light of living requirements a mere sop which can not serve to satisfy the just demands of the service.

The American people as a whole are not so narrow or ungracious as to deny to those who served them so well as the postal men a decent living wage sufficient to provide them with what the necessities of life in their situation at present requires.

It is respectfully submitted that the increase should be as provided in H. J. Res. 181.

HENRY M. GOLDFOGLE.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, in reply to a statement that the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] made in reply to a question asked by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW], I want to say this about the increase in the salaries to the postal employees as compared to other Government workers. The gentleman from Georgia, as indicated by his question, seemed to be under the impression that the other Government employees had received a $240 bonus and the postal employees had not received any increase at all. Those of us who recall the Post Office appropriation bill for 1919, which became operative July 1, 1918, recall that it increased all of the salaries of postal clerks, letter carriers, and railway mail clerks $200 a year, and that we suspended for that year what is known as the automatic promotion law in order to avoid making a $300 increase, which would have been out of proportion to the $120 increase that was given to the other Government employees for that year. This bill also increased the compensation of rural carriers, assistant postmasters, and other postal employees.

For the fiscal year 1920 other Government employees, outside of the Postal Service, were given $240, but this was not in addition to the $120 increase which was given the year before. It simply included the $120 and gave $120 more increase. The postal employees were still kept on at the $200 increase that we had given them the year before, and we restored the automatic promotion of $100. Therefore all of the postal clerks and letter carriers during this fiscal year will receive $100 in addition to $200, which they received last year, making a total increase of $300, and this $150 which I expect to vote for and help secure its passage will make the increase $450, which by a right smart exceeds the increase that has been given to most other employees of the Government. If there is any gentleman who cares to contradict that, I will yield to him. I am not complaining that it is too much. I think the postal employees, as a rule, have amply earned the increases which they have received, but let us be perfectly frank in a recital of the facts.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas if it is not a fact that the Nolan bill, when it becomes a law, will make a minimum of $1,320 for every employee of the Government outside of the Postal Service, while, with the increase of $150 for post-office employees which this bill carries, will there not be thousands of post-office employees getting but $1,150 a year? If this is so, and I believe is so, it will be an act of gross injustice to the post-office employees of this country, whose minimum salary ought to be as much as the Nolan bill carries, with a maximum of $2,000.

Mr. BLACK. No; they will get a minimum of $1,080, if the bill of the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] is agreed to, and I will state to the gentleman that I did all that I could to include in the Nolan bill the postal employees, and I am glad to say that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FITZGERALD] did all he could.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, on account of the brief time which was available for discussion on the bill now under consideration, I am going to take advantage of the leave which has been granted to extend remarks. I do not expect to undertake to exhaustively discuss the matter of postal salaries and their increase. We now have a commission, composed of Members of the House and Members of the Senate, who are giving this whole subject their earnest study and will give all the employees full opportunity to be heard, as well as officials of the Post Office Department.

The report of that commission will be made to Congress at the December session, and as one Member I expect to study the recommendations then submitted and support legislation which I hope will do justice to the employees, the Government, and the general public.

I think it will be conceded by all that no group of workers have been more loyal and efficient than the postal employees, and I am sure that it is the will of Congress to deal fairly with them in every respect.

All employees whose wages and compensation are fixed by the Government should bear in mind the difficulties under which the President and Congress are laboring at this time and that in the solution of these intricate problems we are bound, in good conscience, to consider the interests of the general public, as well as the particular class of employees to be affected.

Of course, if the President and Congress knew that the increased percentage in the cost of living which has taken place since 1913 was a permanent condition, then undoubtedly the proper thing to do would be to increase the salaries and wages of railroad and postal and other Government employees in approximately the same percentage as the rise in commodity prices. But it is certainly the consensus of opinion among thoughtful men that there will be a substantial decline in the prices of most commodities within the next 12 months, at least, and that therefore it would not be a proper procedure to undertake to raise salaries and wages to permanent levels which would equal in percentage the average rise in commodity prices.

Why do I say permanent levels? I say it because they would be permanent. No one knows better than Congress, no one knows better than the employees themselves that nothing would destroy the morale of the men quicker and more completely than to push the wages up to the levels now demanded and then undertake to lower them when things begin to reach a lower basis of value. Therefore we must take all of these elements into consideration when we are dealing with salary-increase legislation.

Just what other increases and readjustments in salaries the congressional commission will see fit to recommend we do not know. It will be up to us to consider that matter and dispose of it at the time it is reached.

For the present, I think $150 increase is as much as we should make, and I therefore propose to stand by the committee on this bill.

If subsequent events demonstrate that the present high figures of the cost of living will meet with no substantial lowering, then of course it goes without saying that the postal employees, as well as other wage earners, will have just cause to have their cases considered in the light of the new facts.

A CONSIDERABLE AMOUNT OF THE INCREASED COST OF LIVING HAS PROBABLY COME TO STAY.

While I believe that we will surely within the next 12 months see a substantial lowering of commodity prices, still I am also convinced that it will be a long time, if ever, before the cost of living goes back to prewar levels.

If Congress tried to bring about a situation of that kind by artificial processes it would wreck the finances of the country and throw thousands out of employment.

Therefore for the very reason that no one in responsible position expects the cost of living to go back to prewar levels it is recognized that the increases in wages which have already been given to postal employees, and including this $150 increase, will remain permanent.

DEFICIT IN POSTAL REVENUES FOR FISCAL YEAR 1920.

In a speech which I delivered in the House December 14, 1918, during general debate on the Post Office appropriation bill, I pointed out that in my opinion the deficit in the postal revenues would be for this fiscal year, which ends next July, 1920, about $25,000,000. I gave a statement of the figures on which I based my conclusion.

The present increase of $150 to each postal employee will amount in the aggregate to about $40,000,000, and therefore will increase the amount of the deficit, and I do not see how it can be kept much lower than $60,000,000. Of course the postal receipts may run considerably higher than I have estimated and therefore make considerable reduction in the amount of the deficit, but one thing is certain, there is bound to be a larger amount of expenditures in the Postal Service for this fiscal year than there will be receipts.

All talk of 1-cent postage is idle and should be abandoned. I think we will be fortunate if we are able to keep the rate of postage at 2 cents on first-class mail. I believe that the Post Office Department should pay its own way, and if present rates are not sufficient to do that and pay to postal employees fair and just wages, then we will simply have to raise them.

I feel very certain that there should be some readjustment of parcel-post rates and rates on second-class matter.

Notwithstanding the zone postage law on second-class matter, there is still a large annual loss to the Government in carrying and delivering this particular class of mail, and therefore all such inequalities and undercharges should be corrected and adjusted before there is any increase in the rates on first-class mail.

At the end of the present fiscal year we will be better able to deal with these questions than we are now, and therefore, for this year at least, whatever deficit there is will have to be met out of general taxation.

CONCLUSION.

Before I conclude this extension of remarks I want to say this one other thing: The productive output of the labor of postal employees during the trying months through which we have just passed has been worthy of all praise. Notwithstanding very large increases in the amount of mail handled, although there have been millions of pieces of Government mail connected with war activities, there has been only the normal increases in the number of postal employees. By this very token they have shown themselves entitled to receive the increases in salaries which have been given.

The whole record of the Postal Service during the war is a worthy tribute to the administrative ability of Postmaster General Burleson and his able assistants and the tireless energy of the entire postal force—postmasters, carriers, clerks, railway mail clerks, and all others who have so faithfully and efficiently labored.

Will the good work keep up? We have every reason to believe that it will.

Certainly there never was a time when there was greater need for every man to do his duty than now.

At a time when the whole world is in such dire need of increased production and when its wisest and most conscientious statesmen are bending every energy and effort to liquidate the difficult and complex problems of the war, every man needs to put forward his very best effort.

Patriotism, mutual consideration for one another's welfare, and enlightened self-interest all call out for a man to do his best.

An intelligent and willing cooperation on the part of every one will do greater good and accomplish more than anything that I can think of in this day when so much is being written and said about the relations of capital and labor.

Mr. J. H. Ferguson, of the Baltimore Federation of Labor, very well said in a recent statement:

> Changes in our economic and political systems will have only partial and feeble efficiency if they be not reinforced by the Christian view of work and wealth. No program of betterment will prove reasonably effective without a reform in the spirit of both capital and labor. The laborer must come to realize wherever he has not already done so that he owes his employer and society an honest day's work in return for a fair wage, and that conditions can not be substantially improved until he roots out all desire to get a maximum of return for a minimum service. The capitalist must likewise get a new viewpoint. He needs to learn that oft-forgotten truth that wealth is stewardship; that profit-making is not the basic justification of business enterprise; and that there are such things as fair profits, fair interest, and fair prices. Above and before all, he must cultivate and strengthen within his mind the truth which many of vision have already grasped, that the laborer is a human being, not merely an instrument of production, and that the laborer's right to a decent livelihood is the first moral charge upon industry.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I shall not yield for interruptions. This bill increases the compensation of every man in the Postal Service from the supervisory officials down to the commonest laborer by $150 for the current fiscal year. It costs $40,000,000 to do what is proposed in this bill. It will undoubtedly create a deficiency of $30,000,000 in the postal revenues for the current fiscal year. That the men ought to have more compensation I do not undertake to deny, but every one here knows that the postal commission charged by the last Congress with the study of what compensation shall be paid in the future to postal men is now at work, and that on next Monday it begins its hearings in New York and Boston, Chicago, St. Paul, Cincinnati, Kansas City, Atlanta, Memphis, and other points throughout the country. Every man in the Postal Service will have an opportunity to present his reasons for an increased compensation. That commission will thereby be enabled to report a bill with the knowledge that will insure intelligent conclusions, and this increase for the period ending June 30, 1920, may therefore be considered only a temporary expedient pending the conclusions of that commission.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I refuse to yield. No man will say that I am unfriendly to the men of the Postal Service. I have devoted my life to the amelioration of the conditions of those men, and I have stood, in season and out of season, for the betterment of those conditions, and I thoroughly believe that to-day there is not a man in the service, unwillingly perhaps, who will not be glad to accept this $150 temporary increase.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. May I suggest——

Mr. MADDEN. The President of the United States—I decline to yield—only recently said that beyond a certain limit he would not go, and for one Member of the Congress of the United States I refuse to get into a conflict with the President in these strenuous times. [Applause.] Every man, whether he is in the Postal Service or any other service, should be sufficiently patriotic to join hands with every other American to stabilize conditions in the country, to harmonize the equilibrium of the Nation. There never was a time when patriotism was more needed than it is to-day [applause], and I call upon you men here and you men over there and the men in the Postal Service to stand as Americans for America, stand as one man everywhere to stabilize conditions, to prevent disturbances, to call a halt, to help to reduce the high cost of living, and to act for America as Americans. And I come to you this afternoon as a friend of the postal men pleading with you to vote to give them this increase and to say to the postal men that they shall have ample opportunity to present their case to your commission, and when they are presenting their case to this commission they will be speaking to their friends, and while I promise nothing as to what the commission will do, or as a member of the commission what I shall do, I can simply say that we will be sane and safe, and we will be just to every interest, to the American people, and to the postal men who are a great section of the American citizenship. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. [Cries of "Vote!"] The gentleman from Minnesota has three minutes remaining.

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry that the resolution has been presented under parliamentary conditions which make it impossible for the House to express its judgment as to the exact amount of the proper increase. At the same time, I assume that every man who feels, as I think almost every man in this House must feel, that the postal employees are not adequately compensated will gladly vote for this resolution because it is the best thing we can get at the present time. I feel that the special investigating committee, for which the chairman of the committee, Mr. STEENERSON, spoke a few moments ago, has a very great responsibility upon it to conduct its investigations at the earliest possible moment and to report the results of those investigations to the House. Such action is essential to enable the House and the Congress to legislate wisely for the postal men at the earliest possible moment.

Of my own knowledge, I know of the struggle that our post-office clerks and carriers are undergoing and have for years undergone in an effort to make both ends meet; of my own knowledge I know of the loyalty and devotion with which they have gone on year after year, doing their duty faithfully and well, taking pride in the consciousness of service well performed and avoiding even the suggestion of a resort to force or intimidation to which their power and the analogy of other groups of workers might have led them to turn; of my own knowledge I know of the difficulty which the Government has recently been experiencing to induce men of the proper caliber to enter the Postal Service, applicants very naturally being discouraged because of the extremely low salary offered to them as compared with that offered to wage earners in other lines of industry; of my own knowledge I know the importance to the Nation of maintaining a strong, intelligent, and efficient personnel throughout our Postal Service and also of keeping that personnel contented and imbued with the conviction that the Government is the friend of the letter carrier and of the postal clerk. Because of these considerations I am anxious that a fair increase in salary be given by Congress. In my judgment the present increase is not adequate. But it is the only increase for which the House has the opportunity at this time to vote. Therefore I shall vote in favor of it, and I assume that every Member of the House will vote in favor of it. But I rise to express my earnest conviction that Congress will be recreant to its duty if it does not at the earliest possible moment take action looking to a scientific readjustment of the salaries of our postal employees.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, there is no class of employees in the Government service to-day, nor have there been for the past several years, who have been treated as badly as the postal employees, yet they are men of a very high intelligence and most efficient. They have been treated badly by the Postmaster General and the men under him. They have been treated badly in that they have been denied in many instances the rights of human beings, the right of men to speak and act of their own free will. German autocracy never equaled it. We have here an opportunity to do something for them. It is not at the recommendation of the Postmaster General, and I believe that if we would vote here to increase the pay of these employees in the amount that they should really have—$500, instead of $150—that the President would veto it upon the recommendation of his Cabinet officer, the Postmaster General. And so we are doing something to help a class of people who have been badly neglected and mistreated and whose pay is far below what it ought to be to give them a decent livelihood.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I rise for the purpose of asking whether——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota has the floor.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I beg pardon.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, this measure vitally affects the living conditions of thousands of Postal employees and their families. I had hoped that our Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads would see its way clear to report out a more compensatory measure, but in view of the fact that they have considered otherwise, and have reported out this bill, I shall vote for it and hope that there will not be a dissenting voice in this Chamber.

Mr. Speaker, for 30 years or more I have had many friends and acquaintances among the men of the Postal Service in the city of Minneapolis, and also many others in the Railway Postal Service. Many of these men I have known intimately; knowing them well, I know somewhat of their problems.

During the past 15 years there has been a steady advance in the cost of living. To meet this, as I recall, there has been no general advance in the salaries of these men, since about 1909 or 1910 until last year, when a general advance of $200 per year was authorized. This bill provides for $150 per year more—a total, if this bill becomes a law, of $350. This advance, of course, is not in keeping with the advance of the cost of living, but as the result, men—experienced, skilled men—are leaving the service right along.

Before engaging in the practice of law, I was employed by a wholesale saddlery house in Minneapolis. During that time several journeymen harness and collar makers in the employ of that concern took the civil-service examination and qualified for the Postal Service. They were first employed as substitutes. The officers of that company gladly cooperated with the men in their desire to better themselves and permitted them to remain and work at their trade at such times as they were not engaged as substitutes in the Postal Service and until they became regularly employed in that service.

Figuring the then wage of the harness and collar makers and the salary of the Postal employees, they were bettering themselves.

Are men leaving trades now to go into the Postal Service? No! But skilled Postal Service men are leaving the Government service to accept private employment. This is true the country over.

With what effect on the service? To ask the question is to answer it. The service, which is so important to the social and business life of our Nation, is not what it once was.

Consequently we find labor organizations and business interests the country over joining hands in requesting Congress to do its part in remedying the situation.

It is an emergency measure. I am pleased to hear from my good friend and colleague, the chairman of this committee, that the Reclassification Commission expects to report a thorough, scientific revision of this whole salary question at the beginning of the regular session in December.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the people of this country expect the Government of the United States to pay its employees an adequate wage, certainly not less than what these same men under similar working conditions could receive from private employment.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. LANGLEY. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this bill, as I have not been able to get time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on this bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Might I suggest to the gentleman that he wait until after the bill is disposed of?

Mr. LANGLEY. Why not now?

Mr. STEENERSON. I am going to ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen have the right to extend their remarks.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. For the purpose of asking the gentleman from Minnesota whether he will have objection to my asking unanimous consent, or to granting consent, to allow a vote upon the proposition to increase the salaries of postal employees to 25 per cent?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. MADDEN. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri demands the regular order. The question is on passing the joint resolution under suspension of the rules.

The question was taken, and two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the joint resolution as amended was passed.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen may have five days in which to extend their remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen may have five days in which to extend their remarks on the resolution just passed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. May I inquire whether or not the title of this resolution should be amended?

Mr. VAILE. Does the gentleman mean the resolution just passed?

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the title may be amended to correspond to the text.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the title may be amended to correspond to the text. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PURCHASE OF PUBLIC LANDS BY CITY OF BOULDER, COLO.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill H. R. 6410. This is on the Private Calendar, on the last page.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6410) authorizing the city of Boulder, Colo., to purchase certain public lands.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6410) authorizing the city of Boulder, Colo., to purchase certain public lands.

Be it enacted, etc., That the city of Boulder, in the county of Boulder, Colo., is hereby authorized, for a period of five years from and after the passage of this act, to purchase, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to convey to said city for use in connection with the lands heretofore purchased by said city under the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act to grant certain lands to the city of Boulder, Colo.," approved March 2, 1907 (34 Stats., p. 1223), for purposes of water storage and supply of its waterworks, the following described lands, to wit: The west half of section 27 and the north half of the northwest quarter of section 34, township 1 north, range 73 west, sixth principal meridian, containing 400 acres within the Colorado National Forest, or any part of said lands.

SEC. 2. That the said conveyance shall be made upon the payment by said city for the lands purchased at the rate of $1.25 per acre: Provided, That the conveyance hereby authorized shall not include any lands which at the date of the issuance of patent shall be covered by a valid existing bona fide right or claim initiated under the laws of the United States: Provided further, That there shall be reserved to the United States all oil, coal, and other mineral deposits that may be found in the lands so granted and all necessary use of the lands for extracting the same: And provided further, That said city shall have the right to sell or convey the land herein granted, or any part thereof, or to devote the same to any other purpose than as hereinbefore described; and if the said land shall not be used for such municipal purpose, the same, or such parts thereof not so used, shall revert to the United States; the conditions and reservations herein provided for shall be expressed in the patent.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Speaker, there is a committee amendment.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, the committee amendment is in line 17, page 2, after the word "shall" insert the word "not"—a mere clerical error.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. VAILE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SALE OF ALLOTMENTS IN QUAPAW AGENCY, OKLA.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill H. R. 7751.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of H. R. 7751, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7751) authorizing the sale of inherited and unpartitioned allotments for town-site purposes in the Quapaw Agency, Okla.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Was it not agreed that the Unanimous Consent Calendar was to be called?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that it is the purpose of the Chair to revert to the Unanimous Consent Calendar. There were two or three bills called to the attention of the Chair which the gentleman in charge said were of immediate importance, and therefore the Chair took the liberty of recognizing the gentleman to call up the bills.

Mr. STEENERSON. The call will be resumed?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, in what position is the bill of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD]?

The SPEAKER. It comes fourth from the end of the calendar. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, we did not hear the bill reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title once more. The Chair ought to add, in connection with this decision, that he was influenced by the fact, as he understood it, that the bills were such that there would be no objection to them. Of course, he is liable to be mistaken in that. The Clerk will again report the bill by title.

The title was again read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7751) authorizing the sale of inherited and unpartitioned allotments for town-site purposes in the Quapaw Agency, Okla.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, upon the application heretofore or hereafter made, of one or more of the owners of any inherited and unpartitioned allotment in the Quapaw Agency, Okla., to sell said allotted lands, in whole or in part, for town-site purposes, under such rules and regulations as he my prescribe, concerning terms of sale and disposal of the proceeds for the benefit of the respective Indians: Provided, That any duly authorized representative of the Interior Department may execute any deed or other instrument necessary to the completion of such sale in the name and on behalf of any of the owners of said land if such owner or his legal representative shall fail or refuse to execute such deed or other instrument for a period of 30 days after being given notice in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe that such deed or other instrument is ready for execution.

In conducting such sale the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, prescribe such conditions and requirements as may be necessary for the protection of any person or persons he may find to have legal or equitable interests in any of said lands or the improvements thereon, making due allowance, in his discretion, for the value of such improvements, but no preference right to purchase any lot or tract shall be accorded any person for a period exceeding 90 days.

There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, to cover the expense of conducting such sale, such sum to be reimbursed to the Treasury out of the proceeds of the sale and to be apportioned among the distributees of the fund derived from the sale.

Also the following committee amendments were read:

Line 5, page 1, strike out the words "one or more" and insert in lieu thereof the words "a majority in interest."

Line 7, page 1, after the word "sell," insert the words "the surface of."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS TUG RIVER, KY.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate bill 2700, Calendar No. 59. There is a unanimous report on it from the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and there is no objection to the passage of the bill. It is very important to the Hewit Lumber Co. that it become a law as quickly as possible, as they have been ready for some time to begin the work, and are waiting now to get word of the passage of the bill. They have the labor and materials all ready, and I hope that none of my colleagues will object to this request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for the immediate passage of Senate bill 2700.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. When will we return to the Calendar for Unanimous Consent?

The SPEAKER. The only reason why we took this up was because it was stated it is now so late that it was feared that unless immediate action were had they would not be able to reach it in time. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the bill was not reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2700) granting the consent of Congress to the D. E. Hewit Lumber Co. to construct and maintain a bridge across Tug River, connecting Martin County, Ky., and Wingo County, W. Va.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. BEE. Is this a private corporation that is building this bridge?

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Is there any public control of it, or protection to the public with reference to fees or anything connected with it?

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes; the War Department has considered the matter and approved the proposition, and the language of the bill itself provides that it is to be subject to the existing general laws governing such matters. It is all right, I can assure my friend from Texas [Mr. BEE].

Mr. BEE. It does not appear in the bill. I did not know that the public was protected.

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes; it is. It is in the usual form of bridge bills.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the D. E. Hewit Lumber Co., and its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Tug River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, one end of said bridge being in Martin County, Ky., and the other end of the said bridge being on the opposite side of the Tug River, at Kermit, in Mingo County, in the State of West Virginia, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LANGLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

SUPPLY OF RAILROAD TIE TIMBER.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a unanimous consent request with reference to having a resolution restored that was stricken from the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his request.

Mr. DYER. It is House resolution 186, requesting the Interstate Commerce Commission to make certain investigations regarding the present and future supply of tie timber. It was called up, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] objected to it. I have talked with him, and he has no objection, and I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be continued upon the calendar without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that House resolution 186 be restored to the calendar.

Mr. GARD. Under the rule, I believe it goes to the foot of the calendar.

Mr. DYER. If it is passed over without prejudice, it would not.

The SPEAKER. If it is desired, the Chair will state that request.

Mr. GARD. I think that is the general rule.

Mr. DYER. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution I have named be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE RAGSDALE, OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing some resolutions sent to me on the death of the late Representative RAGSDALE, of South Carolina.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD some resolutions concerning the death of the late Representative RAGSDALE, of South Carolina. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the resolutions referred to:

ST. LOUIS, MO., July 29, 1919.

Hon. WILLIAM L. IGOE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: On the motion of Dr. Emmett Kane, I was instructed to forward you inclosed resolution of sympathy with the request that you have it printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Thanking you for your attention in this matter, I am

Yours, very truly,
C. J. DOLAN,
Chairman of Resolutions Committee.

Whereas the Friends of Irish Freedom of St. Louis have learned with profound sorrow of the untimely demise of Congressman J. W. RAGSDALE, of South Carolina; and

Whereas they are mindful of his sincere sympathy for the cause of Irish freedom, which he manifested in so unmistakable a manner during the hearings on the Irish question before the Foreign Relations Committee of the House; and

Whereas he was at all times a staunch champion of the right of free government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Friends of Irish Freedom of St. Louis tender to the colleagues of the deceased Congressman their sincere sympathy; and be it further Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to Congressman HENRY D. FLOOD, of Virginia.

FORWARDING MAIL MATTER OF CERTAIN CLASSES.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6951) authorizing the return to the sender or the forwarding of undeliverable second, third, and fourth class mail matter.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter, under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe, fourth-class matter of obvious value which is of a perishable nature may be forwarded to the addressee at another post office charged with the amount of the forwarding postage, and when such matter of a perishable nature is undeliverable to the addressee it may be returned to the sender charged with the return postage: Provided, That other undeliverable matter of the second, third, and fourth classes may be forwarded to the addressee or to such other person as the sender may direct, at another post office, charged with the amount of the forwarding postage, or it may be returned to the sender charged with the return postage, when it bears the sender's pledge that the postage for forwarding and return will be paid, such postage to be collected on delivery: Provided further, That when the sender refuses to furnish such postage in accordance with his pledge, the acceptance from him of further matter bearing such pledge may be refused.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Consent has not been given to its consideration.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, if the bill is going to be worth anything, it occurs to me that we should substitute the word "shall" for the word "may," because the word "may" leaves it entirely in the discretion of the various postmasters throughout the country as to whether or not they shall comply with the provision in the bill. It occurs to me that if the bill is going to mean anything, as a piece of constructive legislation, we should compel the postmasters to do this. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee whether or not he would object to such an amendment to substitute the word "shall" for the word "may" where it occurs in the bill?

Mr. STEENERSON. I would like to confer with the gentleman about that. It is a matter of discretion in the hands of the department. Here, for example, may be a box of berries. It is discretionary whether or not you shall return them.

Mr. BLANTON. I can not agree with the distinguished gentleman, because it is left to the discretion of every Tom, Dick, and Harry scattered over the various post offices of the country.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is mistaken in having said unanimous consent had not been given. He is now informed that it was given.

Mr. BLANTON. I watched the Chair all the time, and I watched for the Chair to put the question.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk has read the complete bill. Does the gentleman from Texas offer an amendment?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I offer an amendment.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. I offer the following amendment, that wherever the word "may" appears in the bill the word "shall" shall be substituted therefor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Strike out the word "may" wherever it occurs in the bill and insert in lieu thereof the word "shall."

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will not adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. I am not very much enamored altogether with this bill. Let me say to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] that I speak from experience, because I spent four years of my life as a mailing clerk in the post office of a large city. I have no objection to that portion of the bill with reference to perishable matter, but I submit to the House that the postmaster ought to have discretion as to whether the perishable matter is worth forwarding or returning, because in many instances when it reaches the post office of its destination it is in a state of decay, and to compel the postmaster to send it forward or backward, except in those cases where he can exercise his discretion, after an examination, would be a foolish thing. It will not do to say that the postmaster is going to destroy property wantonly which belongs to somebody else. That is not the history of postmasters in this country. The history of postmasters is that they are faithful in the discharge of their duty, regardless of what administration they serve under; and to say that they are going to deliberately destroy perishable property in proper condition is a wrong construction. If the chairman of the committee accepts the amendment of my colleague from Texas to make it "shall" instead of "may," he will compel the postmaster to send back a chicken that is dead or eggs that are already rotten.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEE. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. "The gentleman from Minnesota" has not agreed to accept anything. He said to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] that he might offer his amendment and let it be submitted to the House.

Mr. BEE. All right.

Mr. STEENERSON. I agree with the gentleman. This provision is the result of mature consideration. It represents the experience of the department for many years and has been recommended in two annual reports.

Mr. BEE. Turning to the proviso, that undeliverable matter of the second, third, and fourth classes may be forwarded to the addressee, or to such other person as the sender may direct, at another post office, let me say to the House that every man who has worked in a post office knows that there are certain corporations which send out stacks and stacks of fourth-class matter which pile up in post offices until the postal employees are unable to get rid of them. Newspapers are sent all over the land, and under this provision, as I understand it—if I am mistaken, the chairman of the committee will so inform me—the Post Office Department would be compelled to forward this fourth-class matter back and forth, when it is absolutely valueless to anybody.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman is mistaken. This bill does not require it. It simply grants authority and leaves it discretionary with the postmaster.

Mr. BEE. But the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] would take away that discretion and make it compulsory.

Mr. STEENERSON. We have not agreed to that amendment.

Mr. BEE. I am talking about the provision that fourth-class matter shall be forwarded to the addressee.

Mr. STEENERSON. It may be forwarded.

Mr. BEE. But the trouble is that whenever you put upon already overburdened and overworked postal employees the responsibility or the discretion of having to forward and reforward this third and fourth class matter, which is absolutely valueless and in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred ought never to have been sent through the mails, you are simply burdening the Postal Service with a lot of work with which it ought not to be burdened.

Mr. STEENERSON. They do not do it unless the package bears the pledge on the face of it that the postage will be paid.

Mr. BEE. You can sign a pledge, and I can sign a pledge, and any man can sign a pledge to pay the postage on matter which is sent, but then how are you going to get your postage thereafter?

Mr. STEENERSON. If the postage is not paid, there will be only one package reforwarded.

Mr. BEE. Yes; but the damage may be done. I do not object to the bill, but I do insist that the amendment of my friend from Texas ought not to be adopted, and that the Post Office Department ought not to be compelled to send matter wherever some man wants it, when it is already in no condition to be sent anywhere, or is worthless if it is sent.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my amendment and offer it as follows.

Mr. RAKER. Have all the amendments been withdrawn that the gentleman from Texas offered?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Very well.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BLANTON: Page 1, line 5, strike out the word "may" and insert the word "shall"; line 8, strike out the word "may" and insert the word "shall"; line 11, strike out the word "may" and insert the word "shall"; page 2, line 2, strike out the word "may" and insert the word "shall."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I fully realize that when a committee brings a piece of legislation before this House for consideration we are expected to vote for it blindly, and that any amendment, however meritorious, that may be offered by me will meet with overwhelming defeat. Such a situation will not prevent me from doing my duty, for in an effort to make this measure mean something worth while I have offered the foregoing amendment, against which no Member can find any tenable reason to oppose, yet I fully realize that it will be defeated.

What is the purpose of this bill? It provides that fourth-class perishable mail of obvious value may be forwarded where the addressee has moved, forwarding charges to be collected, and if then undeliverable may be returned to sender, charges collect; and further provides that when on the matter the sender requests and pledges the payment of return postage, other second, third, and fourth class matter may be forwarded or returned to sender.

You will note that the word "may" is used throughout the bill, making it discretionary entirely with the various postmasters over the land whether or not they will comply with the sender's directions.

My amendment merely substitutes the word "shall" for the word "may," making it mandatory upon each postmaster to comply with the forwarding or returning directions of the sender. Now, what reasonable excuse can any Member offer for voting against my amendment. This bill is designed to benefit a Member's constituency, and not the committee. When your constituents ask you why you did not support this amendment, in order to make this law of benefit to them, do you suppose that they will accept your excuse "that the committee did not think of it when framing the bill, and you could not go against the committee," or will they tell you "To hell with the committee," it was a proper, beneficial law they wanted?

My colleague from Texas [Mr. BEE] intimates that we may safely rely upon the judgment, discretion, and action of all the postmasters in the thousands of offices over the country. Postmasters are just like any other class of individuals—all different and no two alike. They are all humans. In creating us the good Lord has wisely seen fit to give each one of us characteristics distinctly peculiar to each separate individual, so that a wife knows her husband from every other person on the globe, hence it is not strange that postmasters differ.

The gentleman from San Antonio, who had four years' experience in a city post office, seems to think because some offices become congested with third and fourth class mail that it is absolutely worthless both to the sender and the person for whom it was intended. Let me give my colleague a concrete illustration: There is in my district a health resort to which people flock from the four corners of the United States seeking restoration from the splendid health-giving waters abundantly flowing from the ground. I refer to the city of Mineral Wells, Tex., where over 100,000 tourists visit each year. Our citizens from every portion of Texas go there regularly when in need of this valuable water. Complaint after complaint has come to me that it is impossible to receive even first-class mail with any regularity or dependability at this office, and Texas people who depend upon their leading daily newspapers, such as the Dallas News, the Houston Post, the San Antonio Express, and the Fort Worth Star-Telegram, for reading matter have considered themselves lucky if they could get the post office at Mineral Wells to deliver their daily paper to them two days out of the seven, and they could never ascertain what became of their papers on the other days. Much valuable mail has miscarried there, and parties have never been able to find it. Only the other day Mr. Ed A. Doggett, who runs the Ideal Café in Mineral Wells, advised me that on May 10, 1919, he turned over to this post office $35 in war saving stamps to be cashed as he was in need of money, being told that it would be necessary to send the stamps to Washington to be cashed, and that he has never yet been able to get the postmaster at Mineral Wells to pay him his money or to return his stamps, and that he is insulted by the postmaster for making inquiry. When we have such service as this in an office as big as that in the splendid city of Mineral Wells, Tex., does my colleague from San Antonio still insist that we may depend upon the discretion of all postmasters?

Mr. BEE. I want to ask the gentleman in reference to the postmaster at Mineral Wells—and I know nothing about him—but if these complaints are true, why is he not removed and somebody put there who will properly discharge the duties?

Mr. BLANTON. I have lodged these complaints with the department from time to time. Only recently I was forced to advise Mr. John W. Johnston, chief clerk in the First Assistant Postmaster General's office, that I had received more complaints against the post office at Mineral Wells, Tex., than from all the other offices in my district put together. Only day before yesterday I sent to the First Assistant Posmaster General the complaint of Mr. Doggett. But if my colleague had been here very long he would know that under the civil-service rules it is almost impossible to have a postmaster, however incompetent, removed. I filed with the department numerous affidavits from citizens in Abilene, Tex., against the postmaster there and asked for an investigation of their charges. The department sent an inspector, who did not see half of the parties making the affidavits, yet reported their complaints unfounded. So I do not waste time in asking for an investigation. Most people in a community had rather put up with indifferent service than to incur the enmity of a postmaster by testifying against him. I am glad, indeed, that the great majority of our postmasters are earnest, energetic, conscientious public servants, anxious and diligent in their efforts to properly serve their patrons.

Illustrating how this Congress is bound hand and foot by the action of a committee, I call attention to the last bill just passed by this House allowing only $150 increase to second and third class postmasters and postal employees and only 10 per cent increase to fourth-class postmasters. At least three-fourths of the Members of this House are strongly in favor of granting a greater increase and would vote to do so if given an opportunity, yet the committee, by its action this evening, cuts off all amendments and all discussion and forces a measure acknowledged to be imperfect, which three-fourths of the Members would like to change, yet are forced to accept without change and to vote for it without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t." Why are not we in a position to do what we want to do and to vote for the things that appeal to our judgment without having a committee ram things down our throats?

If this amendment of mine were left to the constituents of my colleagues, there would hardly be a vote against it. Yet when the roll is called besides my own there will hardly be a vote for it. Then why am I willing to raise a point that will show me voting in such a hopeless minority? Merely, if possible, to establish a precedent—that a Member in Congress can propose and vote for things that appeal to common sense and good judgment even if the committee did not think of it first.

I am ashamed of the measly consideration shown postal employees and second, third, and fourth class postmasters. Ever since I have been in Congress I have worked to more adequately pay them. Resignation after resignation has been made in my district. We can not put this matter of doing them justice off much longer if we keep them in the service.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, I never have asked the Postmaster General for a favor since I have been in office, and I do not propose to start now.

Mr. BEE. I want to ask the gentleman in reference to the postmaster at Mineral Wells—and I know nothing about him—but if these complaints are true why is he not removed and somebody put there who will properly discharge his duties?

Mr. BLANTON. I have been trying to do so, but have not got action. If the gentleman will go down and see his relative, it might be that I might get some action. Unfortunately a Member of Congress can not remove a postmaster, because if I could, when I found out that a postmaster was disregarding his duties and the business of his country, I would remove him so quick it would make his head swim.

Mr. BEE. The gentleman has complimented me very highly by referring to my relationship to the Postmaster General, of which I am very proud.

Mr. BLANTON. I have a high regard for the Postmaster General. I have defended him on the floor of the House, and I have done so this afternoon.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, so far as the proposition of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is concerned, I would say that if the experience of the Postmaster General makes it necessary to tell any particular postmaster that he should do a certain thing, he would be authorized to do that under the general authority of the bill—

That hereafter, under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe—

And so forth.

If it is found necessary from experience to do this, the Postmaster General will do it, and if he finds that there are other postmasters like the one the gentleman from Texas complains of I think the remedy will be in making the regulations more binding.

This bill should be considered with reference to the conditions that now exist. It is not necessary to discuss the first clause of this bill. It is obvious that where there is a piece of parcel post that is perishable it ought to be discretionary with the postal officials as to whether or not it should be forwarded, but as to the other second, third, and fourth class matter, as it is now, the procedure is this: If the addressee is not there, has gone away to another residence, then he is notified that there is a book there or a parcel, and he is required to send a letter with the postage to pay to forward it. I live in Crookston, Minn., and several times have received notices of that kind. I received one yesterday and it is now on my desk, and I have to send the postage to get that book or parcel, whatever it may be, forwarded to me here.

If this measure was a law, and the sender of that parcel or that book had printed on it the pledge that he would pay the forwarding or return postage in case I could not be found, the Post Office Department would not be required to do all of that work. In his report on the bill the Postmaster General says:

It is therefore believed that provision should be made for the prompt forwarding or return of undeliverable perishable matter, and also for the return of other undeliverable fourth-class matter, and that of the second and third classes bearing the pledge of the sender to pay the return postage, the collection of such postage to be made upon delivery of the matter. This would expedite the handling and disposition of such matter in the mails and would relieve the Postal Service of the labor and expense of sending notices that the matter is held and will be returned on receipt of the postage.

That involves a great deal of clerical work, and, as he says, the post office would be relieved from that, and, instead of having the expense of doing that work, they would receive the postage that it would require to forward the mail. It seems to me this is a matter of the administration of postal affairs of which the department is best informed. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads gave careful consideration to this matter. They were unanimous in their report on the bill, and the Postmaster General strongly recommends it.

I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and Mr. BLANTON demanded a division.

During the division.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 5, nays 246, answered "present" 1, not voting 178, as follows:

SENATE.

FRIDAY, September 5, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come to commit our way into Thy hands. We trust we have no purpose or ambition in our national right but to transcribe in the books of our human law the thought of God and the purpose of God in us as a Nation. We desire to glorify Thy name and to extend the interests of Thy kingdom of truth in the world. Help us ever to keep in sight a purpose to do the will of God, and help us to see the way clear before us in which God is leading us—the way of truth and righteousness and peace. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary may read from the Washington Post of this morning the matter therein set forth in relation to the attitude of the Irish people in Washington toward the covenant of the league of nations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

LEAGUE IS OPPOSED BY CAPITAL IRISH—FRIENDS OF FREEDOM TAKE ISSUE WITH SENATOR HITCHCOCK.

SEPTEMBER 4.

EDITOR THE POST: The undersigned, executive committee of the Patrick H. Pearse Branch of the Friends of Irish Freedom, Washington, D. C., have noticed in the issue of your paper of September 4, 1919, in the article by Mr. Fox, that Senator HITCHCOCK is quoted as saying that "only Irishmen of the radical agitator type were against the treaty and the covenant."

In this expression of opinion the Senator's wish is father to the thought. We assert that the Senator is absolutely wrong. Our organization comprises many hundreds of thousands of men and women in this country. Nearly every branch has gone on record as opposed to the league of nations. In this city two of the largest demonstrations ever held for any cause have been staged, the first on March 17 and the second on June 14, at Liberty Hut.

At both meetings resolutions opposing the league of nations were unanimously adopted. At the first meeting the auditorium was crowded to suffocation and thousands were turned away. It is no exaggeration to state that not less than 15,000 people came to the hut that night.

At the second meeting the entire seating capacity of the hut, about 4,000, was taken up, although the night was insufferably hot and disagreeable. It was well advertised that opposition to the league of nations would be a feature of both demonstrations.

To the Irish victory fund, raised by the Friends of Irish Freedom, we can prove that 90 per cent of the men and women of Irish blood in the District contributed. It must be remembered that burdens are to be borne and sacrifices made by those who take the active and leading part in such movements. This does not mean that those who are not heard of by the public are not in sympathy.

In this city, excepting those who hold public office under this administration, we can demonstrate that more than 75 per cent of the men and women of Irish blood are opposed to the league, if a plebiscite could be taken.

The names and affiliations of those who appeared at the hearing before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations on August 30 should be sufficient to refute Mr. HITCHCOCK's guess.

Among those who took the most prominent part in that hearing were the Hon. William Bourke Cockran, the Hon. Frank P. Walsh, and the Hon. Edward F. Dunne. None of these men has ever affiliated with any Irish organizations.

Delegates from every section of the United States were present, as will appear by an examination of the record, which can be obtained by application to the Foreign Relations Committee.

Respectfully,

ROSSA F. DOWNING,
P. J. MORAN,
P. J. RYAN,
J. FRANK O'MEARA,
JOSEPH A. DALY,
Executive Committee, Patrick H. Pearse Branch, Friends of Irish Freedom.

THE COAL-CAR SITUATION.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I present a letter with some correspondence from the Davenport (Iowa) Commercial Club and the traffic commissioner regarding the coal-car situation in that part of the country, the inability to obtain cars or to distribute coal sufficiently to meet the wants of the coming winter, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DAVENPORT, IOWA, August 30, 1919.

Hon. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am attaching hereto a copy of letter I have written to Director General Hines regarding the coal-car situation on behalf of the consumers and coal dealers in the Tri-Cities.

We urge upon you the necessity of doing everything within your power whenever the opportunity presents itself to help in our behalf and the behalf of all consumers of fuel served by Illinois mines.

We are doing everything within our power to avert a coal famine this winter, and conditions are rapidly growing worse.

We trust that you will find some method to bring the matter to the attention of the administration.

Very truly, yours,

GEO. M. CUMMINS, Traffic Commissioner.

AUGUST 28, 1919.

Hon. WALKER D. HINES,
Director General of Railroads,
United States Railroad Administration,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It is with regret that we feel it necessary to address you in regard to the subject of coal equipment. We understand that the eastern cars have all been ordered back without similar action to protect western roads.

We want to call your attention to the fact that the situation is becoming more dangerous, and address you in behalf of the consumers and coal dealers of this territory, upon whose shoulders falls the burden of supplying this winter's fuel.

We are making every effort to store coal to relieve railroad difficulties in case of bad weather and to take care of household supplies as early as possible, but inquiry develops that our dealers have bookings now four months in advance. We have not been able to get the cars as fast as we can take care of the orders, and we urge upon you the necessity of protecting our interests, at least to the extent of getting western cars on western roads, if similar action is taken in regard to eastern ones. We can assure you that everything will be done on our part in the matter of prompt handling, unloading, and quick release of cars. May we hear from you regarding the situation?

Very truly, yours,

GEO. M. CUMMINS, Traffic Commissioner.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS AT COLUMBUS, OHIO.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I also present on my own account, by way of memorial, an extract from the President's speech yesterday at Columbus, Ohio, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD without reading, with the comment that I make on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that under the rule of the Senate comments can not be printed in the RECORD without being read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has a right to do that.

Mr. SHERMAN (reading)—

At Columbus, Ohio, September 4, 1919, President Wilson used the following language in an address:

The only people I owe any report to are you and the other citizens of the United States, and it has become increasingly necessary, apparently, that I should report to you. * * * This treaty contains, among other things, a Magna Charta of labor, a thing unheard of until this interesting year of grace. There is a whole section of the treaty devoted to arrangement by which the interests of those who labor with their hands all over the world, whether they be men, women, or children, are all of them to be safeguarded. And next month there is to meet the first assembly under this section of the league, and let me tell you it will meet whether the treaty is ratified by that time or not.

The Columbus Citizen, a daily paper, reports that the President at that point in this statement "added grimly, thrusting out his jaw," which does not appear in the address, but the reporter notes it. With that the quotation ends and I proceed with my comment upon it.

The people of the United States as recently as November, 1918, expressed their voice through the established channels of constitutional government. The ballot box furnishes adequate voice for the people. A Congress the President does not control is to him a useless formality of government. He proposes not only to ignore but to destroy any governmental agency that does not become an Executive appendage.

Certain foreign powers have ratified or approved the treaty with Germany, so that the same is now binding upon the several governments. Some of such governments require no act save that of the king, monarch, or other executive authority. The treaty-making power of the United States Government is not entirely vested in the President. It is a joint exercise of that power by both the Senate and the Executive. No negotiated treaty is binding upon the American people or their Government until the treaty has been approved or ratified by both such joint powers. Next month, we are notified, the President proposes to assemble in this country the representatives of various countries under the labor articles of a treaty unratified by our country. It is his declared purpose to convene on American soil a meeting of alien governments with our own regardless of whether the treaty has become the law of this Republic or not. Limiting the laborers of this country to the narrow definition of the President even, there is no land in which the rights of labor are so liberal and cared for as our own. This paragraph of the President's address is 100 per cent demagogical. It is an appeal to the lawless, a covert invitation to the ever-present dissatisfied, restless element to demand what they will. The President has already played with firebrands sufficiently to have informed him of the danger. He has yoked himself up with revolutionaries so frequently as to know he can not check their mad race to the goal of lawlessness. His open declaration that he proposes to convene on American soil radicals as well as others from foreign countries under the labor articles of the treaty unratified, either by the American people or their Government, is a proclamation of lawlessness and contemptuous disregard of the United States Government. Again we have one who declares "I am the State." Have the American people quit electing Presidents and begun to elect kings? Public officials have been impeached for less flagrant violation of the laws of their country than this.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2700) granting the consent of Congress to the D. E. Hewit Lumber Co. to construct and maintain a bridge across Tug River, connecting Martin County, Ky., and Mingo County, W. Va.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2622) to provide necessary personnel of the Army until June 30, 1920.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 446. An act authorizing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to transfer fractional block 6 of Naylor's addition, Forest Grove, Oreg., to the United States of America, for the use of the Bureau of Entomology, Department of Agriculture;

H. R. 1429. An act adding certain lands to the Idaho National Forest and the Payette National Forest, in the State of Idaho;

H. R. 1430. An act to authorize the addition of certain lands to the Weiser National Forest, Idaho;

H. R. 2950. An act to authorize a preference right of entry by certain Carey Act entrymen, and for other purposes;

H. R. 6410. An act authorizing the city of Boulder, Colo., to purchase certain public lands;

H. R. 7751. An act authorizing the sale of inherited and unpartitioned allotments for town-site purposes in the Quapaw Agency, Okla.; and

H. J. Res. 151. Joint resolution to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service and making an appropriation therefor.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of the Maine Undertakers' Association, praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of Aerie No. 521, Fraternal Order of Eagles, of Chanute, Kans., and a petition of Trago Lodge No. 191, Anti-Horse Thief Association, of Chanute, Kans., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of Victor Post No. 293, Grand Army of the Republic, of Fort Dodge, Kans., praying for an increase in the pensions of veterans of the Civil War to $50 per month and $30 per month for widows of deceased veterans of the Civil War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McLEAN presented a resolution adopted by the Board of Aldermen, of Shelton, Conn., favoring the granting of a hearing by the American peace commission at Paris to the delegates chosen by the people of Ireland, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of sundry postal clerks of Bridgeport, New Haven, and New Britain, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of sundry Lithuanian citizens of Hartford, Thompsonville, and Waterbury, all in the State of Connecticut, praying that the United States intercede in having Poland withdraw her army from Lithuania and praying for recognition by the United States of the independence of Lithuania, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of the Eastern Division of the American Wire Weavers' Protective Association, remonstrating against the free importation of foreign-made Fourdrinier wire cloth, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts presented memorials of the Lewis Mears Co., of Boston; of the Package Machinery Co., of Springfield; of the McKee Stores Co., of Cambridge; of Brockelman Bros., of Fitchburg; of the Van Tassel Tanning Co., of Stoneham; of Walworth Bros. (Inc.), of Lawrence; of the Riverside Boiler Works (Inc.), of Cambridge; of the Brown-Wales Co., the Algonquin Leather Co., the Henry Tuttle Co., the Bemis Bros. Bag Co., and the Goldsmith-Wall-Stockwell Co., of Boston; and of 15 citizens of Lynn, Milford, Hopedale, and Holliston, all in the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing Federal control of the meat-packing industry, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2778) to amend section 11 of an act approved March 1, 1919, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Printing, which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 2780) authorizing a military merit badge and additional pay based thereon (Rept. No. 171);

A bill (S. 2809) relating to compensation and war-risk insurance for members of the Philippine Scouts under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended (Rept. No. 172); and

A bill (S. 2923) to provide funds for the care and maintenance of the graves on foreign soil of members of the military forces of the United States (Rept. No. 173).

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2807) to correct the military record of Edward Sigerfoos, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 170) thereon.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON BUDGET SYSTEM.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 174, submitted by himself on the 27th ultimo, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the special committee of the Senate appointed to devise a plan for a budget system is hereby authorized to send for persons, books, and papers; to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer; the compensation and the expenses of the committee to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate. The committee is authorized to sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. OVERMAN:

A bill (S. 2946) granting an increase of pension to William R. Faulkner; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HENDERSON:

A bill (S. 2947) to authorize the Secretary of War to transfer free of charge to the Department of Agriculture and to the Post Office Department certain motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. NORRIS:

A bill (S. 2948) granting an increase of pension to Milton I. Woodard; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 2949) granting an increase of pension to M. Cecelia Allen; to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 2950) for the relief of Herman O. Kruschke; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HALE:

A bill (S. 2951) granting an increase of pension to Paul Strause (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2952) granting a pension to Jeanette A. Harrington; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 2953) granting relief to persons who served in the Military Telegraph Corps of the Army during the Civil War; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. COLT:

A bill (S. 2954) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Albert F. Smith, deceased; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2955) granting an increase of pension to James W. McKay; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SPENCER:

A bill (S. 2956) to amend sections 4874 and 4875 of the Revised Statutes and to provide a compensation for superintendents of national cemeteries; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GORE:

A bill (S. 2957) to amend and modify the war-risk insurance act; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 101) providing for survey of Lake Washington Canal, State of Washington; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. NELSON:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 102) to equalize the pay and allowances of commissioned officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Coast Guard with those of the Navy; to the Committee on Commerce.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY (S. DOC. NO. 85).

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask that the treaty of peace with Germany be printed as a Senate document, without maps, and showing the amendments recommended by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and that 1,000 extra copies may be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LODGE. Also, Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the President of the United States transmitting a memorandum defining the relations between the allied military authorities and the Interallied Rhineland High Commission. It really goes with the protocol that was sent in by the President the other day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, September 3, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: After sending to the Senate the other day a copy of the Rhineland agreement, it occurred to me that it might be serviceable to your committee to have the inclosed memorandum, which was agreed to on the same day that the Rhineland agreement itself was finally formulated.

WOODROW WILSON.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Relations,
United States Senate.

(Inclosure.)

MEMORANDUM DEFINING THE RELATIONS BETWEEN THE ALLIED MILITARY AUTHORITIES AND THE INTERALLIED RHINELAND HIGH COMMISSION.

[Approved by the Council of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers on June 13, 1919.]

"1. Each high commissioner is directly responsible to his Government, economic questions being first referred by the high commission to the supreme economic council as long as that body exists.

"2. The ordinances of the high commission are to be communicated to the commanders of armies by, or on behalf of, the allied high command.

"3. Whenever the high commission has occasion to publish ordinances affecting the interests of the occupying armies, in respect of which the initiative does not come from the military authorities, the high commission shall consult the military authorities beforehand.

"4. Communications between the high commission and the various military authorities will always take place through the channel of the allied high command.

"5. All civil commissions or officials already appointed or to be appointed by any one or more of the allied and associated powers who deal with matters affecting the civil administration or the economic life of the civilian population in the occupied territory shall, if they are retained, be placed under the authority of the high commission.

"6. (a) The appointment of each high commissioner shall be subject to the approval of all the allied and associated governments represented.

"(b) The French member of the high commission shall be president thereof.

"(c) The decisions of the high commission shall be reached by a majority of votes.

"(d) Each high commissioner shall have one vote. But in case of an equality of votes the president shall have the right to give a casting vote.

"(e) In either of these two cases the dissenting high commissioner, or high commissioners, may appeal to their Governments. But such an appeal shall not, in case of urgency, delay the putting into execution of the decisions taken, which shall then be carried out under the responsibility of the members voting for the decisions.

"7. In issuing decrees and proclamations or otherwise interfering with civil administration under a state of siege, the commander in chief shall continue to act in consultation with and only after approval by the high commission.

"This shall, of course, not apply to action of a purely military nature."

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, does this order provide for printing the amendments that the committee has made to the body of the treaty, as well as the reservations, all together?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; everything.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him when the Senate may expect the printed copies of the treaty, including the maps?

Mr. LODGE. Those are now in existence.

Mr. THOMAS. I have not seen any of them, and I have had some applications for one or two.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know how soon we can get them. The plan is to furnish them to every Senator. They have been already furnished to the committee, and will be printed for the Senate also—at least I have so directed—containing the maps.

Mr. THOMAS. Will a sufficient number be printed for outside distribution?

Mr. LODGE. I did not think of having that done, because the volume with the maps is a pretty expensive volume, and, I think, would require an order from the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wanted to secure information in order to answer some requests that I have had for such copies.

Mr. LODGE. I waited for the Senate to take action about printing those copies, but I wanted to get this order made now for printing the report containing the amendments and reservations in order to save time, for it will take two or three days to get those ready.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no objection whatever to the Senator's request.

Mr. LODGE. I will try to have it arranged so that the maps shall be printed in those copies that are here for the use of the Senate.

The order was reduced to writing and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the treaty of peace with Germany be printed as a Senate document without maps, and showing the amendments recommended by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LODGE subsequently said: Mr. President, I am now able to answer the Senator from Colorado. There will be, we hope, two copies of the treaty with maps—one bound copy and one unbound copy—ready on Monday for each Senator. As the maps had to be imported from Paris, that is all that we are able to print; but there will be one copy bound and one unbound which they hope to lay on the desks of Senators on Monday. That will not be the copy that will contain the amendments. Copies containing the amendments of the treaty will be printed just like those we now have.

PERSONNEL FOR THE ARMY—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. WADSWORTH submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2622) to provide necessary commissioned personnel for the Army until June 30, 1920, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the House insert the following:

"That until June 30, 1920, the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to maintain such commissioned personnel in addition to the officers of the permanent establishment and to retain at their temporary grades such officers of the Regular Army as in his judgment may be necessary for the proper performance of the functions of the Military Establishment: Provided, That additional officers so maintained shall be selected, so far as practicable, from officers and enlisted men who served during the emergency and are applicants for appointments in the permanent establishment: Provided further, That after October 31, 1919, the total number of commissioned officers, exclusive of retired officers and disabled emergency officers awaiting discharge upon completion of treatment for physical reconstruction, shall at no time exceed 18,000: Provided further, That no officer on the active list shall be detailed for recruiting service or for duty at schools and colleges, not including schools of the service, where officers on the retired list can be secured who are competent for such duty: And provided further, That hereafter officers retired for physical disability shall not form part of the limited retired list: And provided further, That 1,200 emergency officers shall be assigned to the Air Service, of whom not less than 85 per cent shall be duly qualified fliers."

And the House agree to the same.

J. W. WADSWORTH, Jr.,
HOWARD SUTHERLAND,
GEO. E. CHAMBERLAIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JULIUS KAHN,
FRANK L. GREENE,
S. H. DENT, Jr.,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, this is the conference report on the so-called 18,000 officer bill. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The report was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2395) amending section 25 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the act approved September 7, 1916, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That section 25 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the act approved September 7, 1916, be further amended by the addition of the following paragraph at the end of subparagraph 2 of the first paragraph, after the word "possessions":

"Until January 1, 1921, any national banking association, without regard to the amount of its capital and surplus, may file application with the Federal Reserve Board for permission, upon such conditions and under such regulations as may be prescribed by said board, to invest an amount not exceeding in the aggregate 5 per cent of its paid-in capital and surplus in the stock of one or more corporations chartered or incorporated under the laws of the United States or of any State thereof and, regardless of its location, principally engaged in such phases of international or foreign financial operations as may be necessary to facilitate the export of goods, wares, or merchandise from the United States or any of its dependencies or insular possessions to any foreign country: Provided, however, That in no event shall the total investments authorized by this section by any one national bank exceed 10 per cent of its capital and surplus."

SEC. 2. That paragraph 2 of said section be amended by adding, after the word "banking," in line 3, the words "or financial," so that the sentence will read: "Such application shall specify the name and capital of the banking association filing it, the powers applied for, and the place or places where the banking or financial operations proposed are to be carried on."

SEC. 3. That paragraph 3 of said section be amended by striking out the words "subparagraph 2 of the first paragraph of this section" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "above," so that the paragraph will read:

"Every national banking association operating foreign branches shall be required to furnish information concerning the condition of such branches to the Comptroller of the Currency upon demand, and every member bank investing in the capital stock of banks or corporations described above shall be required to furnish information concerning the condition of such banks or corporations to the Federal Reserve Board upon demand, and the Federal Reserve Board may order special examinations of the said branches, banks, or corporations at such time or times as it may deem best."

Mr. McLEAN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

H. R. 1429. An act adding certain lands to the Idaho National Forest and the Payette National Forest, in the State of Idaho;

H. R. 1430. An act to authorize the addition of certain lands to the Weiser National Forest, Idaho;

H. R. 2950. An act to authorize a preference right of entry by certain Carey Act entrymen, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 6410. An act authorizing the city of Boulder, Colo., to purchase certain public lands.

The following bills were each read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

H. R. 446. An act authorizing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to transfer fractional block 6 of Naylor's addition, Forest Grove, Oreg., to the United States of America, for the use of the Bureau of Entomology, Department of Agriculture;

H. R. 7751. An act authorizing the sale of inherited and unpartitioned allotments for town-site purposes in the Quapaw Agency, Okla.; and

H. J. Res. 151. Joint resolution to provide additional compensation for employees of the Postal Service and making an appropriation therefor was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

COTTON STATISTICS.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I ask for the consideration of Senate resolution 179.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 179, submitted by Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, on the 3d instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized and directed to ascertain the number of acres of cotton cultivation of which was abandoned during the current crop year and to publish the same not later than October 2, 1919.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. NELSON. I move that House bill 6810, the unfinished business, be proceeded with.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6810) to prohibit intoxicating beverages and to regulate the manufacture, production, use, and sale of high-proof spirits for other than beverage purposes, and to insure an ample supply of alcohol and promote its use in scientific research and in the development of fuel, dye, and other lawful industries.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill for action on the remaining amendments of the committee.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill at page 43, Title III, section 1.

UNIONIZATION OF WASHINGTON POLICE.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, on yesterday the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] addressed the Senate concerning the bill presented by the subcommittee of the Committee on Interstate Commerce after some remarks by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. The Senator from Mississippi in his forceful style very justly criticized the current organization of the police force of our cities and their affiliation with the American Federation of Labor. He pointed out some of its inevitable consequences, and made a vigorous appeal to the middle class of this country as the saving force in society to exert its power and influence for its own and for the welfare of the country.

In view of the proceedings in this District yesterday as reported in the morning Post concerning this very important subject:

The public has been informed from day to day of the action of the authorities toward the organization of the police force of the city of Washington and its proposed affiliation with the American Federation of Labor. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia, in the necessary and very proper exercise of their functions as the governing body of the people here, have vigorously objected to this organization and have forbidden its affiliation with the American Federation of Labor. They have recognized the menace of such a situation if it should develop into an actuality, and have taken steps to prevent it which should receive the commendation of every right-thinking man and woman in the country. Some of the policemen are said to have defied the orders of their superiors and have announced their intention of perfecting their plans and accomplishing their purposes. They are receiving the active assistance and support of the representatives of the American Federation of Labor, including Mr. Gompers, the president of that great organization.

On yesterday Mr. Gompers appeared before the commissioners in behalf of the police union and used his great influence in the effort to overcome the attitude of the commissioners and to secure their consent to the proposed confederation. I shall not occupy the time of the Senate in reading the somewhat lengthy account of his efforts, but content myself with calling attention to the fact that Mr. Gompers protested against this opposition as "an activity which indicates a misconception of the American Federation of Labor, which casts a stigma upon it, and declared flatly that America was not prepared to brook autocratic action by any official."

At the same time application was made to the courts by the Washington Policemen's Union for an injunction to restrain the Commissioners of the District of Columbia from further opposing the proposed organization. On yesterday, reading from the paper:

Justice Ashley M. Gould, in the District Supreme Court, granted a sweeping restraining order to prevent the commissioners from carrying out their plan of forcing the union to renounce its affiliation with the American Federation of Labor under penalty of the dismissal of its members from the police department.

This restraining order is returnable upon the 11th instant, at which time the effort will be made, and judging from the results of yesterday may be successfully made, to secure a permanent injunction at that hearing. This is plainly the substitution of judicial for administrative government in the Capital City of the Republic.

Here, then, Mr. President, on this 5th day of September, is a condition which should challenge the serious attention of the citizens of the District and of the people of the United States and of the Congress. It is a unique one, and one which, if successful, will be doubtless followed by events of similar character all over the country, and, if successful, will result in the merger of public officials employed by governments, paid from the public revenues to enforce the laws and to protect the public, with organizations of a private character; that is to say, composed of men engaged in private pursuits which frequently interfere with public peace and order by strikes and other manifestations of dissatisfaction with existing conditions; a union, in other words, of those whose business it is to enforce the law as against all disturbers with those whose attitude, for the time being, spells disregard or violation of the law.

There is an organization in this country popularly known as the I. W. W. Its hand is against society, against property, against peace and good order, against everything that makes for good citizenship, for progress, and for prosperity. It has at least two fundamental methods of procedure for the accomplishment of its ultimate purposes. These are the destruction of society and of government. One is a disregard of contract obligations and a continually increasing demand for compensation, which will at some time reach a point where the industry can not longer respond, and which must either go into bankruptcy or surrender to those who have destroyed it; the other is to secure control of the public authorities either by merger or by such coercion as organized effort may be able to mobilize on occasions of crisis. Both have, in a measure, been locally successful.

Mr. President, the American Federation of Labor seems to have adopted one of these policies and is now making vigorous application of it throughout the country, especially in the great cities, by forming unions among policemen and affiliating those unions with the main body. In a number of the large cities of the country this has been effectuated, and in several of them the inevitable disorganizing consequences have been demonstrated by recent labor disturbances.

I took occasion the other day to call the attention of the Senate to the action of the police of the city of Cleveland, where the disorders inevitably accompanying an extended strike were manifested with impunity under the eyes of the police force. They did not interfere because, forsooth, they had organized and were identified with the identical parent body of which the strikers were also affiliating members. Who doubts the source or the authority which dictated their conduct?

It is inevitable that one who works for the government, who is paid by the government, who is required to discharge an important government function can not perform his duty if he organizes and transfers his allegiance to another authority, which must necessarily conflict with it, always potentially and sometimes actually. It is a hyphenated situation, more deadly and destructive than any which confronted us during the actual prosecution of the war. It should be prevented wherever possible by the authorities charged with the administration of municipal government and with the support and encouragement of the citizenship of their respective communities. But here, Mr. President, the District Commissioners, seeking to discharge this imperative duty under their oaths of office, wake up this morning to find their hands tied by the injunctive processes of a court of general jurisdiction, invoked in behalf of the organizers against the government of the District of Columbia and against that of the United States.

During past years organized labor has protested loudly and sometimes violently against the undue exercise of the injunctive processes of courts of chancery, which have been, I regret, on many occasions abused. When we had the Clayton bill under consideration a few years ago labor-union officials came before us and insisted upon legislation which would destroy or render impotent the power of injunction in case of strikes, and such legislation was attempted in the Clayton Act. It has not been effective, as I sought to point out at the time it would not be, but it forcefully indicates the hostility manifested by organized labor against the restraining processes of the courts, always issued up to that time in the interest of the employer class and against them. Here the situation is reversed, and it is the organization which invokes this same tremendous power of the courts not to enforce the law for the employer but to paralyze the public officials who alone can exercise the authority and who must, under their oaths of office, exercise it in behalf of the public and for the common good by prohibiting this movement.

Mr. President, with all due respect to the courts—and I have at all times tried to manifest the proper respect for them—I affirm this to be the most conspicuous instance of the abuse of the process of the courts that has challenged my attention for a great many years. It is either a usurpation or a perversion of judicial authority, and in either case it is wholly indefensible.

Mr. OWEN. What did the court do, exactly?

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Oklahoma asks what the court did exactly. I read to him the report which appears in the Washington Post this morning, in which the order is called a very sweeping one:

> The restraining order granted the union yesterday is returnable upon the 11th instant. It is a sweeping restraining order to prevent the commissioners from carrying out their plan of forcing the union to renounce its affiliation with the American Federation of Labor under penalty of the dismissal of its members from the police department.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What judge did that?

Mr. THOMAS. Justice Ashley M. Gould.

A few days ago, Mr. President, one of the high officials of the American Federation of Labor—I think Mr. Scott—in criticizing the action of the commissioners declared it to be the first step toward the proposed prevention of strikes among Government officials or employees, and he denounced it as such. I think Mr. Scott knew what he was talking about, for there is in this morning's World a special telegram from Chicago informing the public that the national convention of postal employees, while denouncing the Postmaster General yesterday afternoon, announced their intention of generally suspending the discharge of their duties on the 1st of October. In other words, another class of Government employees who have no occasion for organizing, whose salaries are fixed by the Government, who can have no quarrel with employers, propose as an organization to abstain from the performance of their bounden duty on the 1st of October, forsooth, because Uncle Sam does not pay them enough, or because they do not like the Postmaster General, or both. And, Mr. President, let me say that these people have the same right to go on strike that the organized police forces of the country have. If one is right, the other can not be wrong; but if the one is indefensible, then both must be.

Mr. President, I have seen many severe criticisms of the Postmaster General. I think he is the best-abused or the worst-abused official in the Government, and doubtless he has done some things in office which subject him to criticism; but the real cause of his unpopularity is that up to this time he has refused to allow the employees of the Post Office Department to run that department. He has insisted upon their observance of the law, and he has declined to "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee," as some other departments have done, when demands have been made upon him that are not in consonance with his ideas of duty, of right, and justice; and he should be commended for it instead of being condemned. But the latter is the portion of every man who declines even indirectly to accept prevailing conditions and demands without regard to the public welfare or to their ultimate consequences.

Mr. President, I regard with concern this movement, which may have acquired resistless momentum, toward the organization in one body of all classes and conditions of men and women, without regard to the character or nature of their employment. I have always championed the cause of union labor, so essential to the preservation of the individual and to his protection in view of the tremendous trend toward consolidations of capital, of transportation, and of industry; but no man ever dreamed that the principle would be carried so far as to involve the officials and employees of our cities, of our States, and of the Nation, whose pursuits are semigovernmental, all of them, and who are entirely exempt from all those conditions which require organization among private employees. The States pay salaries as fixed by law, the municipalities likewise, and the Government of the United States as well. There is no need for collective bargaining. No man's position is assailed so long as he performs his duty. If his compensation is insufficient, he can appeal to the proper authorities for redress. His first duty is to the public, and the moment he enters an organization which affiliates in a direction that may become inconsistent or in conflict with those duties, that moment the Government should step in and say, "Thou shalt not."

I defy any man on earth, I care not who he is, to assail successfully the proposition that an executive officer charged with duties to the public should keep himself aloof from every other influence which may diminish or in any way control the proper exercise of that duty. I have known in the West instances where such officers have been chosen by popular vote because it was understood in advance that they would not execute the law, and we may well imagine what followed. I have been told that in machine-governed cities like Chicago, New York, Philadelphia, and others, men are frequently placed in public positions not to enforce the law but to see that it is not enforced, to the end that their superiors may profit by such nonenforcement; but nobody has ever sought to defend it. Nobody can defend it. It can be prevented by popular government processes, as the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] suggests, provided the popular government processes get busy, but the difficulty about such a manner of prevention is its tardiness on the one hand and the influences that can be brought to bear upon its proper functioning on the other.

Mr. President, here we have the whip hand in the matter of the District of Columbia, if we will only exercise it. We hold the purse strings, and I think the Congress of the United States should let the District Commissioners at once understand that we are squarely behind them, and that if the officers of the law in the Capital City of the United States persist in their present determination, even though supported by the injunctive process of the courts, they will receive no appropriations from the National Government for salary purposes, and we owe it not only to the people of the District but to the people of the United States to set that example and do it now, when the urgency is great and the need most apparent.

I do not know that that will be done. I am not sure that there is sufficient moral courage in the Congress of the United States to do it; but I predict that unless it is done our failure to act will be converted into a precedent, and States and municipalities will cite our inaction as a reason for their similar inertness and inefficiency.

I know that a presidential election is approaching, and that the Democratic and Republican parties are looking forward to that event as the supreme issue of the immediate future, and may be prepared to accept any conditions rather than to resort to some affirmative action which may imperil the result by antagonizing portions of the electorate.

Mr. President, it does not make much difference who is our ruler provided he is honest, conscientious, capable, and endowed with that courage in the performance of his duty which is the rarest, as it should be, and is the most essential element of proper administration. In the abstract, Democrats can get along very well under Republican administrations if they have to, and Republicans are getting along very well now under a Democratic administration which the people have chosen, and which will run its constitutional course. Both parties are patriotic. Each believes in its own convictions, although it is difficult for me now to perceive any great amount of political difference between them; and we may rest assured that each party will nominate its best man, or try to do so. We should do our duty here regardless of its effect upon the election of November, 1920. We are in parlous and troublous times; and he who bends to the storm instead of meeting it, and meeting it according to the requirements of our duty, is unworthy of a seat in either House of Congress, and unworthy of the people he represents.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. OWEN. Will the Senator permit me to suggest that I think the storm really is caused by the very high cost of living, due to war conditions, and that this matter can be met not only by recognizing the principles which the Senator is espousing, but also by making haste to abate the high cost of living as soon as we possibly can.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, Mr. President, there is no question but that the expense of living has much to do with public discontent, for which due allowance can be made; but it should have nothing whatever to do with the proposition whether a public official can, by organizing and affiliating in other directions, practically have his own hands tied and render himself, if not impotent, largely inefficient for the discharge of his duty in times of crisis and danger.

It is announced that the policemen's union of this city have an antistrike clause in their organization. Thank God for that. Yet it is merely a negative advantage. They contribute out of their salaries, out of the money we pay them to perform their duty, to the general fund, which is used for strike and other benefits in time of turmoil, and it is inconceivable that these men would vigorously enforce the law here against their comrades, as they call them—and properly call them after they are in affiliation—it is inconceivable that they will give the same service that could be expected and must be given under normal conditions.

Let us suppose that a strike should occur in the city of Washington, and it is perhaps not too much to suppose that it might occur in the Post Office Department, and that the Postmaster General should call upon others to take employment under the Government and discharge the duties which are cast aside by the members of the postal union, and the members of the union should interfere with violence and by force to prevent the taking of these places by outsiders. Does any man believe for a moment that the police of this city would protect the new officials to the same degree and with the same efficiency as would be the case if they themselves were not a branch of the same general organization? It is not in human nature. If they would, then tell me, Mr. President, why it is that the American Federation of Labor wants them so badly?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. If it will not disturb the Senator in the course of his remarks, I should like to say that it was gravely discussed before a labor union embracing all of the members of the fire department in a municipality whether they should not strike and refuse to answer calls for fires, and further whether they should not refuse to answer calls for fires on property owned by persons who employed nonunion labor. What would the Senator think of an official or series of officials going to that length? I will only say that this was not carried into execution, because more conservative members pointed out the utter ruin that would be wrought to a union that permitted such a condition to prevail.

I think the Senator is performing a very needed service this morning. As for myself, I do not believe in the union of any government employees, State, municipal, or others, engaged in a public service. The same thing could tie up the execution of the quarantine law. I think Congress, here in the District of Columbia, ought to express itself in no uncertain terms on a question of this vitality.

Mr. THOMAS. The instance cited by the Senator from Illinois is not a surprising one. It is the necessary and logical outcome of these conditions. You can draw no limit, you can circumscribe no boundaries to the conditions which must ensue whenever we recognize the right, as I have stated several times, perhaps too many times, of men and women engaged in a public capacity, however humble, and discharging a public duty, however simple, to take upon themselves obligations and form themselves into organizations the purpose and tendency of which are and must be in direct conflict with the performance of their duty.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator if it is necessary to go to that length in order to protect the interests of the Government? In other words, does unionism necessarily conflict with proper service to the Government? I can understand how it can be carried to a point where it would necessarily, but there is a vast field for the operation of unionism which as among the employees themselves, it seems to me, would not necessarily conflict with their duties.

Mr. THOMAS. There is no question that organizations designed for charitable and social purposes and mutual improvement are desirable. These the police forces of many communities have had and have sustained such organizations for years. But when they go so far as they must go in cases like this and interfere with efficient service and the discharge of duty, then, although the line of demarcation may be indistinct, it exists between such unions as I have referred to and those which I oppose. Suppose, for example, some man belonging to this union has been derelict in the performance of his duty or has discharged it in a way not justified by the law should be suspended or discharged from service, and the union should say, "No"—that is one of its purposes—"it does not make any difference how this man discharged his duty; he must remain upon the force or we will all quit, and if we quit there are other organizations that will go upon a sympathetic strike," and prevent the employment of new men to discharge the functions of municipal government.

That would be an intolerable situation if the power properly responsible for the administration of this city should find it impossible to discipline or discharge recalcitrant policemen, and that is bound to come if we sit supinely, not only in Washington but throughout the country, and permit this movement to materialize.

Mr. President, I think it is just to the individuals to say that, in my judgment, less than 10 per cent of these people sympathize with this tendency, but they follow the general trend of the most extreme lest their motives be misconstrued and they themselves be subject to disfavor.

I do not know where this movement will stop unless public attention is drawn to it and public opinion shall circumscribe it.

Several years ago in the State of Nevada, when I. W. W.ism was rampant in southern camps, the denizens of the dance halls organized a union. I think they affiliated for a short time with the I. W. W. and they issued their placards against unfair houses, one of which I have here. [Exhibiting.] I shall not put it in the RECORD, but if the Senators would like to see it I can assure them that it is a genuine document. Such unions, infamous beyond expression, would be far less dangerous to society and far less pernicious than those of men who are employed to function for and who are paid by the government to which they owe their allegiance. It may be, and probably is, true that we are drifting the way of all republics; but if so, we should gain wisdom by experience and profit by the mistakes of other democracies which in the past have risen, matured, and disappeared. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] reminds me that an incident of the decadence of Rome was reflected by the corruption of the Pretorian Guard, having the official power to dictate the policy of the empire and to enthrone and dethrone its monarchs. It is the tendency of democracies.

One of the greatest works upon the subject is Lecky's Democracy and Liberty. With the permission of the Senate, I will read an extract, beginning on page 258 of the first volume. It is quite apposite to the subject:

> The expansion of the authority and the multiplication of the functions of the State in other fields, and especially in the field of social regulation, is an equally apparent accompaniment of modern democracy. This increase of State power means a multiplication of restrictions imposed upon the various forms of human action. It means an increase of bureaucracy, or, in other words, of the number and power of State officials. It means also a constant increase of taxation, which is in reality a constant restriction of liberty. One of the first forms of liberty is the right of every man to dispose of his own property and earnings, and every tax is a portion of this money taken from him by the force and authority of the law. Many of these taxes are, no doubt, for purposes in which he has the highest interest. They give him the necessary security of life, property, and industry, and they add in countless ways to his enjoyment. But if taxes are multiplied for carrying out a crowd of objects in which he has no interest, and with many of which he has no sympathy, his liberty is proportionately restricted.

That is going on right here.

> His money is more and more taken from him by force for purposes of which he does not approve. The question of taxation is in the highest degree a question of liberty, and taxation under a democracy is likely to take forms that are peculiarly hostile to liberty. I have already pointed out how the old fundamental principle of English freedom—that no one should be taxed except by his consent—is being gradually discarded, and how we are steadily advancing to a state in which one class will impose the taxes, while another class will be mainly compelled to pay them. It is obvious that taxation is more and more employed for objects that are not common interests of the whole community—and that there is a growing tendency to look upon it as a possible means of confiscation; to make use of it to break down the power, influence, and wealth of particular classes; to form a new social type; to obtain the means of class bribery.

How well we know that in America!

There are other ways in which democracy does not harmonize well with liberty. To place the chief power in the most ignorant classes is to place it in the hands of those who naturally care least for political liberty and who are most likely to follow with an absolute devotion some strong leader. The sentiment of nationality penetrates very deeply into all classes, but in all countries and ages it is the upper and middle classes who have chiefly valued constitutional liberty, and those classes it is the work of democracy to dethrone. At the same time democracy does much to weaken among these also the love of liberty. The instability and insecurity of democratic politics, the spectacle of dishonest and predatory adventurers climbing by popular suffrage into positions of great power in the State, the alarm which attacks on property seldom fail to produce among those who have something to lose, may easily scare to the side of despotism large classes who, under other circumstances, would have been steady supporters of liberty. A despotism which secures order, property, and industry, which leaves the liberty of religion and of private life unimpaired, and which enables quiet and industrious men to pass through life untroubled and unmolested, will always appear to many very preferable to a democratic republic which is constantly menacing, disturbing, or plundering them. It would be a great mistake to suppose that the French despotic Empire after 1852 rested on bayonets alone. It rested partly on the genuine consent of those large agricultural classes who cared greatly for material prosperity and very little for constitutional liberty, and partly on the panic produced among the middle classes by the socialist preaching of 1848.

I may pause here, Mr. President, to remind the farming element of the country that if the forces now actively seeking the overthrow of all forms of property and the leveling of our institutions down to the dust shall succeed, they are the class which will constitute the greatest sufferers, the class which in the past in other countries have been the first to finally recognize that consequence and to rebel against it and, if possible, to overthrow it.

The dangers to be apprehended from democracy are enormously increased when the transformation is effected by sudden bounds. Governments or societies may be fundamentally changed, without producing any great convulsion or catastrophe, if the continuity of habit is preserved, if the changes are made by slow, gradual, and almost imperceptible steps. As I have already said, it is one of the evils of our present party system that it greatly accelerates this progress. Very few constitutional changes are the results of a genuine, spontaneous, unforced development. They are mainly, or, at least, largely, due to rival leaders bidding against each other for popularity, to agitators seeking for party purposes to raise a cry, to defeated statesmen trying, when they are condemned by existing constituencies, to regain power by creating new ones. The true origin of some of the most far-reaching changes of our day is probably simply a desire so to shuffle cards or combine votes as to win an election. With a powerful upper chamber and a strong organization of property in the electorate, the conservative influences are sufficient to prevent a too rapid change. But when these checks are weakened and destroyed and when there are no constitutional provisions to take their place, the influences working in the direction of change acquire an enormously augmented force, the dangers of the process are incalculaby increased and the new wine is very likely to burst the old bottles.

Mr. Gompers is reported as having said to the commissioners yesterday that there is but one alternative for these organizations and their affiliation with the American Federation of Labor, and that alternative is the I. W. W. If that statement is of importance at all, and I do not think it is, it simply means that unless the policemen of the United States form unions and affiliate with the American Federation of Labor, they must form unions and affiliate with the I. W. W.'s.

My contention is, Mr. President, and I do not believe it can be refuted, that no such alternative presents itself; that these employees need not and should not be permitted to assume obligations, membership, and commitments which essentially injure or impair their efficiency as guardians of the public peace. No man, no matter however devout or far-reaching his belief in the principle of unionism, can defend its application to conditions like these.

I trust, therefore, Mr. President, and with this statement I conclude, that the Congress of the United States will stand squarely behind the District Commissioners and by their power over the national purse bring confusion to this last and most impious attempt at government by injunction.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, when a man enters the service of the Government of the United States, representing all the people of the United States, under our orderly processes for the preservation of life and liberty, he can not be permitted to recognize any allegiance to any other authority that would interfere in the just discharge of that function. If the police authorities can organize and go on a strike and turn the criminal element loose when riots take place, society would have no way of protecting itself. If the fire department go on a strike and allows the city to burn up because they are discontented with some matter affecting their own compensation, the towns would burn up.

I believe in the unions. I think they have been justified in a great many of the things they have done; I think they have been justified in order to improve the conditions of those who labor. Sometimes they may have gone to extremes, as any human beings may do. Sometimes they may have gone to extremes in the matter of their political activities, but on the whole their organizations have been wisely and honestly conducted, and surely they have been essential to the development of those who labor in this country. They are justified in organizing for their own betterment, and I sympathize with them.

The reason why I rose upon the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] was to make a suggestion that the high cost of living is at the bottom of a great deal of this modern unrest and of the strikes showing themselves in every quarter of our country and in every quarter of the globe and explain the demands of our Government employees. More than 40,000,000 men withdrawn from the productive processes of peace by the Great War and engaged in the destructive processes of war, supported by hundreds of millions of others who were supplying them with the requirements of war, so that practically all of Europe was withdrawn as far as its productive peaceful activities were concerned from supplying the things which human beings need. They were calling on this country and on other countries for supplies, so that the natural order of diminished world supply and increased world demand has caused an extraordinary rise in prices.

In addition to that cause of high prices in America, we have had in the United States eleven hundred million dollars of gold flowing here in exchange for excess commodities sent abroad, expanding our currency at least to that extent and, in my judgment, to a larger extent, because the notes issued against the gold and commodity bills as Federal reserve notes have contributed to a large extent to the expansion of credit based on the expansion of currency, and the credits appearing in deposits being available by checks serve a like purpose as an expansion of currency. That, however, is common to the world, with the exception of the Orient, where they still have a very low per capita circulation in India and China and Japan, but in Japan they have doubled the circulation, and Japan is full of strikes right now because the people of Japan can not buy enough rice to feed themselves with the number of yen they receive on the old scale of wages.

I think in considering questions of this kind we should do it in a spirit of moderation and in a spirit of benevolence, but that this Congress ought to devote its attention immediately and urgently to solving the question of the high cost of living and to find an adequate remedy. I have introduced a Senate joint resolution for a special joint committee to deal with the high cost of living. We can not do so except with diligent study of the conditions which are confronting the whole world. There are many factors which enter into the problem, but I think the chief factor of all is that of the private monopolies which are arbitrarily fixing prices upon everything the people require. We have some evidence before us that has been obtained by the Federal Trade Commission, and in a short time I wish to place before the Senate some of the evidence which has been collected. There is involved, for instance, cement, a material which of all others is the most important, probably, in the world for housing men. In the State of Oklahoma I have been informed that cement could be made before the war under the conditions which are favorable there for 46 cents a barrel. It is sold for $1.75 and $2 a barrel. Those who manufacture cement are not manufacturing to the fullest extent of their capacity; their plants are not fully employed; they could employ much more labor in creating this substance, which is so important in building houses and building hard-surfaced roads, and for these purposes there could be profitably used ten times the present output. The monopolies are standing in the way of our domestic expansion, arbitrary and willful profiteering prices on cement, on lumber, on hardware, and on other things which are essential in housing men and improving our highways and feeding and clothing the people. Is it any wonder that complaints come before Congress as to rents in the District of Columbia and throughout the country from one end to the other when all building materials are so controlled? The unfair distribution of money because of these monopoly conditions is affording an opportunity for extravagance and waste, so that when you go to a New York hotel and get a decent room they expect you to pay $16 a day, or some such price, for it. They charged me that the other day. I did not know it until I got my bill. Inadvertently I forgot to ask them the price in advance.
